NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 1—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, SEPT. 3, 1851.

[VOL. XLI. WHOLE NO. 1,041

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Because that the editor has been for several days much indisposed, and on account of the sudden and awfully severe illness and consequent decease of a much beloved son, Robert Duer Niles, aged nearly 22 years, who died on Friday morning last—he has not been enabled to do more than give general directions as to the business of the present sheet, and was compelled also to defer a notice of very many communications of a private nature, and of others concerning matters of public interest.

The paper, (for the sake of uniformity), is dated on Saturday, the 3rd Sept. though not really published until Tuesday the 6th—and contains only articles of intelligence up to its date, all the matter being prepared at the usual period.

ELECTIONS. The following is the result of the late congressional elections in North Carolina—

Last congress.	Next congress.
William B. Shepard,	Wm. B. Shepard,
Willis Alston,	John Branch,
Thomas H. Hall,	Thomas H. Hall,
Jesse Speight,	Jesse Speight,
Robert Potter,	Robert Potter,
Edward B. Dudley,	James J. McKay,
Edmund Deberry,	Lauchlin Bethune,
Daniel L. Barringer,	Daniel L. Barringer,
Augustin H. Shepherd,	Augustin H. Shepherd,
Abraham Rencher,	Abraham Rencher,
Henry W. Conner,	Henry W. Conner,
Samuel P. Carson,	Samuel P. Carson,
Lewis Williams,	Lewis Williams,

Mr. Conner beat his opponent, Mr. Shipp, 854 votes—Mr. Bethune beat Mr. Deberry, late member, by only 9 votes; and Mr. W. B. Shepard beat Mr. Wheeler by 1,121 votes. In the other districts the opposition to the gentlemen elected was not very large.

Kentucky election. The Lexington (Kentucky) Reporter gives the final results of the Kentucky election to this effect:—

to this effect:		Members of the Legislature.
Congressional districts.		Clay.	Jackson.
1.	Marshall's district (1 senator C.)	6	1
2.	Allan's district (1 senator C.)	6	0
3.	Letcher's district,	9	1
4.	Tompkins' district,	6	3
5.	Chilton's district (1 senator C.)	5	5
6.	Leeompte's district (1 senator J.)	6	3
7.	Daniel's district (2 senators; 1 J., 1 C.)	5	4
8.	Wickliffe's dist. (2 senators; 1 J., 1 C.)	4	4
9.	Gaither's district,	3	5
10.	Johnson's district,	2	6
11.	Adair's district,	2	6
12.	Lyon's district, (1 senator C.)	2	6
Representatives		56	44
Senators		6	3
Members of congress		4	8
Total		66	55

The member from Davis and one member from Hardin and Mead, are pledged to vote for Mr. Crittenden, for the United States senate.

Senators elected.	3 Jackson.
6 National republicans.
Robert Taylor,	John Rodman,*
W. P. Fleming,	David Harris,*
Benjamin Hardin,	James Guthrie,*
James Clark,*
James Ghoulson,*
Wm. R. Griffith,*

[It turns out that Mr. Chilton has not been elected, though hitherto elected by a Jackson majority of 1,900 votes. He has now been beaten by Mr. Hawes, by a majority of 9 votes. For Hawes 3,861; Chilton 3,852.]

The following is a complete list of the representation in the next congress from the state of Tennessee.

1st district	John Blair.	Re-elected.
2nd do.	Thomas D. Arnold.	In place of Lea.
3rd do.	James Standifer.	Re-elected.
4th do.	Jacob C. Isaacks.	Do.
5th do.	William Hall.	In place of Desha.
6th do.	John Bell.	Re-elected.
7th do.	James K. Polk.	Do.
8th do.	Cave Johnson.	Do.
9th do.	William Fitzgerald.	In place of Crockett.

Mr. Blair was strongly opposed by Mr. Carter, but the latter was beaten by a majority of more than 500 votes.

Alabama elections.—Mr. Lewis is re-elected to congress. From Mr. Baylor's district, the returns are—Mardis 4,247—Garth 3,597—Baylor (late member) 2,749. Mr. Mardis supposed to be elected. Mr. Clay, the former representative, is re-elected in the remaining district.

Indiana election. The Lawrenceburg Palladium, a very decided administration paper, gives us the following additional returns of the late election in Indiana—39 Clay members of the house of representatives and 7 of the senate, and 30 Jackson of the house and 6 of the senate have been chosen.

In the first district for congress, Mr. Boon received 10,530 votes and Mr. Law 10,306; in the second district, Mr. Carr had 4,843 votes, and Mr. Wick 4,539; in the third district, Mr. Test, late member, had 3,095 votes, Mr. Smith, (also Clay) 4,845 votes—and Mr. McCarty, Jackson, 3,970 votes. The latter elected, though the other two had 2,000 votes more than he. The returns are not complete, but the Palladium says that Messrs. Boon, Carr and McCarty are chosen.

We have already mentioned the election of Mr. Noble, as governor; the Palladium supposes that Mr. Wallace, also a friend of Mr. Clay, has been elected lieutenant governor by a majority of from 2,000 to 3,000.

The "Illinois Intelligencer" of the 13th Aug. says that Mr. Duncan has been re-elected to congress by a large majority—but, as there were several candidates, nothing certain can be inferred, as to rational politics, from this election. There were six candidates, Messrs. Duncan, Coles, Breeze, Turney, Field and Bond—three or four of whom polled heavily in certain counties of the state. For instance in Madison, the first on the list, the whole number of votes was 845, of which Mr. D. had only 255, being beaten by Mr. Coles and nearly equalled by Mr. Breeze, and two others received 102 votes. Nothing is said of the political character of the legislature.

Mr. Newton has been elected to congress from the Norfolk district, Virginia, by a majority of 61 votes, over Mr. Loyall, late member.

The fullest return that we have seen, shows that Mr. Fitzgerald had obtained 7,647 votes, and Mr. Crockett 7,098 in Tennessee,—three small counties were yet to be heard from. The former is elected.

We have often cautioned our readers as to the difficulty of ascertaining truth in the various articles of news that we are in the habit of publishing. We must altogether refrain from giving information on any subject until it becomes stale, by undoubted results,—or measurably incur the risk of error, like other publishers of periodical papers. It is sufficient that we endeavor to collect the facts—and every body knows that errors in fact, (no matter by whom made), are never permitted to remain one publication uncontradicted, if observed by the editor. This note is added because of a rude remark, and false insinuation, made in another paper—which, perhaps, may be mentioned hereafter.

*New senators.

VOL. XLI.—No. 1.

GENUINE BULL-ISM. The "Standard" says—The following ridiculous tirade, respecting the state of civilization in this country, is from the July number of the London Monthly Magazine. The harangues alluded to, are those spoken at a recent meeting of the Prison Discipline society:

"Passing over the worn-out common-places of those harangues, the praise of American prison affairs, as if there could be any rational comparison between England, crowned as she is with temptations to pillaging, and loaded with a population of six millions of a mercantile and manufacturing race; and America, where is nothing to steal but grass or water; where the spade is the only thing of value, and the land the only thing out of which a man can live; America, where every man must be his own tailor, carpenter, lawyer, and rearer of cabbages; where, if a man must devise the stealing of a pair of breeches, he must first slay and strip the wearer, inasmuch as no man, from the president downwards, has a second pair; where the arts of life consist in planting maize and potatoes, and the luxuries of life consist in boiling them into puddings; where there are more acres of land than knives and forks; a looking glass is a show that congregates the population of a province; a picture has never been seen; a salt spoon is a phenomenon which no American traveller, who values his reputation for veracity in the states, has ever ventured to announce; and it is notorious, that a tea service of French plate accumulated the unpopularity of the Adames to such a degree, that it overthrew that ancient dynasty, and federalism along with it, forever."

Glorious John Bull. "Chaos would come again" without thee! and "the stars grow dim with age" with thy decline in pomposity. In contrast with the preceding, it is pleasing to observe such generous remarks as the following, from our English brethren. They are copied from the London World. While they show the powerful action of good men on a community, they invite the union of the pious on both sides the Atlantic in noble efforts for the salvation and liberties of the world:

"Who taught the proud king of Egypt, and through him all the monarchs of the earth, the folly of trusting to arts and arms as the means of keeping those in cruel bondage who ought to be free, but the meekest of men? Who taught the haughty and vain Nebuchadnezzar, and his still weaker successors, that there is a greater power than that which belongs to great armies and vast dependencies, but the pious youths who despised the commands of kings when they interfered with the commands of God? And who are now disconcerting all the wily politicians in the world, and presenting an example of good government, which is drawing under its protection the most enterprising, skillful, and industrious families of the old world, and setting bounds to tyranny every where, but the descendants of the pilgrim fathers, who, driven from their own land, became blessings to that new world in which freedom and pure christianity appear at length to have found a resting place, a secure abode?"

"Let no friend of freedom complain of our attention to our brethren of America. They are enlightened, generous and free, and must guide the destinies of the world, unless we can provoke in our countrymen a spirit of noble and generous emulation. We would have England and America stimulate each other, and combine their influence to extend to all mankind the blessings of Christian knowledge, and its fruit, universal liberty. To this end, both countries must educate the young, promote the observance of the Sabbath, honor the faithful ministers of religion, and abolish slavery all over the world. They may give laws to mankind, if they please; but they must be just laws, and promotive of universal love. What are the United States of America but a part of England across the seas? They form the habitations of our brothers and our sons. There is the land of freedom, and we may well be proud of our connexion with it. We envy not the rising greatness of her people; they are our relatives and our friends. They are co-operating with us, and together we are struggling against the usurped and hateful, but short-lived, dominion of brute force over intellect and science; of erail and despotism, where wisdom and virtue should reign supreme. And we know we shall triumph. The darkness must be dispelled by the light, falsehood give way to truth, and righteous government prevail over oppression; for the influence of our Redeemer begins to be felt, and "the Light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame, and it shall burn and devour the thorns and briars in one day."

THE GOLD REGION. The Charleston Gazette says—We have been favored by a friend with the following extract of a letter from Charlotte, N. C. dated June 14, which gives us a brief and passing glimpse into the gold region of that quarter. The writer says—"The amount of money expended here is enormous, and the works are now yielding a handsome supply of gold. I went down a ladder about one hundred feet, perpendicular, and thence along galleries well-braced on the sides, and roofed with boards over-head, for some hundred feet further. I then followed, in a slanting direction, the vein to the spot where the miners were taking the ore from the earth, and sending it aloft by means of buckets which are drawn up by mules. Two hands did about 60 bushels of ore per diem, and the chevalier Ritafanti, informs me that when he gets his new mill into operation, he will make about $500 worth of gold every day."

THE VICE PRESIDENCY. The exclusive republicans of New York, and the exclusive republicans of Pennsylvania, are on the verge of a violent quarrel for the vice-presidency—the first being for Mr. Van Buren, and the last for almost any one else.

MR. MADISON. We had the pleasure of conversing, a day or two ago, with a gentleman who had just before spent a day in the company of Mr. Madison, at his seat in Orange county, Virginia. Our readers will be glad to learn, that the venerable ex-president is in fine health, and in full possession of all his faculties of mind and body, with unabated cheerfulness of spirits, having before him the prospect of living to a good old age. His years at present number more than eighty; but his mother lived, if we mistake not, to nearly a hundred years, and we have reason to hope that her son will for many years continue to exhibit to the present generation, an illustrious living example of the pure and virtuous character of the statesmen to whom we are indebted for our present admirable frame of government. It is, indeed, a glorious moral spectacle, to see the father of the constitution receiving the homage of the respect and veneration of the children of those who have grown up and prospered under its wings.

There are many of our readers who will rejoice to learn, that their old unvarying and kind friend, the excellent consort of Mr. Madison, is in the same health and spirits as himself. [Nat. Intel.

CHURCHES IN THE UNITED STATES IN 1831. It has been ascertained that there are now in the United States more than 12,000 churches. The principal religious denominations are Baptists and Methodists, who have together 4,484 churches; the Presbyterians have 1,472 churches; the Congregationalists have 1,381 churches; the Episcopalians are also numerous, and have 922 churches; the Roman Catholics have 784 churches; the Dutch reformed have 602 churches; the Friends have 462 societies; the Universalists have 296 churches; the Lutherans have 240 churches; the Unitarians have 127 churches; the Jews have 96 synagogues; the Calvinistic Baptists have 84 churches; the Swedenborgians have 73 churches; and the Moravians 56 churches.

IRELAND. We have many "tales of horror" from this unhappy country—the following is a specimen:

A summary of Irish intelligence given in a London paper presents a frightful picture of the state of some parts of that country. In the county of Galway, a man suspected of being an informer, was murdered and his eyes taken out by the assassins. A Mr. Shiell, of Shaggarry, in the same county, was waylaid and beaten with stones till his skull was fractured. He was left for dead, and shortly afterwards expired. The magistrates of the county of Galway had a meeting in which it was unanimously resolved, that the ordinary administration of the laws was not enough to put down the disturbances in that county.

CURIOUS MARRIAGES IN IRELAND. In the course of a trial at the Roscommon special commission, evidence was given relative to the marriage of a Catholic female with a man who had been a Protestant, which, under the extraordinary (still existing) law in Ireland, subjects a Catholic priest to a penalty of five hundred pounds. The witness thus described the curious evasion of the law adopted on this occasion:—"He was married at twelve o'clock at night; did not see the priest, who was in one room (the vestry) and he in another; the words of marriage, "for better for worse," were said in the room, and saw only the hand of a man put through an aperture of the door; saw a stole and a white shirt on the man; the clerk of the chapel was present; the ring was put on his wife's finger by the clerk, and not by the priest.—Went to mass to please his wife, or he would get 'tucks' (hard treatment.) Saw no white shirt, but part of his arm, which was put through the opening of the door, in giving aspergos in water.

RUSSIA. This mighty empire is said to be much disturbed by the discontents of the people. The day, we trust, is at hand when the terrible despotism and abject slavery that prevails, will be abolished. Poland may leave the whole mass.

THE CHOLERA MORBUS has broken out at St. Petersburg—the imperial family had abandoned the city, and the population was in "a state of complete consternation."

THE POLES. We translate the following address of the French central committee, in favor of the Poles, to the electors of France, from the supplement to the Courrier Francais of the first of June last.

"Gentlemen: Preparatory assemblies are taking place among you, in order to fix your choice between the different candidates for the deputations; the day of election will, also, soon arrive, and you will meet in order to give deputies to France. We imagine, gentlemen, that we should be conforming to your feelings by asking of you to cause these different meetings to result profitably for the Polish cause. It is not necessary for us to explain to the flower (l'élite) of the French nation the right which our Polish brethren possess to our affection. It is the desire of all in France who are the friends of honor and their country, to seize every opportunity of showing to the world our admiration of Poland, and our wishes for her triumph. By this strong claim, the committee has reckoned on your co-operation. They propose to you to open subscriptions, the produce of which shall be destined to aid the cause of the Polish heroes, in the dreadful contest which they are waging so gloriously. It will not be useless to unite with the nomination of men who are about to give a constitution to France, an action serviceable to that generous nation, who are contending so courageously for independence and liberty."

[This address is signed by seventy-four of the most eminent names of modern France, including that of the patriarch of liberty—LAFAYETTE.]

GEOGRAPHICAL ITEMS. Amount of the population and of the extent of territory of the five principal monarchies of Europe:

	Square miles.	Population.
Russia, in Europe,	75,154	47,660,000
Out of Europe,	292,339	11,714,000
England, in Europe,	5,334	21,400,000
Out of Europe,	176,971	115,141,000
France, in Europe,	10,086	30,749,000
Out of Europe,	667	469,000
Austria,	12,265	29,691,000
Prussia,	5,014	11,400,000
Total,	578,044	268,324,000

Supposing the earth's surface to be 2,125,000 square miles, and its inhabitants to amount to 938,000,000, then these five monarchies occupy nearly a fourth part of the surface, and rule over 2-7th's of the human race. Europe having 155,220 square miles, and a population of 206,780,000 souls, the five powers possess more than two-thirds of its territory and of its population. The empire of China, however, is more extensive and more densely peopled than all Europe. The Spanish monarchy before its dissolution, reckoned more than 30 millions of people.

THE EVENTS OF A YEAR. Fraser's Magazine for July has "a word at parting," which shows how much more durable that publication is, in these days of change, than thrones and sceptres.

A little year ago, and George IV. ruled in England and Hanover—Charles X. in France—Pius VIII. in Rome—Charles Felix in Sardinia—Francis Janvier in Naples—Anthony in Saxony—Pedro in Brazil—Charles in Brunswick—William had the kingdom of the Netherlands—Nicholas was undisputed autocrat of Poland. Where are they now?—in the grave—in exile—or shorn of their dominions. And yet the revolution has not much more than begun. A new spirit has been unloosed, and he hovers over the world, whether for good or for evil. We have had no comet shaking its horrid hair above us, but earthly portents of direr kind, with fear of change, are perplexing monarchs.

"New powers from home, and discontents at home,
Meet in one line: and vast confusion waits
(As doth a raven on a sick-fallen beast)
The imminent decay of wretched pomp.
How happy he, whose cloak and cincture can Hold out this tempest."

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York, brings Liverpool dates to the 14th July, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

The reform bill was strongly opposed in every stage of its progress, though the opposition seem to decrease, in numbers, if the successive votes upon its details are to be taken as the criterion.

The circumstances of the massacre at Newtownbarry, was to be inquired into on the 13th July. It was contemplated to equalize the duty on wines. Mr. Brogham had for the present abandoned his bankrupt court bill. Lord John Russell has been honored with the freedom of the city of London. Sir Walter Scott was dangerously ill. The trade of Liverpool was remarkably brisk.

FRANCE.

It is reported that the French ministry intend to declare in favor of Poland after the elections are completed, and that they will give up and renounce hereditary peerage. These movements have rendered them very popular, and will enable France to assume an attitude worthy of her character and the expectations which the revolution of July 1830 gave birth to.

A proclamation had been circulated by the agents of the dutchess of Berri, in France, from Charles the X. enjoining upon the French to rally round the standard of Henry V. The Carlists were making great exertions to concentrate a force in La Vendee.

*In surveying, called eighty chains.

Great numbers of French people of rank have gone to England, in consequence of which the government enforces the strictest search at the ports. The coins struck in England, for circulation in France, amount to £500,000; 150 Carlists had been arrested in Paris.

The governments of England and France are about to apply themselves seriously to the adoption of measures for the suppression of the slave trade.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian deputation, charged with the definitive offer of the crown to prince Leopold, had arrived in London. In their passage through the towns of Flanders, they were every where enthusiastically received by the people.

RUSSIA AND POLAND.

The cholera is spreading over Europe. It had appeared at Twer, Jaroslavl, Nesbury, Novogorod and in the government of Witpsh. The defeat of general Rudiger is confirmed. The death of Constantine is considered a fortunate event in Poland.

SPAIN.

A Spanish army of 20,000 men has been ordered to the frontiers of Portugal.

INSURRECTION OF THE BLACKS.

We shall proceed to lay before the readers of the Register, all the additional particulars which have reached us since our last, on the subject of the insurrection in Southampton county, Virginia; and we are happy to inform them that, through the energetic measures adopted by the executive, and the prompt and efficient steps taken by the authorities of the neighboring counties in that state, those in North Carolina, and by the officers and men of the army and navy of the United States on the Norfolk station—the insurrection has been completely put down; all of the negroes engaged in it, with the exception of two or three, being either killed or captured. Those who had, up to the latest advices, eluded the vigilance of their pursuers could not much longer escape, and have ere this doubtless been taken. There seems to be some discrepancies in the several accounts as to the origin or object of this bloody movement among the blacks. A letter from Winton, N. C. in the vicinity of the disaffected district, states that from the best information then in possession of the writer, three white men and four slaves, the latter the property of a gentleman by the name of Travers, rose upon him about an hour before day on Monday morning, the 22d ult. and killed him and every other white member of his family—thereupon proceeded to the residence of Mrs. Catharine Whitehead, a lady of wealth, and murdered her and all the white members of her family, in all seven persons. The cries of Mrs. Whitehead and her family brought to their assistance a near neighbor, Mr. Williams, who found Mrs. W. butchered with an axe, her son, (a minister of the gospel), with his head severed from his body, and a young lad lying dead in the fire place of her chamber. Mr. Williams immediately returned to his own dwelling; but before he reached it he met one of his negro boys coming with the horrible tidings, that the fiends had been there, and murdered his wife and children in his absence!

The Norfolk Herald states that it originated in the party of whites and blacks alluded to above—that they were mere marauders bent on plunder; but having steeped their hands in human sacrifice, became infuriated, and like blood hounds, pursued the game of murder, in mere wanton sport. As they followed their desolating career from family to family, they pressed all the negro men whom they found into their ranks, and thus accumulated a force of between one and two hundred.

A more recent account from Winton, N. C. states that the insurrection commenced with, and was arranged by, four negro preachers, who had been permitted to hold their meetings by day and by night, and who sought these opportunities to poison the minds of the slaves. A slave of Mrs. Whitehead, who was one of these preachers, commanded the blacks at Parker's old fields, where one of the skirmishes occurred; and after being repulsed he returned home and pleaded that he had been pressed into the ranks of the negroes; but being recognised by some gentleman from Southampton, as the leader of the gang mentioned above, a party of ten mounted militiamen from North Carolina, who repaired to Mrs. Whitehead's to view the havoc which these wretches had made, on being assured of the fact, fired on him, and he fell dead near the remains of his mistress.

The writer of the Winton letter states that the number of victims had been reduced to 55, many heretofore supposed to have been murdered, being secreted in the woods and subsequently found.

The troops from Norfolk, Richmond, fortress Monroe, and other remote places, had returned to their respective residences. The marines and seamen under commodore Elliot, from the U. S. ships Natchez and Warren, had also returned to their vessels. The leaders of the insurrectionary band were nearly all taken prisoners or killed. The general feeling and conduct of the slaves in the neighboring states, seem to indicate that there was no concert. A full disclosure had been made by a negro by the name of Tom, who was badly wounded and expected to die; he, however, is on the recovery. The editor of the Norfolk Herald, who is a very discreet and sound judging gentleman, inclines to the opinion that the insurrection did not rest, on any previous combination, and maintains that this is evident from the small number of adherents which the ring-leaders, with all their threats and persuasions, were enabled to enlist in their cause. The slaves, he affirms, throughout the country are generally well affected and even faithful to their masters. He relates the following instance of fidelity in the slaves of one gentleman whose house was attacked; remarks that he gives the story as it was related to him, and it true, "Great indeed will be the desert of those noble hearted Africans."

"A pleasing instance of this is said to have occurred while the black demons of slaughter were executing their horrid work. Before they had received any considerable increase, and in the early stage of their butcheries, they approached the dwelling of Dr. Mount, with the fell purpose of murdering him and his family, when they were met by the doctor's own servants, who resolutely opposed their entrance, declaring that they would lose every drop of blood in defence of their master and family. The brigands still persisting, a battle ensued in which they were finally routed, leaving one of their party and two horses behind them."

On the night of the 23d ult. the Southampton militia had three skirmishes with a gang of from 40 to 50 negroes, the latter retreating each time. In one account it is stated, that one of the militia, of the name of Pope, was killed, in another that the whites sustained no loss whatever. The negroes made three attempts to cross the bridge at Belfield, but were repulsed each time by a party of militia who were stationed on the opposite side with a piece of artillery. A party of 4 militiamen, who had been sent to reconnoitre the blacks, came up with a party of about 20 of them, and after a sharp engagement, succeeded in killing three or four, and taking several prisoners, when the remainder fled. The great object of the negroes, after the rallying of the militia, appeared to be to reach the Diamond Swamp, but such was the vigilance of the former that nearly every one was either shot down or captured. Many of the blacks were well mounted, and armed with bid and other guns, and axes. The roads were strewn with the corpses of the negroes killed, and up to the 25th ult. neither these nor the corpses of the unfortunate whites had been buried; arrangements were, however, making for their interment.

The different accounts are conflicting as to the number of negroes killed, and, indeed, under the circumstances in which they have been written, it is not to be wondered that they should be so.

We gather from letters published in the Richmond Whig of the 29th ultimo, the following statements. A letter from the senior editor of that paper, who is on the spot, states that the number of the insurrectionary negroes had been greatly exaggerated, but that it was hardly within the power of rumor itself to exaggerate their atrocities: whole families, father, mother, daughters, sons, sucking babes and school children, were butchered by them, thrown into heaps, and left to be devoured by hogs and dogs, or to putrify on the spot. At Mr. Levi Wallers, his wife and ten school children were murdered—he himself was absent, but approaching while the dreadful scene was acting, was pursued and escaped with difficulty into a marsh. How, or with whom, the insurrection originated, is not certainly known. The prevalent belief is, that on Sunday the 14th ult. at Barnes' church, near the Cross Keys, the negroes who were observed to be disorderly, took offence at something, and that the plan was conceived and matured in the course of the week. At Mr. Wallers' one child escaped from the ruthless fangs of these monsters by concealing herself in the fire place, and another was found alive who was badly wounded and left for dead by them. He has accompanied his letter with a list of the killed, amounting to 62, but it is not yet ascertained to be correct. He thinks that the insurgents never exceeded 60, and that twelve well armed and resolute men were competent to have quelled them at any time.

Gen. Eppes, who is in command of the troops, reports under date of the 28th ult. that all the insurgents except Nat Turner, the leader, had either been taken or killed. On the 29th Gen. Broadnax reports to the governor that all was quiet and free from visible marauders; he thinks all have been killed or taken except four or five. He states that Nat, the ringleader, who calls himself general, and pretends to be a Baptist preacher, declares to his comrades that he is commissioned by Jesus Christ, and proceeds under his inspired directions—that the late singular appearance of the sun was the sign for him—he is not taken, and the account of his being killed at the affair of the bridge is not correct. The general thinks "that there has existed no general concert among the slaves—circumstances impossible to have been feigned, demonstrate the entire ignorance on the subject of all the slaves in the counties around Southampton, among whom he has never known more perfect order and quiet to prevail." He believes "that at any time 20 resolute men could have put them down."

He compliments, in terms of strong approbation, "the admirable conduct and spirit of the militia, who have every where turned out with the utmost promptitude, and given the most unquestionable evidence of their ability, instantly and effectually to put down every such attempt. The families who had sought safety by flight had generally returned to their homes."

MR. BRANCH'S EXPOSITION.

From the Roanoke Advocate.

Enfield, August 22, 1831.

DEAR SIR: Of the causes which led to the dissolution of the late cabinet, I have never entertained a doubt. I will briefly state the reasons I have for my opinion, and leave you to judge of them as well or ill founded. Before the president had nominated major Eaton for the war department, and while the subject might be supposed to be under consideration, I took the liberty of stating to gen. Jackson candidly my reasons for believing the selection would be unpopular and unfortunate. I reminded the president that he knew I was the friend of major Eaton, and personally preferred him to either of the others proposed for his cabinet, and, of course, nothing I should say on the subject ought to be construed into an intention to injure him, (maj. Eaton), but, on the contrary, to save him from infinite vexation and annoyance, which, it was too plain, were in store for him, if he took a seat in the cabinet under the circumstances in which he was placed. The president admitted that charges had been made against the character of Mrs. Eaton, but insisted on it they were slanders, and that he ought not to notice them. I did not perceive at the time that he was hurt by the frankness or nature of my communication, though I afterwards learned that he had become offended with, and had discarded from his acquaintance several of his old and best friends who had used the like freedom of speech on this subject. My remonstrances, it is known, were without effect, and maj. Eaton was soon after formally appointed secretary of war. Before this was done, however, I made an appeal to major Eaton himself, and without reserve disclosed my apprehensions to him, adding that I did not pretend to intimate that there was the least truth in these reports, but, if utterly false, they would still have an effect on the president's peace and quiet, as he must know what use the opposition would make of it—that I believed it was impossible, he could be willing to subject gen. Jackson to such a state of things—that he could not have forgotten how much gen. Jackson had been distressed by the calumnies and ill reports which had been formerly circulated about Mrs. Jackson:—that, since the death of that lady, those reports had subsided, and would soon be heard of no more:—that general Jackson knew the same kind of reports and imputations had prevailed with respect to Mrs. Eaton:—that if he (major Eaton) entered into the cabinet, the enemies of the president would not fail to make a handle of it, and thus revive, in the general's bosom, recollections which could not be but painful and distressing, and which could not fail to disturb the tranquility and usefulness of his administration. My remarks were received apparently with the same kindness and courtesy which characterized my manner; but they no doubt laid the foundation of that hostility which afterwards became active and unextinguishable. From the moment of major Eaton's appointment, gen. Jackson began to use his utmost efforts to bring Mrs. Eaton into public favor and distinction. He frequently spoke of the neglect Mrs. Eaton received when she attempted to appear at public places. He did not fail to intimate that it would be a most acceptable service rendered him, if the members of his cabinet would aid in promoting this object. I felt greatly embarrassed by such appeals to myself. It was impossible for me to comply with his wishes on this point, but it was, nevertheless, painful for me to say so. In any other matter [in] which I could, with a proper respect for myself and the feelings of my family, have complied with an intimation of his desire, no one would have done so more cheerfully than myself. By way of diverting his mind, I several times spoke of the difficulty he would experience in attempting to regulate the intercourse of the ladies that they were, in matters of that kind, uncontrollable and omnipotent; that he would find less difficulty in fighting over again the battle of New Orleans. Soon after it was ascertained that Mrs. Eaton could not be received into the society of the families of the members of the cabinet, major Eaton's conduct to me discovered an evident change in his friendly feelings, and became cold, formal and repulsive. I repeatedly threw myself into his company, and endeavored to assure him that I still had the most sincere desire to be on friendly terms with him, and wished for opportunities to convince him of the sincerity of my professions. In this course there was no guile—no view but that which my words fairly imported.

I most sincerely regretted the state of public feeling towards Mrs. Eaton, but it was not within my power to control or soften it. It was a sentiment resting in the breast of the female community of Washington city and the nation, which was not to be suppressed or obliterated. After this, major Eaton's enmity to myself became every day more and more apparent. I could hear frequently of declarations to this effect, and of his determination to be revenged. It is true these reports came to me circuitously and indirectly, but I could not, from circumstances, doubt their truth.

At length came the mission by col. Johnson, the substance of which has already been given to the public by Messrs. Ingham and Berrien. I will only add to their statements that I distinctly understood col. Johnson to say that he came to us from the president of the United States, authorized by him to hold the interviews; and unless our difficulties in reference to Mrs. Eaton could be adjusted, that Mr. Ingham, judge Berrien, and myself must expect to retire. When he closed his remarks, I well recollect rising from my seat, and with an earnestness of manner which the extraordinary character of the communication was so well calculated to produce, observed, among other things, that no man had a right to dictate to me and my family in their domestic relations, and that I would submit to no control of the kind. The colonel undertook to reason the matter with us, by observing that although it might be impracticable to establish intimate and social relations between our families and Mrs. Eaton, he could see no reason why she should not be invited to our large parties, to which every body was usually invited, Tom, Dick, Harry, &c. With this concession, he said, the president would be satisfied. We protested against the interference of the president in any manner or form whatever, as it was a matter which did not belong to our official connexion with him. Soon after which, col. Johnson expressed his deep regret at this failure of his mission, and we separated.

I waited until Friday, a day having intervened, in expectation of hearing from the president, but receiving no message, I walked over, in hopes that an opportunity would offer to put an end to my unpleasant state of feeling. I found the president alone. He received me with his wonted courtesy, though evidently but ill at ease. In a few minutes the absorbing subject was introduced. Among other things, he spoke in strong language of the purity of Mrs. Eaton's character and the baseness of her slanderers, and presently mentioned a rumor which he said had been in circulation, of a combination to exclude her from society. Several parties, he said, had been recently given, among others, three by Mr. Ingham, judge Berrien, and myself, to which she had not been invited; and from this it was strongly inferred that we had combined to keep her out of society. I told him, that, so far as I was concerned, I believed my family were doing no more than the members of congress, the citizens of Washington, and visitors to the seat of government, had a right to expect from me as a member of his cabinet. It was certainly in accordance with universal custom; and that, as to a combination, I knew of none; that I could never acknowledge the right of any one to interfere in matters affecting the private and social arrangements of my family; and that, before I would be dictated to, or controlled, in such matters, I would abandon his cabinet, and was ready to do so whenever he desired it, and added several other strong remarks of a similar character. He assured me, in reply, that he did not desire it; that he was entirely satisfied with the manner in which I had discharged my official duty, and that he did not claim the right to dictate to us in our social relations, but that he felt himself bound to protect the family of major Eaton, as he would mine under similar circumstances. I then informed him that col. Johnson had formally announced to Mr. Ingham, judge Berrien, and myself, that it was his intention to remove us from office for the cause mentioned, and I had learned from Mr. L. the evening before, who derived his information from the colonel, that he had gone so far as to make temporary arrangements for the departments, viz: Mr. Dickens for the treasury, Mr. Kendall for the navy, and some one else for attorney general. This the president denied, and said he would send for colonel Johnson, and for that purpose called for a servant. When the servant came, I observed it was unnecessary to send for the colonel—his word was sufficient. Well, said he, if you are satisfied. I told him I was. We continued our conversation for some time. I attempted on that occasion, as I had done several times before, to convince him of the impropriety of his interfering at all in a question of such a delicate character, but his feelings were evidently too much enticed to weigh any reasons which might be offered.

I have already informed the public that no paper was presented to me, or read to me, or alluded to, having reference to the future conduct of the members of the cabinet. On this head I cannot be mistaken. I may add, that the president constantly insisted on the necessity of harmony among the members of the cabinet. Here I cannot refrain from a remark upon this injunction of the president, that major Eaton was the only dissatisfied member of the cabinet, the only one who carried complaints to the president of the conduct of others—the only one who employed his efforts to bring us to discredit with the public or the president. Among the others the utmost civility and sociability prevailed. No one annoyed him, (major Eaton), or made any effort to embarrass the operations of his department or in any manner acted towards him as inimical, or deficient in respect; and yet, we are to be punished for the discordances of the cabinet. Can any decision be more arbitrary and unjust?

A few days after this interview with the president, col. Johnson came into the navy department, and as he entered I rose to receive him. With his wonted cordiality of manner he expressed his satisfaction at the pacific aspect of our relations. I observed to him, with a smile, that the president denied having authorised him to make such a communication as he had made. He goodhumoredly replied, "Let it pass; I presented it to you in the most favorable light;" and, as he was hurried, here the conversation ended.

About the same time I had an interview with major Eaton, in the presence of judge Berrien and major Barry. This was brought about by the president. Major Eaton, it seems, had complained to him, either directly or indirectly, that at a party given by my family, the last of September or the first of October, 1829, to the family of a most estimable friend and relation of mine, from Nashville, Tennessee, who was on a visit to Washington city, the rev. J. N. Campbell, then of that place, now of Albany, N. Y. was among the invited guests. The circumstances were these:—Mr. Campbell who had resided in the city for some years previous to gen. Jackson's inauguration, was the pastor of a church, and such was his reputation, that the president and three members of his cabinet, viz: Mr. Ingham, judge Berrien and myself, took pews, and became regular attendants at his church. In the course of his ministry he formed an acquaintance with my family, and occasionally visited them. He happened there while my friend Hill and his family were with us, contracted an acquaintance with them, and when the party alluded to was given, my daughters invited him. He attended, and took the liberty of carrying with him his friend Dr. Ely, of Philadelphia, who had just arrived. I knew no more of his being invited than of any other person who happened to be present. He was, however, not the less welcome on that account, nor was his friend Dr. Ely. Neither of these gentlemen require a recommendation where they reside. Mr. Campbell is known to be a learned, pious, and most eloquent divine. Some short time after the party, I heard very much to my surprise, that major Eaton and some of his partisans were enraged with me, and threatened my destruction, because Mr. Campbell and Dr. Ely were at my house as above stated. I could scarcely credit the report, until it was mentioned to me by the president, when I emphatically asked him who questioned my right to invite whom I pleased to my house. He testily observed, no person; but as there was some misunderstanding between major Eaton, Mrs. E. and Mr. Campbell, that he, (major E.) thought it evinced hostility to him. At the interview above alluded to, between major Eaton, judge Berrien, major Barry and myself, major Eaton mentioned the circumstances of Mr. Campbell and Dr. Ely being at my house on the occasion referred to. I asked major Eaton in the most frank and friendly manner, if this was his only complaint, and if he would be satisfied provided I convinced him that he was in error, assuring him at the same time, that he had no right to consider me as being under the influence of unfriendly feelings towards him; that, on the contrary, he ought to know, my personal attachment for him, before the cabinet was formed; and, further, if he would obtain the consent of his brother-in-law major Lewis, to read a confidential correspondence which passed between major L. and myself, in the winter of 1827 '28, on this disturbing subject, he would then be convinced of the disinterestedness and correctness of my course, and of its entire conformity to that friendship and good will which had so long subsisted between us. I might have gone further and said, that major Lewis, in the winter of 1827 '28, when there could be no unworthy motive to mislead either of us, considered Mrs. Eaton an unsafe associate for his daughter, although he was now endeavoring to induce gen. Jackson to drive me out of the cabinet, because I would not compel my daughters to associate with her. Major Eaton would not say whether he would be satisfied or not, and the explanation was withheld. But as we were about to separate, he offered me his hand in a more cordial manner than he had done for some months previous. I have no doubt that major Eaton, in tendering his resignation, stipulated for the dismissal of the three offensive members of the cabinet.

Mr. Van Buren, also, I have reasons to believe, urged the adoption of this measure. This gentleman had discovered that the three members of the cabinet, (af(terwards ejected), disdained to become tools to subvert his ambitious aspirations, and he determined to leave them as little power to defeat his orations as possible. It is said to be a part of his character to tolerate politically to one, who will not enter heart and soul into measures for promoting his own aggrandizement: He had become latterly the almost sole confident and adviser of the president. How he obtained this influence might be a subject of curious and entertaining inquiry. But I shall not pursue it. I may add, however, that amongst the means employed, were the most devoted and assiduous attention to Mrs. Eaton, and unceasing efforts to bring her into notice, especially with the families of the foreign ministers.

Finally, when the president found that his efforts to introduce Mrs. Eaton into society proved abortive, he became every day, less communicative, and more and more formal in his hospitalities, until, there could be no doubt, that, as to myself, an unfriendly influence had obtained an ascendancy in his private councils, and the result shows that he had determined to sacrifice me to gratify the feelings of those whom I had offended, as stated above.

I may at some future time add to these views. At present I take my leave, with assurances of great respect and esteem. Yours, &c. JOHN BRANCH.

To Edmund B. Freeman, esq. Halifax town.

P. S. I have not considered it necessary to notice a charge made in the Globe, against Judge Berrien, of suppressing a material part of a letter which I wrote to him, and my substituting another in its stead. If my person has been misled by this bold accusation of the editor of the Globe, and is desirous of obtaining correct information, he has my permission to read the whole letter, although it was not intended to be made public.

POLITICAL ITEMS.

The London Atlas gives a brief notice of the dissolution of our late cabinet, and condenses the whole subject into a very small compass, thus: "The cabinet of the United States is in the fever of disunion. The president had two favorite secretaries, it appears, and of whom he nothing thought. To get rid of the two last he pretended to discharge the first."

The Charleston Mercury of Aug. 1, says—"We commence to-day, and shall conclude to-morrow, the exposition of Mr. Berrien, the late attorney general of the United States, in relation to the causes which produced the dissensions and the dissolution of the late cabinet. It presents a humiliating series of facts well calculated to humble us at home, and to disprove us abroad, and we are constrained painfully to say, to bring the administration of our government into contemnt and reproach. The circumstances thus disclosed are the natural and bitter fruits of the existence of a secret cabal, destitute of all capacity and virtue, owing its origin to intrigue, corruption and favoritism, and exercising, without a just responsibility, all the high functions of government. Mr. Berrien, we conceive, as a man of honor, having a just regard (as he very correctly avows) to the best inheritance he can leave his children, (an unsullied reputation) was compelled by the overruling necessities of self defence to make this disclosure. He has accomplished a most painful task in a manner highly creditable to his ability, integrity, and honor. His narrative bears the stamp not only of the most scrupulous veracity but of the most cautious accuracy of memory, and is sustained throughout by a moderation, dignity, and forbearance, which harmonise, with uncommon felicity, with the elegance, grace, and power, with which, as a literary effort, his communication has been conceived and executed. We refrain, however, from further comment; nor will we longer detain our readers from a portion of our history which they cannot fail to peruse with intense and mortifying interest.

Delegates are being appointed in Pennsylvania to attend the national republican convention at Baltimore.

The "Long Island Patriot" says—"The hon. Martin Van Buren, our envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James, took his departure for England on Tuesday last in the packet ship president. He was attended to the ship by a large number of his friends, and much feeling was manifested by them on parting with him, and consigning so much of worth and talent to the mercy of the elements. He takes with him the sympathies and kind feelings of the people; and if fate should decree him a deep grave in the bosom of the ocean, the affections and the tendered sympathies of an American republic will be buried with him!"

From the Washington Globe. The following extract is taken from the speech of Mr. Mitchell, delivered at the 4th of July celebration, at Charleston:

"Do not mistake me when I speak thus of the Carolina doctrines. I am, and have ever been, through good report and through evil report, without change or deviation, openly and above board, an advocate of state rights, as understood and explained by Jefferson and Madison. I was proud to be a humble disciple in that school when the majority of the delegation with which I then served, denounced them as radical, and Calhoun and Mr. Duffie stigmatised them as the worst and most stupid of all heresies."

From this it appears that Mr. Calhoun and Mr. McDuffie once stigmatised the Virginia and Kentucky doctrines, as expounded in the resolutions written by Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, in vindication of state rights. They now seize on the principles of these resolutions, and seek by a strained construction to make them broad enough for a basis to the new doctrine of nullification. In the introductory remarks to Mr. McDuffie's pamphlet, written to sustain the latitudinarian and consolidating principles then avowed by Mr. Calhoun and himself, the voice which Virginia raised in favor of state rights, is called "the toxin of state sovereignty; a note which has been sounded in the ancient dominion with such an ill-omened blast."

Mr. McDuffie, in these essays, which were written in 1821, not only gives his own faith, but speaks out that of his friend, Mr. Calhoun. He says—"He (Mr. Calhoun) was from the first, a decided advocate of the navy, the bank, internal improvements, internal taxes when necessary, and liberal principles in construing the constitution for great, useful and safe national purposes."

The Quebec Gazette says—"The United States papers are again filled with further correspondence respecting the resignation of the American cabinet. Mr. Berrien, late attorney general, has published notes of an interview with col. Johnson, who acted as mutual friend of the president and the members who resigned, in which the first cause of difference is represented with much detail to be the reputed private conduct of Mrs. Eaton, and in which president Jackson is exhibited as a whimsical, violently passionate old gentleman, insisting with extreme arrogance on subjects altogether out of decorum and common behavior. Whatever may be the truth, and it appears difficult to ascertain it, private or party feeling appears to have deprived the public men in the administration of the affairs of that country of all the tact for which they were celebrated."

At a late meeting in South Carolina, in which Judge Smith, late a senator of the United States, took a leading part, the following preamble and resolution was adopted:

And whereas, the time is fast approaching when the people of these United States will be called upon to re-elect the chief executive magistrate, over our free and happy nation, and as we believe that it is a subject of magnitude and importance to every individual member of our government, that this right and power should be exercised in a manner becoming freemen and republicans, that the voice of the people should be obeyed and their wishes respected, and believing, as we do, that there is a party formed within our state who will pursue measures in relation to this matter contrary to our wishes, and, as we think, in direct opposition to the interests of the great body of the people of South Carolina, that the claim of an individual to that high, distinguished and responsible station, will be urged before the people, an individual whose political course we do not admire, whose political doctrines and opinions we cannot approve, and whose policy, if adopted, would bring ruin and destruction on our happy country; deeply impressed with the importance of these subjects, we, the citizens of Spar-tanburgh district, claim it as our right, and feel it our duty to declare, First, That never in the course of our political history has there been a crisis of more magnitude and importance; nor one which required so much firmness, honesty and political integrity in our rulers, as the present. Second, That though we cannot approve of some of the measures which general Jackson's administration has originated, yet upon the whole, we cordially approve of his nomination for another presidential term, and will use our best endeavors to secure his re-election.

Therefore be it Resolved, That gen. Jackson is the choice of the people of this district.

A planter of easy circumstances, living snugly in the pine land near Poconaligo, has made so good a toast as to be thought worthy of publication. Here it is:—"The constitution of the United States—It has received a severe wound which is full of proud flesh—may the state doctors cut it out with the knife of nullification, and, should they despair of their patient and bleeding be thought necessary, let them use the lancet." That is, in plain language, let the state nollify the tariff law, and if that won't do, draw the sword. It will all come out at last. This sturdy old inhabitant of the pine land knows no disguise—he does not understand saying and unsaying in a breath. He thinks nullification is just what it is, something in the shape of a knife or a lancet. In return we offer him another sentiment:—The constitution of the United States—It has received a wound which is full of proud flesh—call in the quick doctors of nullification, and they will soon convert a curable wound into downright mortification.

[Georgetown, (S. C.) Union.

From the National Journal. In a somewhat mystical article concerning Mr. Mason, who has been appointed secretary of the Michigan Territory, the Globe of Monday contends that he ought not to be removed from office, unless he should commit some act of misconduct, and adds—

"But tell them, it would evince an utter disregard of the plainest dictates of justice, to remove from office a person who has done nothing to deserve it, merely because apprehension was entertained or affected, that he would do wrong."

Nothing can be more unquestionable than the general proposition here laid down. The only surprising circumstance about it is, that it appears in the official organ of the present administration. Looking at it in this view, and reflecting on the removals by wholesale, which general Jackson has made of persons who had "done nothing to deserve" them, we most regard the passage cited as a public confession, by general Jackson, that he has "evinced an utter disregard of the plainest dictates of justice." After such a declaration, his formal renunciation of all pretensions to a re-election may be daily expected.

The Augusta Courier of the 15th inst. says—"We are almost glad Mr. Calhoun is a nullifier. It has made Georgia the most thorough-going state against nullification, in the whole union."

NEW YORK NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

Address of gen. Tallmadge, delivered before the American Institute of the city of New York, at Clinton Hall August, 1831.

New York, August 12, 1831.

Sir—We have been appointed a committee of the American Institute to request for publication a copy of the address delivered by you on the 11th inst, on taking your seat as president of that body.

In making this communication, we cannot avoid expressing our gratification at the sentiments you advanced on that occasion, with so much truth and feeling, and at the course which you pointed out to the institute as most conducive to unanimity and success in its operations. We have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servants,

H. M. WESTERN,
JAMES LYNCH,
DAVID GRAHAM, jr.

Gen. James Tallmadge.

New York, August 12, 1831.

Gentlemen—In compliance with your request, a copy of my remarks addressed to the American Institute, is herewith enclosed. I am, with respect, yours, &c.

JAMES TALLMADGE.
H. M. Western, James Lynch, David Graham, jr. esqs. committee, &c.

GENTLEMEN—Allow me to express to you the obligation which I feel for the honor you have conferred, in selecting me for the presiding officer of "The American Institute of the city of New York."

Permit me also to express my gratification for the very complimentary manner in which your committee communicated to me the information of my election.

This distinguished mark of your favor was unexpected by me, and being conferred by your own voluntary act, considerably enhances the value of the distinction. It commands my utmost efforts to perform the duties of the station—while all my feelings are awakened to reciprocate your generous kindness.

Your committee were pleased to suggest a belief that my acceptance of the place of presiding officer of the American Institute would be beneficial to the purposes of the institute, and especially useful in securing harmony among its members. These considerations have induced me to yield a cheerful compliance with your request.

The act of the legislature declares you were incorporated "for the purpose of encouraging and promoting domestic industry, in this state, and in the United States, in agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the arts. In thus declaring the purpose of this incorporation, the legislature have explicitly defined your powers, and marked out your duties. Any purpose not within the purview of this incorporation, must consequently here be illegal and improper. Allow me to disclaim for myself, and according to my hope and belief for the members of this institute, all intention to pervert its purposes to political objects; and further, to avow that any such object cannot have my participation. The legitimate purpose of this institute is so noble, and so important, it must not be degraded as an instrument for other ends.

The sentiments entertained by this association have long been cherished by me; and my efforts on various public occasions have heretofore been devoted to their support.

It is matter of considerable gratification that I am enabled to come among you as a practical agriculturist.

In the theory of expanded reason, of free interchange of the products of different countries, would naturally become the principle of national intercourse, and the basis of commercial regulations. It has ever been the enlightened policy of our government to hold out to other countries a just reciprocity in commercial regulations. But narrow views and objects of selfish aggrandizement, have rejected the offers of such a system of liberal policy, and thereby compelled our government to resort to countervailing duties as a just encouragement to the domestic labor of the country, and as a mean of national defence. It is therefore, on our part, a measure of necessity, not of choice. Hence the inconsiderate folly of those who prate about the abstract propositions of "free trade," and "the burthening the many for the benefit of the few." But there is a great consolation in the truth, demonstrated by experience, that such has been found the irrepressible spirit of the American character, and the productive genius of American industry, that protected articles have been uniformly supplied to the consumer at a cheaper rate.

It is a balm of consolation and will be a circumstance considerably in mitigation of the imaginary violation of rights, that the system of encouragement of domestic labor, has provided articles of home production at a reduced price to the consumer, while it has exhibited our country in a condition of improvement and prosperity without a parallel in the annals of mankind.

Had the early protection which was given to cotton, and cotton fabrics, and which has reduced their price to less than one half to the consumer, been at the same time extended to wool and woollens, it would have produced some arrangement by which our ships could have taken out our own products as an equivalent for foreign merchandise, or, as a consequence, our hills would long since have been animated with abundant flocks; the shuttle and the loom would have resounded in the valleys; agriculture would have found a ready market for its abundant products, and commercial enterprise would have been put in greater requisition to supply the materials for manufacture, and bear the products to foreign markets.

This system of encouragement and protection, and which sprung from necessity as a measure of self defence, has been recognized and adopted by every administration since the adoption of our constitution; and has now become the settled policy of our country. It may be fairly assumed that no administration can heretofore abandon it: While a just and proper modification of the system and the application of its details to the ever-varying times and peculiar circumstances of the country, has become a necessary duty of the statesman and the patriot. They will always remember what enemies realize; that every manufactory erected in our land, is a fortress in defence of agriculture, and in support of commerce.

When we read of the reduction of wages, and the consequent distress and risings of the populace of the manufacturing towns in England, and of their suppression by military force, we do but read of the injuries inflicted abroad, by the encouragement of our own domestic labor.

When we wipe the tear from the eye of sympathy, and cast a look upon the condition of oppressed and afflicted Ireland, we shudder with emotions of horror and pity, to learn that there are one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants in the single county of Mayo, now suffering by famine. In another county more than three thousand human beings encamped on the sea shore gathering sea weed for food; while their criminal courts are busied in the prosecution of necessitous beings for the crime of endeavoring to sustain life in themselves, and their famishing offspring, by the "bleeding of cattle!" The fountains of our grief are not even dried up by the reflection that those are the subjects of that government which refuse to receive our bread stuffs on equal terms for their manufactures, while they exact an annual income of about thirteen millions of dollars for taxes upon the admitted importation of American tobacco.

Under circumstances of such complicated error and abuse, there is no cause to envy the feelings of that man blessed with an American birth, who can clamor against his own government, about "free trade," and by withholding just encouragement and protection to domestic industry reduce the freemen of this country, to an unequal competition with the mendicant mobs of Europe, suffering without liberty and without bread.

The encouragement of domestic production should command the attention, and will be the sphere of the more immediate usefulness of this institute. It will be my endeavor, and my happiness, at all times to aid your efforts in a purpose so commendable, and so replete with public benefit.

LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

The following memorial presented by Mr. Porter, of the house of representatives of the state of Louisiana, on the part of the joint committee, appointed to draft a memorial and remonstrance to congress, against the repeal of the duties on foreign brown sugars imported into the United States, was unanimously adopted by both houses of the legislature.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled:—

The general assembly of the state of Louisiana, have learned with considerable surprise, and regret, and some alarm, that a resolution, having for its object to reduce the duty on foreign brown sugar, has been considered during the present session of congress, by a majority of the house of representatives as a proper subject of inquiry. With the motives of this resolution, the people of Louisiana have no concern, but its effects, should it ripen into a law, cannot be mistaken. It will give a fatal blow to their prosperity. It consequently involves a question, to them of the most perilous import. Nothing less than the destruction of half the capital of the state, and the total ruin of a large majority of those who have embarked their fortunes in the cultivation of cane, and the manufacture of sugar. They cannot believe that a measure fraught with so much injustice to them, and bringing with it no corresponding benefit to the other sections of the union, will receive the sanction of your honorable body. But the number of votes assenting to the proposed inquiry shows, that a great misapprehension must exist in the minds of many members of congress on this subject. To produce sounder views in relation to it, is one object of this memorial.—And if the general assembly of Louisiana fail in the attempt, they have another. They desire at present a solemn remonstrance against the injustice threatened to the state they represent. This is the only mode of defence open to them. Should the proposed inquiry be followed up by a law, corresponding in character and spirit, the people of this state have not the power to resist it, and their devotion and attachment to the union are too great to permit such a measure, even could they do so with success. This true exposition of their feelings will not, they hope, diminish the weight of their remonstrance. They trust that the time is distant, when concessions will be made to threats and violence; and justice refused to those, who address the councils of the union, in the language of respect and affection. The general assembly cannot refrain from the expression of their astonishment that the manufacture of sugar should be singled out as the object of such persevering hostility in congress, while other objects of national industry, protected by duties, are left unnoticed, or assailed with less zeal. They know nothing of the circumstances by which this branch of industry was first created in the United States, and they are unequipped with any thing in the influence it exercises on the comfort or wealth of their sister states which justifies this invidious distinction. They trust that there is not, nor has been, any thing in the conduct of the people of Louisiana which authorizes it. They have been true to the union, and to their duties at all times; in peace, and in war. To those unacquainted with her history, it might appear as if something therein had rendered Louisiana obnoxious to her sister states. A stranger would find it otherwise difficult to account for a proposed legislation which would be at once partial, and oppressive: One which contemplates leaving them subject to the duties imposed on all other articles of home manufacture, while it deprives them of a market for the productions of their own soil; or if it has not precisely that effect, at least expose them to a ruinous competition with the foreigner in selling, and refuses them the benefit of that foreigner's competition with the home manufacturer in those objects they are compelled to purchase.

The general assembly are not to be understood in these remarks, as complaining of the duties by which other branches of industry are protected; but it is proper to recall to the recollection of congress, the causes which first induced the inhabitants of Louisiana, to enter on the cultivation of sugar cane. A slight historical retrospect, will prove that it was in a great measure, an involuntary direction of their industry. The general government, if it did not compel them to the pursuit, invited them to attempt it. When congress first resorted to this production as a means of revenue, the capital of the planter on the banks of the Mississippi, was principally employed in the cultivation of maize, rice and cotton, which afforded him a fair profit, without the necessity of incurring heavy debts to construct the establishments and provide the machinery requisite to the cultivation and manufacture of the cane. The high price of sugar in the West India islands, at that time, increased by the duty imposed on it, coming into the United States, offered to our citizens a temptation to turn their labor into other channels. A few attempts were made. They were not very successful, but were sufficient to induce a hope that in future time, with increased experience, and more capital, something beneficial might be accomplished. From every quarter of the union, this attempt to render the republic independent of foreign nations, in an article now become a necessary of life, was hailed with satisfaction, and the planter, deluded by the apparent universal acquiescence in the policy of encouraging him, entered more largely into business, and incurred heavy debts to extend the culture. Until the close of the late war, however, [and for some time after], the cultivation was comparatively limited, and had the government then changed its policy, no extensive injury would have been inflicted on the state. But at that time the subject was taken up by congress, and instead of diminishing the duty, they augmented it. They substituted the principle of protection, to the wants of the exchequer; and expressly embodied the article of sugar among the objects to which it should be applied. A conviction was thus forced on the minds of all men in this section of the union, that higher and more extended views than the mere collection of revenue, entered into the consideration of the people of the United States. It was believed here, that it was regarded by our sister states, as a matter of great national policy to raise the article within ourselves, and until the time should come when we could successfully compete with more favored regions, in the production of sugar, the home market would be secured to us. Under the conviction thus produced by opinions which the people of Louisiana did not, and could not, control, hundreds embarked their whole fortunes in the business. Capital to the amount of about 6,000,000 dollars, it is believed, is now due by planters; and for which their property is under mortgage. Thus they are burdened with debts to an amount which, under the most favorable circumstances, it will take years to discharge; and all are placed in a situation which forbids a change of pursuit, without a loss, arising from the adaptation of their buildings, machinery and plantations to the culture of cane, amounting to nearly half their capital.

It will, therefore, not appear surprising to congress, that the people of this state should feel deeply sensible to the attempt now made to bring ruin upon them, for following up the views, and adopting the policy which their fellow citizens of the other states pointed out to them. The destruction of a vested right to property, would not be a more direct violation of good faith; for it is conceived, there is little or no difference in taking from the citizen that which he has acquired under the laws, and made his, or in legislating in such a manner as tempts him to embark in expensive speculations, by an implied promise of protection, and then, by a sudden change of policy, not merely depriving him of the profit he hoped to gain, but destroying the capital, which, through the faith of government, he embarked in the enterprise.

The general assembly understands that the most exaggerated ideas pervade the minds of the citizens of other sections of the union, respecting the profits which the sugar planters of Louisiana realize from the cultivation of the soil. It the misapprehensions which prevail on this subject, be as extensive as there is reason to believe, it affords some explanation of the vote of those who have sought to reduce these profits. This assembly can with great truth, however, assure your honorable body, that all ideas of this kind, which proceed on the assumption that the sugar plantations of Louisiana have yielded, for the last fifteen years, or can be expected to yield for the same space hereafter, more than six per cent. profit on the capital employed, are fallacious and unsound. Some of them, with soil peculiarly adapted to the culture, fortunately located, and skillfully managed, do give more. Others not possessing such advantages, afford less. Nearly all, in seasons well adapted for raising and manufacturing the cane, give a large profit. Last season the crop was good, and the profit fair. The year preceding, a great number did not pay more than their expenses; some not so much. There is little probability that the future will differ from the past. All agricultural pursuits are uncertain, because they depend on the seasons for success. But when the productions of the tropics are attempted to be forced in latitudes not congenial to them, this uncertainty is cruelly increased. The planter of Louisiana has not only to run the same risks with other cultivators, viz: too much rain, or drought—but he is exposed to the casualty of losing by premature frosts, tornadoes, and crevasses, the whole fruits of his labor. After the agricultural labors of the year are finished, a mild autumn and winter, by which the cane can stand uninjured in the field, while the manufacture of it into sugar is progressing, is indispensable to the planter's complete success. An early frost last year, in a single night, diminished the crop probably one-fifth. This example is not a solitary one: for the last twenty years, it is a correct statement of what has occurred two years in five; and in many this injury has been more extensive than that of last year.

The exaggerated statements which have been circulated on this subject, the legislature are sorry to say, have sometimes originated at home; but the source of these delusions is well understood here, and excites no other feeling but pity for the authors, and regret for the unhappy influence their misstatements exercise on our interests abroad. They can be almost invariably traced to one cause; the cupidity of speculators, who are anxious to attract purchasers for their lands. The information which has been furnished the preceding year, from various parishes of this state, in reply to the circular of the secretary of the treasury, gives a faithful account of the profits made on the sugar estates; and carries with it internal evidence of the truth. It is however unnecessary to produce detailed statements and arithmetical calculations, to show the unfounded character of the representations of the profits of sugar estates. The single reflection that Louisiana has an extent of soil, and a slave population capable of producing double the quantity of sugar she now does, and that she does not do it, is conclusive! It cannot be believed for one moment, that if the sugar planters had been making the immense profits spoken of for the last twenty years, that the cotton planter would not have changed his pursuits, to participate in the more lucrative culture of his neighbor. Not only the cotton planters of our own state, but the extensive slave holders of the adjoining states, would have rushed into this business. No one will imagine that they would have been content all this time with the moderate return yielded by their cotton farms, with the prospect before their eyes of inordinate profits made by those following a different agriculture.

But if the condition of Louisiana was as flattering as those who are pleased to think so, state, far from stirring up feelings of envy and exciting a disposition to reduce her profits, it should only produce pleasure in the mind of the statesman, because he cannot but see in it an increase of national wealth, by which the whole union is benefitted. An opinion, the general assembly understand, is beginning to be cherished in certain quarters, that in looking at the operations of industry in any quarter of the union, it is not to be favored, or rather it is not to be discouraged, if all parts of the republic do not share alike in it. With such a sentiment, the state of Louisiana has no feeling in common. She believes that whatever benefits a part, promotes the interest of the whole, unless the other states are materially injured by the duty on sugar; she thinks it is susceptible of satisfactory proof. She rejoices as much in whatever promotes the wealth of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina, or any other of her sisters, as she would at the prosperity of any portion of herself. Connected with the other parts of the nation, by ties which she hopes may be enduring, she feels that whatever adds to the glory, the wealth, or the strength of the union, and because while it lasts, no increase of prosperity to any one portion of it, can fail to be shared by her, either directly or indirectly.

The general assembly are however unwilling to trust alone to the influence of these sentiments on others. They think they can satisfactorily establish that the industry of their sister states, derives as much support from the duties on sugar, as Louisiana does. They greatly mistake the facts, and they reason most inaccurately from the premises, if there be any branch of trade in the world, in which the benefits of a home market, in all circumstances which render a home market valuable, can be more distinctly traced, or more clearly proved. It is literally (not metaphorically) true, that there is not an acre of land in Louisiana, brought into the cultivation of cane, which does not put in motion an additional plough, shuttle, or hammer, in some other part of the union; and that does not bring more land into cultivation in the western states. We buy every thing but sugar; the farming utensils employed in the cultivation of the soil; the horses and mules that work on it; the food for ourselves, slaves and cattle; the clothing for our negroes; the machinery for our manufactories; the time used in building our houses; the lumber used in their construction and even the shingles that cover them, are in a great proportion brought from abroad. Three-fifths of the products of our soil, go for the purchase of these and other articles which we need not enumerate; and it cannot be doubted that the makers and producers of these, derive as much profit on the capital they employ, as the planters of Louisiana do on the sugar they give in exchange.

This great and beneficial interchange of commodities, has grown entirely out of the sugar produced in this state. With the exception of machinery, there is not one of the articles already mentioned, Louisiana could not prepare for herself. She formerly raised her food, vegetable and animal, in abundance; and all working animals necessary for her own use. Her domestic manufactures supplied with the coarser articles of clothing, to the whole extent of her wants, and she purchased little. She could still do so; indeed, such is the happy position of these states, both as it relates to soil and climate, that there is scarcely one in the union that could not produce enough of the necessities of life, and live without intercourse of a commercial kind, with the other states, if it were desirable for communities to seek nothing further than the bare supply of animal existence. But this assembly thinks that such a state of things is not to be sought for, nor likely to be attained. The land and climate of Louisiana are better adapted to the culture of cane than the production of bread-stuffs, and she raises it. The western states on the contrary, are admirably suited to the growing of all kinds of grain. Each finds its reward in raising those articles which its soil produces in the greatest abundance, and mutually interchanging them. The general assembly are fully convinced that, if congress should destroy the trade by which Louisiana sells to the western states, sugar to the amount of three millions of dollars annually, and buys in return, corn, oats, pork, bacon, horses, mules, lumber, lime, whiskey and machinery, to the same, or a greater amount, that she would inflict a lasting injury on the prosperity of both. They dare to affirm that their sister states on the waters of the Mississippi would be the greatest sufferers. Louisiana could raise provisions for herself, but sugar and molasses, now become almost necessities of life, the western states could not dispense with, except by a serious sacrifice of their comforts. If they purchase them, they would be compelled to do so, without the home market by which they are now enabled to pay for them; and whether a small diminution in the price of sugar, [supposing such a diminution to ensue] would compensate for the complete destruction of this home market, is a question, which those most interested in it, can best answer.

The same course of reasoning, with some slight modifications, applies to our trade with the northern and middle states; they have in us, a sure and steady market for a variety of their productions, which is constantly increasing, in which they have no foreign competition, and in which they are secure against the caprice and injustice of foreign regulations, which so often affect those concerned in the shipping trade. The value of the productions of the northern and middle states, brought here annually, is not less than two millions of dollars.

Although Louisiana does not buy from the southern states, articles produced by their industry, as she does from the other portions of the union, still this assembly believes that there is no section of the United States more directly interested than the slave holding states are, in the maintenance of the duty on sugar; or who, this day, reap a richer harvest from it. It is the production of this article in Louisiana, which gives the actual value to slave property. The price of those brought here annually, is probably not much less than two millions of dollars; estimating them at the first cost in Virginia, Maryland, and the other states where they are purchased. If this money was withdrawn from the market, the value of the slave could have no other standard than the worth of his labor at home. How much that would be, this assembly cannot say, but if correctly informed, it would not be half that which is now given to that property. This portion of the union, if she succeeds in forcing Louisiana from the cultivation of the cane, will find too late, that sugar will be wanted as formerly, and the means of paying for it will be greatly diminished, when the large amount of money now furnished by Louisiana shall be withdrawn.

The general assembly has not dwelt on these facts, nor entered into this reasoning, for the purpose of instructing other states as to their interests. They are, no doubt, fully competent to judge for themselves. But when Louisiana sees exaggerated accounts of her prosperity are perpetually sounded in the public ear, and jealousies attempted to be excited by representing the duty on sugar as a tax laid on other portions of the union, for her benefit, she is compelled to remind them of the real state of things. If a fair profit be derived from the cultivation of the cane, a small portion of it remains with her; the larger part goes to reward the industry of those who supply her with food, clothing and machinery; or if both derive profit from the trade, and the slaves purchased, it only proves the value of a home market, from which all parties derive benefit, and the nation at the same time draws wealth and strength.

And after all, it is not believed that the duties laid on foreign sugars, augments the price to the consumer in the United States; or if at all, by no means to the amount of that duty. It is a great mistake to suppose that the sugar of the West India islands, could be afforded at present prices, if the competition created by the productions of Louisiana, ceased in the market. That competition withdrawn, the foreign article would rise to the level, to which all objects of commerce reach, viz: that produced by the cost of production, and the mutual wants of the seller and buyer. The price has fallen one half since Louisiana commenced making sugar. In the British West India islands, according to the information possessed, her sugar sells nearly as high as it does in New Orleans. Large capital, as it is well known, has been invested in Porto Rico and Cuba, in this manufacture, with a view to the United States market. Our domestic supply, far exceeding their calculation, leaves them with an unexpected surplus on hand, which they are compelled to dispose of at any price. This market restored to them, the commodity would in a very short period rise to its true value. It is clear that no safe reliance can be placed on obtaining for any length of time, an article of commerce below the price at which it can be produced.

The general assembly have also another representation to make of the evil Louisiana sustains from the culture of cane in those islands. Information has been received here, and is believed to be true, that a method has been discovered and is daily practiced, of avoiding the laws of the United States, and inflicting serious injury on the interests of this state. The cane juice is boiled almost to the point of granulation, and is then introduced into the eastern states, under the name of molasses; from this syrup refined sugar is made, in perhaps nearly as large quantities as could be made from an equal weight of brown sugar. A simple statement of this fact, must be sufficient to show at once, how the revenue of the general government is defrauded, and the prosperity of our citizens sacrificed to the cupidity of foreigners.

If regard too, be had for the condition of the neighboring islands, it cannot escape the sagacity of those who have control over the subject, that the probability is, that some of the finest, will before a distant day, cease to be slave holders. When this happens, like St. Domingo, they will no longer cultivate cane, and the withdrawal of any part of the producers, will naturally enhance the price of the product.

If in time of peace an augmentation of the price of West India sugar would certainly follow the discontinuance of the culture of the cane in Louisiana, how much greater would that augmentation be in seasons of war with any maritime power possessing a naval superiority?

The general assembly might present many other views tending to show the impolicy and injustice of withdrawing the protection of government from the culture of the sugar cane; but they will restrict themselves to the exhibition of only one or two more. That the navigation of the United States, and especially the most important branch of it, that concerned in the coasting and river trade, has been greatly benefited and extended by this cultivation of the cane, cannot be doubted; the amount employed in transportation eastwise, and on the Mississippi and its various tributaries, is very great. Nearly one half of the whole steam boat tonnage of the United States is engaged on the latter theatre. The advantages of this domestic navigation, great as they are in cherishing and stimulating a trade at home free from all foreign competition, are not limited to commerce. It adds to the general security, and that especially of Louisiana in a period of war. Without the steam boats of the Mississippi, the condition of this exposed state, would, at such a time, be extremely hazardous. With them it is perfectly safe in all exigencies; they afford the sure means of bringing rapidly to the defence of New Orleans and Louisiana, the brave and gallant sons of the west.

The legislature of Louisiana has deemed it inexpedient to pursue the suggestions made in this memorial through all the illustrations of which they are susceptible; the wisdom of congress renders it unnecessary, and the last consideration deemed material to bring under their notice, will be briefly touched on, and dismissed. If the planting capital of Louisiana be driven from the cultivation of cane, it must seek occupation in some other pursuit. To no other is our soil and climate so well adapted as that of cotton; and the great additional quantity which our rich land is susceptible of producing, brought into market, could only have the effect of reducing the price below its present great depression, and forcing altogether from its cultivation, the comparatively poor soil on which it is now raised.

The legislature of Louisiana has thus placed before congress, the reasons which she considers of sufficient importance to prevent the repeal of the duties on foreign brown sugar. The great and paramount interests now involved in the measure, will, no doubt, be gravely considered; and above all, the obligations to the people of this state, which good faith imposes, it is hoped and believed, will neither be forgotten, or violated.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM,

OR THE WHOLE MATTER IN A NUT SHELL.

Extract from the address of general Harrison to the Hamilton county (Ohio), Agricultural society.

"Among the objects to be accomplished by the establishment of such societies as yours, gentlemen, one not the least important, is the influence they may exert to procure the enactment of laws which may advance, or the repeal of those which may be considered prejudicial to the interests of agriculture. There are two subjects coming under this description which may possibly require the interference of the society. There is no person, who has turned his attention to the situation of the western country, that does not know how much the prosperity of the agricultural and mechanical interests of this section of it depends on the trade to the Mississippi. We may multiply our means of communication with the eastern ports, as much as we may by means of canals and rail roads; still from this part of the Ohio, and below us, for many of our articles, we must mainly depend on the states of the lower Mississippi. This market will be a good or a bad one, in proportion to their wants or their ability to purchase. Their wants will be in proportion to the increase of their population; and their ability to purchase will depend upon the success of their agricultural pursuits. It is obvious, therefore, that we have a deep interest in whatever concerns their interest. Their prosperity must be our prosperity; their adversity must inevitably bring a correspondent depression upon us. One of the principal articles, (perhaps the most important), of the produce of Louisiana, is sugar. Its cultivation to any considerable extent, is posterior to the cession of the country to the United States. Under the fostering care of our government, which afforded it a protecting duty, it has been greatly extended, producing advantages to the country as well as to the planters. Among the former is the abstraction of a large amount of labor, from the cultivation of other articles which had been produced to an amount beyond the demand. In this way the southern states, particularly the cultivators of cotton, were greatly benefited. While the western states reaped the advantage of an increased demand for almost every article of their agricultural and manufacturing products, and a diminution in the price of sugar, in the last twenty years, of at least three hundred per cent.

Before a sugar manufactory can be put in operation, an immense amount of iron work, machinery and castings, as well as wagons, carts, drays, &c. must be procured. These are purchased at Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, or Louisville. Horses, oxen and a supply of provisions must be obtained; and these are purchased of the western farmer. Sparingly and economically perhaps at first, but always increasing as the cultivation and manufacture progresses. If the enterprise is successful, where are the surplus gains of the planter expended? Who is there in this part of the country so ignorant as not to know, that a large portion of them comes into the pockets of the farmers and manufacturers of the upper western states? As his means increase, the sugar planter makes a more ample provision for the support of his family and laborers; the comforts of the negro are increased, by the allowance of a larger portion of better food. By these additions to the expenses of the planter, the western farmer and mechanic are benefitted. When enabled to obtain better, the planter is no longer contented with the homely furniture of his first establishment. Orders are given for more costly and elegant articles. And on what places are the orders given? Not on London or Liverpool, or even on New York or Philadelphia; but to some city on the Ohio. And this is one, not by any means the least, of the vents for those splendid articles which are poured out in such quantities from the shops of our Wards, Porters, Lehman, Skinners, McAlpins, Lees, James, and hundreds of others. The trade of the lower Mississippi, is peculiarly beneficial to the farmers on the Ohio and its navigable tributaries. From their situation, hundreds, I may say thousands, are enabled to dispose of their products in that distant, but convenient market, without the intermediate sale to a merchant, or the employment of a factor or carrier. They manage the whole matter of transportation and sale themselves; effecting the latter immediately to the consumer upon his plantation, or to the exporter at New Orleans. There is not one that has engaged in this business, that does not know, that it is frequently the want of the means of purchasing, which prevents the planter from buying a whole boat load of provisions rather than a small portion of one; and that if he would take sugar and molasses from the planter, in exchange for his own commodities, he could sell the latter at a higher price, and obtain the former at a cheaper rate than by cash sales. This fact was stated to me a few days ago by an intelligent farmer of my neighborhood, who has for many years been engaged in that trade; and shews that the planter finds great difficulty in disposing of his crops, even at the most reduced prices, and that he is willing to reduce them still lower to obtain the produce of our soil.

If the facts I have stated are true and the deductions I have drawn from them are correct, it would appear very extraordinary that any southern or western man should have supported the proposition to remove the protecting duty, and place the sugar planter of Louisiana precisely on a footing with those of Cuba, in which island all the products of the United States are subject to a most onerous duty, which, in relation to some of them, alone, amounts to prohibition. Apart from the impolicy of taking off the protecting duty, the measure to the people of Louisiana, would be full of injustice. Their cultivation of sugar was commenced under the protection of the duty, and there was nothing that could have indicated any change in the policy which dictated it. Protecting duties are given in every instance where they are necessary to the staples of the other states; to the tobacco of Virginia and Maryland, the hemp of Kentucky, the wool of Ohio, and why not the sugar of Louisiana?

PATRIOTIC RESOLUTIONS.

We so call the following, though, in several matters of principle, we differ entirely from those set forth in them—but they contemplate such proceedings as no republican patriot can disapprove of. We regret the belief that the tariff is either unconstitutional or oppressive, on the south—we think that, in both respects, a great mistake prevails; but every man is entitled to the same freedom of opinion that we entertain—and we shall always stand prepared, with our humble aid, to secure him in that right.

Resolutions adopted at a meeting of "the constitutional state rights and union party of St. John's, Colleton, South Carolina, assembled on Tuesday, the 9th inst.

1. Resolved, That we contemplate, with the most lively anxiety, the existence and probable issue of the angry political excitement which prevails in this state; and that we recognize as the principal cause of our unhappy divisions, the indirect attempt of a certain party to force upon their fellow citizens an highly dangerous political measure, extremely repugnant to the feelings of the latter, and which it is justly believed by them, will be extremely pernicious to the well-being of the commonwealth.

2. Resolved, That we believe the tariff law of 1828, passed by congress for the protection of manufactures, to be unequal and unjust in its operation upon the various sections of the union—that it is oppressive and burdensome upon the south in particular—that it violates the essential principles of equity, forbearance, and compromise, which form the basis of our federal compact, and therefore is unconstitutional—and that it, as a measure of national policy, unwise and impolitic and ought to be repealed.

3. Resolved, That we are willing to oppose it, and have hitherto opposed it, in common with our fellow citizens, by every means which can be employed by the state, consistently with the constitution, and our relations to the other parties to the compact as a member of the union; but that we do not think ourselves justified in opposing it, or any other unconstitutional law, by unconstitutional means.

4. Resolved, That we do not consider the right of a state, to "nullify," or forcibly arrest and make void a law of congress, as a constitutional right, but as a right of "sovereignty" paramount to the constitution, that although such a right might be exercised by a state "in its sovereign capacity," after it shall have recalled to itself those powers which it has delegated to the federal government, and thus have made itself (what no state now is) a perfect sovereign and independent nation, yet such a power evidently cannot be rightfully exercised, so long as a state continues a member of the union, and avails itself of its protection and the benefit of its laws.

5. Resolved, As the opinion of this meeting, that the right of nullification is no where asserted in the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of '98, nor is it by any fair inference deducible from them; that it is expressly disavowed by Mr. Madison, the author of the former, and is no where sanctioned by Mr. Jefferson, the author of the latter;—and that there is nothing in any act or resolution of this state, either in substance or in name, to warrant such a doctrine.

6. Resolved, That, viewing the proposed remedy of nullification, as an highly irregular and unconstitutional measure, and as leading by an inevitable tendency, either to civil war, to disgraceful retreat, or to disunion, we feel ourselves called upon by every motive which can actuate us as citizens, as men, and as heads of families, most earnestly to oppose it, and by every fair and honorable means to prevent its adoption, no matter under what disguise of seducing recommendation it may appear.

7. Resolved, That we deprecate as a great public calamity, the existence of that wide spreading discontent, which it appears to be the policy of some of our citizens to cherish and increase; and which is unapplying establishing an impression on the minds of our people that the government of the union is hostile to their interests, and that the authorities of South Carolina are of themselves sufficient, and are alone willing to preserve our liberties, protect our lives and property, and secure our public happiness.

8. Resolved, That we regard the agency of the two governments (general and state), each operating within its respective sphere, as an essential element towards our political well-being, and that whilst we are resolved to vindicate and preserve the rights of the state from all encroachment, by all proper and constitutional means, we nevertheless think it necessary at this time explicitly to declare, that "we feel a warm attachment to the union, with our sister states, and to the instrument and principles by which we are united; that we are willing to sacrifice to this every thing but the rights of self-government in those important points which we have never yielded, and in which alone we see liberty, safety, and happiness; that, not at all disposed to make every measure of error or wrong a cause of secession, we are willing to look on with indulgence, and to wait with patience, till those passions and delusions shall have passed over, which the federal government have artfully excited, to cover its abuses and conceal its designs—fully confident that the good sense of the American people, and their attachment to those very rights which we are now vindicating, will, before it shall be too late, rally with us round the true principles of our federal compact."—(Jefferson.)

9. Resolved, That our confidence continues undiminished in the disinterestedness, patriotism, firmness, and intelligence, of the chief executive magistrate of the union: that in the manly stand which he has taken against the wasteful expenditure of the public money on internal improvements, and in the pledge which he has given to the American people that the tariff will be reduced to an equitable standard as soon as the public debt shall be paid off, we have the most reasonable ground to hope, that the evils of the mis-called "American System," will soon be corrected, and harmony restored to our distracted country.

10. Resolved, That, cherishing towards our fellow citizens in all parts of the union, the feelings of confidence and cordial good-will, which ought to subsist between brethren of the same great political family, and relying on the like feelings on their part, we are slow to believe, that they harbor against us any settled designs of injustice or injury, or, that they will pursue those designs after they shall have been convinced of their pernicious tendency. We therefore conjure them, by all the sanctions of patriotism, by all the dictates of holy justice, by the feelings of brotherhood, and by the claims of common country—to examine attentively into the effects of a policy, which a small, but well organized party amongst them, is pressing most grievously upon us, for their exclusive benefit; and we call upon them to unite with us, in effecting a repeal of laws, which are considered generally by our citizens to be unconstitutional—which are believed by most to be oppressive in their present operation—which are apprehended by many, as likely to entail upon them future poverty and ruin—and the evils of which, if they be not corrected, may drive our citizens in despair to the adoption of revolutionary measures for redress.

11. Resolved, That we feel towards the president of the United States, the high respect which, as citizens, we ought to entertain towards the chief magistrate of our choice; and that in the exalted station which he occupies, as mediator between rival interests, we rely upon his impartiality and high sense of justice, for an attentive and parental regard of our own.

OTHER RESOLUTIONS, &c.

A very large and respectable number of the state rights and free trade party of Beaufort district, assembled in Coosawathee, on Monday, the 8th inst. came to the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the state rights and free trade party of South Carolina cherishes a warm and proud attachment to the union as framed by their sires—and that they will sacrifice all but liberty, to preserve it.

"Resolved, That the charge that this party entertains designs hostile to the union, is an unfounded and wilful calumny, which even its authors and publishers disavow.

"Resolved, That the conduct of the union party in Charleston, in soliciting the interference of the federal executive in the party differences of this state, and in publishing before the nation the charge of disunion against their fellow citizens, calls loudly for the reprobation of every true Carolinian.

"Resolved, That the course of general Jackson in lending the influence of his name to the purposes of a local party is a condescension alike unworthy of his office and character—and that his indirect menace of the force of the government against the advocates of the "Carolina doctrine" as set forth by our state legislature is an outrage upon the feelings of a sovereign state—and an insult to the freemen of this party, which should be met with a just and lofty indignation."

These resolutions are accompanied by a long preamble, in which we are sorry to discover the following emphatic passages:

"We believe that the legislature of South Carolina, like that of all other sovereign states, has, and of necessity must have, the right of protecting her citizens, in person and property, from grievances and injuries of all kinds which can be worked upon them by their fellow men; and as that body has already declared the tariff an unconstitutional and oppressive grievance, we conceive it their duty to protect us from its effects, by making it penal to enforce it within the limits of this state. This interposition of her sovereignty, we consider an act of protective justice. Nor do we recognize in congress, nor in any power on earth, the right of interfering with this course of internal regulation."

The same No. of the Charleston Mercury which publishes the proceedings of the citizens of Beaufort, contains the following sign in the shape of a communication:

The enforcement of the tariff at a halt!

"Mr. Holmes' bond has not yet been sued. After the resignation of Mr. Frost, the new district attorney, it is said, was directed to consult with the attorney general of the United States, before he proceeded on the bond!! What! is the government of the union at such a stand that it cannot sue on a common custom house bond, without all this advisement and machinery? It surely is not afraid to proceed! If there is this pause in its enforcing an unconstitutional law in its own court, what will be the state of things when the agents of the general government for enforcing federal usurpation are carried into our courts?"

Come, Uncle Sam, go on—exact the penalty of your bond to the last pound—don't hang back—it will lead to unpleasant suspicions. SHYLOCK."

We suppose that the writer of this communication would challenge to mortal combat any one who should insinuate that he is not a friend of the union!

BRITISH SEAMEN IN THE U. STATES.

The following is a copy of an address of the masters of British vessels at New Orleans to the consul of their nation. If the facts are stated fairly—the procedure which they complain of ought to be promptly corrected.

TO GEORGE SALKELD, ESQ.

His Britannic majesty's consul at N. Orleans:

SIR: We, the undersigned commanders of British vessels, in the port of New Orleans, respectfully represent, that we are suffering under grievous imposition, in consequence of a late decision of the city court, respecting the desertion of our crews; whereby we are compelled to pay them, although deserters, according to the tenor of their agreement, their wages up to the time they may think proper to demand them.

We are sensible, that according to the laws of Great Britain, and the contract entered into between seamen and their commanders, that, 1st. No seaman can demand, or be entitled to his wages, or any part thereof until the completion of the voyage. 2dly. That, if any seaman absents himself forty-eight hours from his duty, without leave, he forfeits not only the wages due to him, but his goods and chattels also, to the owner or owners of the vessel to which he may belong. 3dly. That it is contrary to a decision of congress, in which a reluctance to interfere between foreign seamen and their employers is manifested; but which directs the aggrieved to their own courts of justice to seek for redress. 4thly. That such a claim on the part of the crews, is at variance with the judgment of commercial men in this or any other maritime country; and to the opinions of the most eminent judges of past and present day, as they have considered that such a power given to seamen, would be nothing less than a death blow to commerce.

Now, sir, under these circumstances, we beg leave to inform you, that we cannot submit to a decision, the evil effects of which we have already and are daily experiencing. There is scarcely a British vessel now in port, that can muster half her regular crew; consequently the rigging of our vessels is rotting for the want of our crews to refit it—our ships and their cargoes are plundered for want of our men to guard them—our freight are reduced by the enormous price paid for laborers, and our minds constantly harassed by the insolence and disobedience of the few of our crews who remain on board, by threatening us with writs of compulsion for their wages, in the "sealer's court," as they term it, if we even dare rebuke them for their neglect of duty.

We therefore, sir, appeal to you, as the representative of our government, for redress, and beg you to see that justice is meted out to us according to the laws of our country; for we cannot consent that a foreign power should interfere with the internal government of our ships, while the peace of that power remains unbroken by us.

New Orleans, June 22d, 1831.

FAMINE IN IRELAND.

From Cobbett's Register.

A sort of circular has been sent to all the public prints, I suppose from a committee that there is in London for the relief of the poor in Ireland; and a copy of this circular has been sent to me. The picture speaks for itself. The causes we know to be that there are no poor laws, and that the food of the country is out of it. I related once before, that hogs from Ireland, to the amount of nine thousand and some odd, passed through one single turnpike-gate at Speen, near Newbury, in Berkshire, in the single month of June last.—Upon inquiry, I find that just about the same is going on this year. These hogs had been landed at Bristol, where I last year saw about ten thousand hogs and sheep landed in three days. In short, here is the immediate cause of the famine in Ireland. The more distant cause is, there being no law in that country to compel the owners of land to suffer the working people to have a subsistence out of it; and the cause of their being no such law is the first, that our laws have been made by the men not chosen by the people; and the consequence of that has been the want of such laws as would prevent this state of wretchedness.

In these documents, signed by Edmund French, a Roman Catholic bishop, it is stated that fourteen out of fifteen of the land proprietors, both in number and value, are permanent absentees; that is to say, fourteen of them out of fifteen live constantly out of Ireland, and draw away the fruits of the land to spend either in this part of the kingdom or in foreign countries. This is such a state of things as never can exist without producing beggary and famine. The Duke of Devonshire, one of the great whigs, has according to his own statement, made in the house of lords some years ago, the great tythes of twenty parishes in Ireland, consequently he draws away all these great tythes. They may come in different shapes; but it is no matter whether they come in corn, in butter, in bacon, or live cattle; still they come. A drove of hogs, or a flock of sheep, or a bale of bacon, or a barrel of butter, none of these are sent to Devonshire-house; but they are sold here, and the money is paid in at Devonshire-house; and here they are to be eaten by the swarms of idlers assembled in this great place.

The country parts of England and Scotland are drained in like manner; but not in a like degree; and here are the poor laws, which though chipped away by Sturges Bourne's bills and other enactments, still give the working people a claim, and show them the way to prevent actual starvation. I had just closed this article when a friend sent me, at my request, an account of the imports of food from Ireland, during the present year, up to the first of June. It is imperfect; because it only gives an account of the imports in London and Liverpool, leaving out Bristol, Glasgow, and several other places. It is also imperfect in that it does not include bacon and live animals, nor poultry, nor eggs. Here is the account of the imports of the first five months of this year of famine in Ireland:—98,555 quarters of wheat, 311,948 quarters of oats, 10,098 quarters of barley, 540 quarters of rye, 1,556 quarters of beans, 941 quarters of peas, 5,880 quarters of malt, 69,510 loads of meal, 43,398 sacks of flour, 12,605 tivers of beef, 1,408 barrels of beef, 20,088 tivers of pork, 14,327 barrels of pork, 149,639 firkins of butter.

PROGRESS OF THE INDIAN CHOLERA.

From the Englishman's Magazine.

Indian or spasmodic cholera, is a plague of modern origin. It is in its principal symptoms altogether unlike the English cholera, yet many persons not acquainted with the nature of both species, have confounded them. In Hindostan, spasmodic cholera has probably always existed as a comparatively mild climatic disease, affecting at certain seasons of the year a small number of individuals in various parts of the country. But there is no evidence to show that it ever bore the epidemic character until the year 1817. However this question may be disposed of, it is at least certain that the Indian cholera was not entitled to be classed with pestilential scourges of the worst description, previous to the beginning of August, 1817, when it suddenly broke out with unprecedented malignity.

Commencing among the inhabitants of Jessore, a town 100 miles N. E. of Calcutta, in less than a month it travelled along the course of the river to that city, having desolated the intervening villages. Before the expiration of August, the native population of Calcutta were attacked, and early in September the disease was also manifested among the Europeans.

From January to May, 1818, the pestilence raged with extreme violence, extending its destructive influence across Bengal, from Silhet to Cuttack; and towards the interior, from the mouth of the Ganges to its confluence with the Jumna, a space including 450 square miles.

Leaving Bengal, the disease retired for some time to the western bank of the Ganges and Jumna. In its most malignant form it appeared at Benares, where in two months 15,000 persons perished. At Allahabad forty or fifty died daily. To other locations situated on either bank the disease soon spread, and the mortality was equally great. In the district of Gorakhpore 30,000 were carried off in a month. Then suffered in succession Lucknow, Cawnpore, Delhi, Agra, Muttra, Meerat and Bareilly.

Between the 6th and 7th of November the epidemic had reached the grand army, which, on the approach of the Pindarwarra, had been concentrated at Jubbulpore, Mundellah and Sauger, under the command of the marquis of Hastings. It consisted of 10,000 troops, and 80,000 followers. To the different divisions of this force the cholera proved more fatally effective than could the shot of the enemy in a well contested field. In twelve days nearly 9,000 men had fallen to rise no more. At this time the thermometer ranged from 90° to 100° Fahrenheit. The heat was moist and suffocating, and the atmosphere a dead calm. The progress of the cholera in the centre division of the army was as follows:—After creeping insidiously for a few days among the lower classes of the camp followers, it seemed instantaneously to gain fresh vigour, breaking out with irresistible force in every direction. Previous to the 14th it had overspread the camp, sparing neither age nor sex in the indiscriminating violence of its attack. The old, and the young, the European and the native, fighting men and camp-followers were alike selected, and all equally sank within its death-grasp. From the 11th to the 20th, the mortality had become so extensive that the stoutest hearts were yielding to despair. The camp wore the aspect of a general hospital. The medical officers, night and day at their posts, were no longer able to administer to the numerous sick who continued to pour in from every quarter.

The cholera now directed its course across the Deccan, advancing, in many instances, at the rate of fifteen or eighteen miles a-day, and remaining at various posts during a period of from two to six weeks. In this way it reached Hussenabad, where the mortality was frightful for several days. It then followed to the banks of the Nerbuddah to Tanah, and afterwards traversed to Aurangabad, Ahmednugger, and Poonah. Taking the direction of the coast, it arrived at Bombay, August, 1818, having crossed the Indian peninsula in twelve months from the date of its appearance in Calcutta.

We have thus been able to trace the footsteps of this destructive traveller through the country of its birth. Its measured rate of progression and the occasional halts which it made for definite periods in thickly inhabited towns, are worthy of remark, as the epidemic still retains these characteristics. Like a noiscent river, its course has been at times direct or devious, uniform or temporarily interrupted; appearing at various places, not at the same period, but in succession, either by the gradual advance of the main current, or of some of its distributive branches.

While the interior of Hindostan was submitting to this, the pestilence had spread along the coast of Malabar and Coromandel, reaching Madras the 8th of October. With its progress here, a new and alarming feature was developed. The possibility of transporting the contagion by sea was evinced in its transit from Coromandel to the island of Ceylon. In Candia, the capital, it broke out, December, 1818, with even greater violence than upon the continent.

By the 15th September, 1819, Mauritius was included in the islands infected. The disease did not appear until after the arrival of the Topaz frigate from Ceylon, where the epidemic was then raging. The vessel at the time of sailing seemed healthy, but during the passage the cholera had appeared among the crew. In Port Louis fifty persons died daily. The malady, however, was chiefly confined to the coast; for though the deaths in the hospital of the town amounted to 94 cases of 133, on the plantation the mortality was not higher than ten or fifteen per cent.

In the adjacent island of Bourbon, the disease began early in December, 1819. The governor had adopted measures to interdict all communication with Mauritius; but notwithstanding this, two boats from the different islands held clandestine intercourse, and the contagion was imported. Of 257 persons seized with the distemper, 178 died.

During the last six months of 1819, the cholera, pursuing its route to the south and east, had also invaded the Indo-Chinese peninsula. Siam received more than a proportional share of misfortune. In Bankoe alone 40,000 individuals are said to have fallen victims. The contagion marched on to Malaga and Singapore. By the end of April it was announced on the northern coast of Java. During May it extended with violence in the interior of this island.

Cochin-China and Tonquin were invaded in 1820. In December, of the same year, it entered China, beginning its ravages at Canton. Peking admitted the enemy in 1821, and during that and the following year the mortality was so enormous, that coffins and other funeral requisites were necessarily furnished at the expense of the public treasury, for the interment of the poorer classes. Numbers of people engaged in the pursuit of business or pleasure, riding or walking, were seen to fall in the streets, exhausted by the sudden impression of the disease, which carried them in a few hours afterwards to eternity.

We shall now return to Bombay, and describe the course which the epidemic took to the north and west, in its approaches from that island towards the confines of Europe; and the route by which at last it was enabled to traverse the Russian empire, threatening in the present day, the neighboring European states.

In July, 1821, through the intercourse maintained by ships trading between Bombay and Muscat, in Arabia, the contagion was exported to the latter. Here the disease destroyed 60,000 persons. Many expired ten minutes after the infection. The cholera now spread to different parts of the Persian gulf—to Bahrein, Busheer and Bassora. In Bassora, 18,000 individuals perished, of whom 14,080 died in a fortnight.

From the Persian gulf the cholera extended, inland, in two directions, following the line of commercial intercourse. On one hand it ascended the Euphrates, traversing Mesopotamia, into Syria; and the Tigris, from Bassora to Bagdad. On the other, the disease was propagated into Persia. In the city of Shiraz, the population of which is 40,000, there died 16,000 in the first few days. Among the victims was the East India company's resident, Claudius James Rich, esq. He had retired to rest, but slightly indisposed. In the morning he was found dead in his bed.

Extending through Persia, the contagion visited several districts in the north and south of the kingdom. Isfahan escaped in consequence of the caravans from Shiraz being prohibited from entering the city. The route that was substituted lay through Yezd. This town paid dearly for the vicious visitation, as 7,000 persons were afterwards swept away by the cholera. During the succeeding winter, the contagion became dormant both in Persia and Syria.

In the spring of 1822 the Syrian and Persian streams of contagion had their frozen energies restored to activity. They quickly spread in their primitive vigor, Mosul, Berr, Acltab and Aleppo, were infected. In Persia, during September, the disease spread to the northward of Teheran, throughout all Kurdistan and Tauris.

In the spring and autumn of 1823, Diarbekr and Antioch were attacked, and the disease ravaged many of the towns along the Asiatic side of the Mediterranean. It also extended in an opposite course, attaining, in the month of August, Baku, upon the borders of the Caspian sea. At length, in September, it reached the Russian city of Astracan, at the mouth of the Volga. It first broke out in the marine hospital. From the 25th of September to the 9th of October, there died 144 patients, nearly two-thirds of all who had been attacked. Rigorous measures were enforced by the authorities for checking the contagion, but it continued to manifest itself until the severity of winter had set in. During the ensuing summer it did not return. The winter of this year was also destructive of the Syrian branch before it could reach Egypt. Sanatory precautions, however, in expectation of its arrival, had been prescribed by the vicary.

Although Europe was relieved from the impending danger, by the complete destruction or exhaustion of those parts of the contagious currents which had penetrated to Astracan, and to the borders of Egypt, yet the cholera continued to re-appear, every summer, in many of the countries previously infected, showing that the cold of winter had, in general, power to check its morbid influence upon the human body, but not to destroy the miasm altogether.

In 1822 it re-appeared in Java, and carried off 100,000 people. After visiting Ternat, Celebes and Bantia, in 1823, it first reached Amboyana. The inhabitants had no recollection of the disease ever having been in the Spice islands before. Afterwards it committed great havoc in Timor. For several years the cholera pursued its destructive course through China. After desolating several cities in Mongolia, it had reached the frontiers of Siberia at the end of the year 1826. In February, 1828, the disease fortunately received a check during the prevalence of a strong north wind.

After the first invasion, Persia had several returns of cholera. In October, 1829, a very serious inroad commenced in Teheren, the royal residence. But the occurrence of winter stopped its progress for the time. The contagion, however, was again reanimated towards the middle of June, 1830, in the provinces of Mazanderan and Shirvan, upon the southern shore of the Caspian sea. From the latter it passed through the town of Tauris, and destroyed 5,000 of its inhabitants. Crossing the Russian frontier, it rapidly advanced towards the interior. In two provinces 4,557 persons were seized with the malady, of whom more than a third died. The 8th of August it entered Tiflis. The population was soon diminished from 30,000 to 8,000, by deaths, and migration to avoid the distemper. To avert the spreading mortality, the inhabitants had recourse to religious ceremonies and processions, which, by collecting crowds, only served to extend the disease.

In the mean time, by the 1st of July, the malady had reached Astracan. Ten days afterwards, 1,229 individuals had been seized, of whom more than a third died, including the civil governor, and nearly all the officers of police.

This was the second time the devoted city of Astracan had been visited by the contagion.

The contagion, in penetrating to the heart of the Russian empire, from Astracan, pursued the course of the Volga, which spreads its navigable waters over the most populous provinces. Considerable havoc was made among the Cosaaks of the Don. The capitals of the several districts between that and Moscow were ravaged in succession. In the city the appearance of the destroyer was announced the 23th of September, having travelled from Astracan, a distance of 900 miles in less than three months.

In Moscow, energetic measures were instantly instituted by the government to afford every assistance to the sick, and to oppose the progress of the malady. The 11th of October, twelve days after the invasion, 216 cases of cholera had occurred, and of these 73 were fatal. The mortality, however, exceeded even the proportion with the extension of the disease. By the 10th of November, 6,506 cases were returned, and the deaths amounted to 2,908, or more than a half.

Before closing the account of the progress of Indian cholera, and in order to submit to a glance the magnitude of the evil, we shall point out the geographical limits of its past career in the various directions along which it has been propagated. From Bengal, its aboriginal province, it travelled southward to Mauritius and to the island of Timor, near Holland; eastward to Kuku-choton, a Chinese, town situated east of Peking; westward to the city of Moscow, [it is well known, that the disease has since extended from Moscow to Poland, where it attacked both the Russian and Polish armies; many officers have fallen victims, and the sudden death of count Diebitch is ascribed to it. The latest European advices apprises us of its appearance at Archangel. At Riga, Dantzic, and in Galicia, it is committing frightful ravages, and gradually extending itself to the southward and westward, and may be expected in France at its present rate of travelling in 1832], a portion of the globe, in extent, about equal to seventy degrees of latitude, and one hundred degrees of longitude.

INTERESTING LAW CASE.

Reported for the United States Gazette.
STACY, JR. VS. WETHERILL & CO.

In the district court for the city and county of Philadelphia, tried on the 10th of October, 1830, before the president of the court, and a special jury.

This was an action on the case, and the plaintiffs claimed to recover the amount of damage suffered by them, as owners of the brig Heroine, in consequence of the defendants having caused to be laden on board of said brig, a box containing aquafortis, without communicating to the plaintiffs the contents of the box. The circumstances of the case, as they appeared on the trial, were as follows:

In May, 1828, the Heroine was in the port of Philadelphia, and was receiving freight for New Orleans. The defendants shipped by her three boxes and eight barrels, marked F. M. Jr. also marked glass. But, no communication other than that, was made of the contents. The boxes were received by the mate, and carefully stowed by the stevedore.

The brig sailed for New Orleans, and when abreast of Bombay hook, at about noon, it was discovered that there was something on fire. After cutting away the larboard side of the quarter deck, and pouring in water, it was discovered that one of the boxes, which had been shipped by the defendants was on fire. It was got on deck, and thrown overboard; the other two boxes shipped by defendants were brought on deck, opened, and found to contain bottles of aquafortis.

The vessel was detained off Bombay hook for some hours; proceeded on her voyage, and arrived at New Orleans. The cargo was landed under the inspection of the wardens of the port; a part of it was found to be damaged and the damage was paid for by the owners of the vessel and at considerable expense to the owners, the brig was repaired, after some detention. To recover damages for the injury thus suffered this action was brought.

A number of witnesses were examined on the part of the defendants, for the purpose of proving that the goods were safely and perfectly packed—that when in the very act of stowing them the stevedore was desired to be careful in handling them—that it had not been the practice of the defendants, or of others, sending this article abroad, to mark the contents on the box, or to communicate to the owner or master of the vessel, the nature of the contents.

Evidence was given on the part of the plaintiffs, to show that it was the practice of several individual druggists, to mark on the box the nature of the contents, or to have it inserted in the bill of lading, or communicate in some other way to the owner or master, the character of the article, and also, that when the article is known to be shipped it is usually carried on deck.

The court charged the jury, that the rule of law is, that when an article of a dangerous nature is shipped, the person who ships it is bound to give notice of what the article is; and if he does not, and it is received in ignorance of its character, the shipper is responsible for whatever damage may ensue from it. The sole question for the jury was, whether the mate who received the box had notice, expressly or constructively, of the nature or character of the contents.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for the sum of 357 dollars and 9 cents damages, and six cents costs. The case was argued for the plaintiffs, A. A. Browne and Randall for defendants.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 2—Vol. V.

BALTIMORE, SEPT. 10, 1831.

[Vol. XLI. Whole No. 1,042]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The causes stated in our last paper, have delayed the publication of the title page and index for the last volume, and also materially affected the contents of the present sheet, so far as they depend upon the personal labor of the editor, though filled with a close mass of very interesting or important matter, on various subjects.

☞ The much increased public support which has been extended to the REGISTER in the last and current year, especially the latter, will enable the editor to show his gratitude by his works. He intends to give many extra sheets, or supplements, that the long and important papers yet to appear may be published and preserved. And for the sake of reference, (never yet having published those celebrated articles, and that copies of them may be easily accessible to the people generally,) he will soon make room for the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, about which so much is now said in political discussions.

☞ Some valuable materials for the proposed history and present state of the iron manufacture, have latterly reached us. The collection, however, is yet very inadequate to the fulfilment of our original design—but more information is expected; and we would respectfully urge an early forwarding of it—that time may be allowed, before the meeting of congress, to digest and publish the various facts collected. The English subject, who is a delegate to the "free trade" convention to be held at Philadelphia, has modestly said, "WE'LL BREAK THE IRON ARCH OF PENNSYLVANIA, AND WITH IT THE WHOLE SYSTEM WILL FALL TO THE GROUND." This foreigner, we hope to be excused for saying, what we should not say of a person having a right to speak on the subject, ought to have been bred a brazier—because of his superabundance of the raw material. The people of South Carolina would soon nullificate such a man, were he to speak of the interest of the cotton planters of that state, as he does of the iron makers and manufacturers of Pennsylvania—and yet the latter is, by far, the most valuable concern. The iron business of Pennsylvania employs many times more of the people of the United States than the cotton business of South Carolina. And if the slaves must be considered with respect to the one, they may be balanced by the horses in the other, required for the various transportations of materials and productions. Either are mere working-machines.

We have much wished for a full account of the iron works and manufactures of iron in Pennsylvania, to demonstrate the facts suggested—of the truth of which we have no manner of doubt. Cotton is a great and valuable staple, and it never entered into our heart to injure its producers to the value of one cent—but cotton isn't every thing. The world is not made of cotton!

We expect to attend the convention spoken of—but shall not, like the New York Courier and Enquirer, (in respect to the one held in that city, in May last), publish speeches not delivered in it, nor mis-state any thing which we shall see or hear. We shall, perhaps, and probably, do for this convention what no anti-tariff paper had the fairness or courage to do in respect to the Harrisburg convention—publish the memorial and address that may be agreed on, unless of an unreasonable length; for, as it is most likely we shall have something to say about the matters set forth, we shall not, like Mr. Thomas Ritchie, make our comments on an article which we are afraid that our readers should see and judge of for themselves!

☞ Our valued friend, Mr. CAREY, whose essays under the signature of "Hamilton" have long attracted the public attention—has recently published his eighth number of a new series. It is made up chiefly of facts hitherto stated and ably urged, but now collected and published in a formidible arrayment against the "new lights," who recently discovered that those who made the constitution of the United States, (with its father at their head, the truly venerable MADISON)—those who acted under it in the first congress, and every president of the United States, as well as every congress, to the present day, were, or are, wholly ignorant—grossly ignorant—miscreantly ignorant, of the true meaning of the great federal compact. And, that the delicate modesty of the disciples of the "new school" may be more conveniently manifested, we shall, (as soon as relieved of the extra labor caused by getting-out the index of the last volume), incur the expense of an extra half sheet for the purpose of giving a place to this very valuable and timely essay, and some other articles which have been delayed for a suitable opportunity to afford them a place.

☞ "All is not fair in politics." I have suffered enough by wilfully false quotations, and garbled and forced extracts from my writings, made by opponents of the great system to which I am closely united—and am less disposed to bear with such proceedings on the part of those who should be regarded as my friends. If those think there is any good in what I say—they should permit me to be heard in my own words. Temporary purposes ought never to be subserved by a violation of truth. And, in respect to the particular case now before me, the effect must needs be not only injurious to myself, but prejudicial in things of much higher interest than the success of transient political party—supposing that any sort of influence may attach itself to my opinions.

NAVIGATION AND COMMERCE. There has been much and a just complaint of the delay in furnishing the annual report on the navigation and commerce of the United States. We are glad to learn that it is now printed, and will soon be published. This delay was caused by a want of the returns, probably caused by the numerous changes of officers in the custom houses.

ELECTIONS. Mr. Sevier has been re-elected the delegate from Arkansas, after a sharp contest, by a majority of 453 votes. He was opposed by Mr. Desha.

Mr. Isaacs, of Tennessee, re-elected after a violent opposition by 470 votes, is called in some of the papers a "national republican." He was opposed because of his want of adhesion to the administration. Mr. Crockett obtained considerably more than 7,000 votes, and yet was beaten by a majority of 596.

The Indiana "Clarion" says, that the senate has a large majority of national republicans, probably two to one; and it is admitted, by the other side, that there will be a considerable majority of such in the house of representatives. The exact returns from the 1st congressional district, shew 11,284 for Mr. Boon, J, and 10,823 for Mr. Law, C.

Messrs. Burgess and Pearce have been re-elected in Rhode-Island, without any regular opposition.

We have not yet received returns from Kentucky that clearly shew the state of parties, as exhibited by the votes given for members of congress, at the late election. The Frankfort "Commentator" claims a majority of 1,300 votes for the Clay candidates, though only one third of the representation—the majorities of several of the successful administration candidates being very small.

The Maryland election for electors of senate took place last Monday, and the result, (as was confidently expected by them), is a very large majority in favor of the "National Republicans." The vote in Allegany county is not fully ascertained. It is known that one of the "Jackson" candidates has been defeated, and the other has probably been tied.

The confidence in its strength held by one party, and the extraordinary efforts of the other, (because that, as to the latter, the issue settled the political character of the state for the ensuing five years) has caused the loss of one or two counties to the former that might have been retained, had a corresponding zeal existed, and the same degree of energy been exerted. The college will consist of 27 or 28 National Republicans, and 12 or 13 Jacksonians, according to the result in Allegany county. It will meet on the 19th inst. to elect 15 senators for five years. We shall give the returns of the votes hereafter, so far as the particulars are obtained.

There are four tickets getting up in Chester county, Pennsylvania—the Wolf Jackson, the anti-Wolf Jackson, the National Republican and the anti-masonic.

John Gayle, esq. has been elected governor of the state of Alabama, by a large majority of the votes of the people. The Planters' Gazette of that state characterizes him as the uncompromising opponent of "nullification," and considers his election "as a triumph of the principles of our forefathers over the new-broached heresies of the disunionists of the day."

THE FLORIDA ELECTION of a delegate to the congress of the United States, will, probably, result in one of the most interesting discussions of various important subjects involved in such proceedings, that ever took place in our country—and on many points.

We shall not pretend to enter into the facts, but there are some of the leading things which appear.

The opposing candidates were col. White, late delegate, and col. Gadsden—and for the former there appeared a majority of 101 votes; but the governor of the territory, Mr. Duval, for reasons which we do not recollect to have seen fully stated, objecting to certain votes given to col. White, made a tie between him and his opponent, and ordered a new election. Col. White requested his friends to treat this order "with contempt," saying that congress, and not the governor, has the right of investigating the business of the election; and it seems that the presiding justices of some of the counties, whose duty it is to issue orders for appointing inspectors, or judges, of election, have positively refused to respect the governor's proclamation, for reasons assigned—among them is David B. Macomb, esq. presiding justice of Leon county. He denies all "color of authority" in the governor, with relation to this matter.

One curious case is fully stated. It seems clearly proved that, at a certain election district called "Sadbury Precinct," col. White received a majority of votes, and that the returns were regularly made up and carefully forwarded; and it is admitted by the secretary of the territory that they were regularly received; and yet it also appears that the "poll book," which, it is deposited on oath was enclosed, was absent from the office of the secretary, when making up the whole return.

Col. White has broadly charged certain officers of government with a direct and grossly unwarrantable interference in this election. If he can sustain these charges, it is his duty to bring them before congress—if they are incorrect, the officers charged should seek and obtain a speedy relief from them; for their character is of the most pernicious tendency.

The "Floridaian," of August 10, however says—"We learn that the long expected return from Sandy creek precinct, Walton county, accompanied by a 'poll book,' and giving col. White a majority of sixteen votes, was received by the last western mail, and has thus untied the Gordian knot."

But whether the governor will revoke his proclamation for a new election, is not stated.

"THE PAST AND THE PRESENT." On the 18th of October 1820, before the passing of the "accrued tariff," Samuel Hopkins, esq. of Genesee, thus described the state of the country:—

"We have probably four or five hundred thousand dollars of annual interest accumulating against us—exclusive of our commercial debt—and so totally has money disappeared, that it may be doubted whether there is enough to pay the interest on the amount of interest. We may be said to have but three articles of any moment for exportation—namely, flour, cattle and pot ashes; and, as far as I know, the depression in the prices of these is without a parallel. Last year we talked of the difficulty of paying for our land. This year the question is now to exist. The struggle is not now for property. From this time onward we shall have to contend for clothing, without which we shall become a miserable, and I fear a barbarous people.

The cities are eating up their capital, the country is wearing out clothes without sufficient means to get new ones, either by manufacture or produce. Meantime our importations go on. Specie is plenty in a few haunts, but the country at large, though overflowing with abundance of its products, has nothing with which to pay for money; and all the ordinary pursuits of life are paralysed for want of a medium of exchange."

On the 12th day of the previous February, the secretary of the United States' treasury, stated to congress, that "few examples have occurred of a distress so general and so severe, as that which has been exhibited in the United States."

Wm. Carroll, esq. governor of Tennessee, thus expressed himself as to the remedy of the evils of the "free trade" system under which we were then laboring:

"A determination on the part of the people to promote agriculture and domestic or household manufacture, AND TO LESSEN THE CONSUMPTION OF FOREIGN GOODS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION, will soon relieve the community from the pressure."

Ship building.—From the New York Evening Post of May 6, 1831—"The ship yards in this city have assumed a look of activity which has not been seen in them for five years past. One first rate ship was launched a day or two since, and contracts are already entered into for building ten others, of which six are already on the stocks, and the others will be begun as soon as the ship yards can be made ready for them. This is a greater number than has been under contract at any time since the year 1826. Besides these large vessels, great numbers of small craft and steamboats are constructing all along the shores, and vessels of every burden are undergoing repairs. The Kensington, so rudely used in our waters last year, with the Russian ambassador on board, has just been repaired and lies in all her fair proportions in the ship below Mr. Eckford's ship yard. By its side is another vessel of war, the United States, the construction of which is nearly completed. In the mean time the ship yards are alive and noisy with the stir and sounds of business. You hear every where the strokes of the carpenter's axe and plane, of the blacksmith's and caulker's hammer, and see men of the various other occupations, which minister to the construction of vessels, actively employed. The change is felt in thousands of workshops in this vast metropolis.

Even the hauling up of vessels on the dry docks to be repaired, gives employment to numbers of laborers. Pass by the dry dock in that part of the city called Manhattan island, when the heavy and immense mass of some large merchant vessel, drawn by huge chains, mounts slowly up the inclined plane, and you are reminded of Horace's

Tribunusq; steas machinæ carinas

Which is nearly as good a specification of the machinery of this invention as the mechanic who devised it could have lodged in the patent office—Wait until the keel is drawn up high and dry, and you will see a whole army of laborers pouring out of the building where they have been employed in giving motion to the machinery.

A year since our ship yards presented a very different aspect; silent, almost deserted—a single ship on the stocks and two or three repairing, a few tars sunning themselves, and here or there a carpenter or a stevedore sauntering listlessly about where he once found constant employment. The reality and strength to this new impulse to commerce, may be judged of from the remarkable fact, that within two months the value of shipping has risen in this port from twenty-five to thirty per cent. In the mean time we are glad to hear of similar activity in other cities, in Boston and Baltimore, a circumstance which proves that this renovated prosperity of commerce is general and not local—as to its causes, they are doubtless various."

¶ We shall here repeat some remarks that we have oftentimes made, that the facts may be familiar to every body. One great point of opposition to the tariff was, that it would ruin the revenue; but its friends said, that the revenue must be increased, as the tariff would supply means to enable the people to indulge themselves in the free use of foreign goods; and now, the opponents of the tariff calculate, upon the increased revenue to break down the tariff. These are queer things—but true.

VIRGINIA. The troops that marched from Richmond to Southampton have returned. Several of the blacks taken prisoners have already been condemned to death. There is a great deal of forer, and truth too, in the following remarks from the Boston Courier on this subject—

"We infer, from the tone of the newspapers in Virginia, that the public will not be satisfied with any thing less than the total extermination of the murderers. Public justice would strike only at the leaders, for they, and those whose injudicious philanthropy excites their disaffection still more than they, are fairly accountable for the mischief; but oppressed as Virginia is with the tremendous evil of slavery, it is to be expected that men will take counsel from their fears rather than their reason."

At an entertainment given at Petersburg to the Richmond light dragoons, John H. Pleasants, esq. offered the following toast: Henry B. Vaughan—the Jerusalem publican, who speculated upon the bones of his kindred, which the dragoons went to bury and to avenge.

The idea prevails that, because of the terrible events in Southampton, the white population, in case of like outrages in future, will retaliate by an indiscriminate slaughter of the blacks—and such, we think, will probably take place! Indeed, a few days since, in Charles city county, a rising of the negroes being feared, an armed body of white men shot down two blacks, because they attempted to run away. There is much fear and feeling in several of the lower counties of the state; and the white inhabitants seem to be in a constant excitement.

DR. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL died at New York on the 7th inst. Some particular notices of his life and character hereafter.

WOOL AT BOSTON, remains at a high price, though the importations have been heavy. American tall blooded, washed 65 to 70; do. three-fourths 58 to 62; do. half, 53 to 56; half and common 48 to 53. The prices, generally, being as last quoted.

The import of foreign wools were 315 bales from Smyrna, 202 from Hamburg, and 700 from London—which are said to embrace nearly all the foreign wool ordered for the Boston market.

SHIP HOUSES. It has been stated that the great ship Pennsylvania, built and remaining in one of the ship-houses at Philadelphia, had settled; and that it would be necessary to launch her—this report brought about the following statement, which we copy to shew on what a large scale works of this kind are constructed—

The Philadelphia Chronicle contradicts the statement made in the New York Journal of Commerce, upon the authority of an intelligent officer of the navy, that the Pennsylvania had settled on the stocks. According to the Chronicle, the ship was never more secure and erect in her station than at the present; and her actual condition, as well as her immense size and perfect workmanship, excites the admiration of all who inspect her. She has never settled even in the slightest degree, and there is no reason whatever to apprehend such an occurrence. She is supported by a stone wall, under the whole length of her keel, of four feet in breadth, on each side of which are two walls of equal length and also of solid masonry, their thickness being each three feet with thirty-two transverse walls of similar construction, four feet apart, and each two and a half feet thick. These all rest on solid ground, and are laid, wherever this was necessary, in water cement. The interiors are filled with rubble stone, well rammed in; and the whole forms a mass not to be shaken by any thing less powerful than an earthquake.

The informant of the New York paper observed the guns of the ship lying near her; but his carelessness is proved by his statement that they are all forty-two pounders. She is to have these on the lower gun deck only, with thirty-two above. She is calculated for one hundred and thirty-eight; but may carry two more.

The Hartford rig is similar upon a similar structure.

This information is derived from an officer whose professional knowledge and skill are well known, and whose post requires him to be thoroughly acquainted with every thing connected with the navy yard.

WASHINGTON FAMILY. The lamented col. Variak was the last of the military secretaries, associated with Harrison, Hanson and Jonathan Trumbull, in the war of the revolution.

Of the aids-de-camp, col. John Trumbull, (aid before Boston, in 1775), alone survives the long and honored list of Mifflin, Reed, Johnson, Bland, Taylor, Grayson, Smith, Fungerald, Meade, Pinckney, Hamilton, Laurens, Humphries, Cobb, Tilgham, &c. &c. Trumbull, with the venerated Lafayette, form the "time honored" remains of the many and the worthy who were attached to the personal aide of the commander-in-chief in the days of trial.

Of the officers of the guard, Colfax, Gibbs, Grimes, Nicholas, &c. all are stricken from the muster roll of life—probably not a single soldier of the body guard now answers to his name.

Of the officers of the first president of the U. States, comprising from 1789 to '97 the secretaries Lear, Humphries, Jackson, Lewis, Nelson, Craik, Handbridge, all are gone! The adopted children, Mr. Custis, of Arlington, and Mrs. Lewis, of Wood Lawn, are all that exist of Washington's family at the outset of the present government. Not a servant of that period is living, although one, a very aged female, still lives, who was at the camp of Morristown, 1777, and the Valley Forge, 1777-8. Such is the unsparring epythe of the time!

THE POLES. There was a meeting of the Americans in Paris on the 9th July to raise subscriptions for the aid of the Poles. Mr. J. Fenimore Cooper presided, and J. A. Washington, of North Carolina, acted as secretary. A subscription was forthwith opened, and 6,300 francs subscribed. A spirited address to the American people was also agreed to, and has been published, on behalf of the Poles.

Letter of the chairman to gen. Lafayette, with an extract from the Journal enclosed.

Paris, July 10.

My dear sir—A meeting of Americans, on the subject of the Poles, was held last evening in the Rue Richelieu, and I hasten to send you an account of the proceedings. You will see that I had the honor to preside, and it has become my duty, as the organ of the meeting, to request you will consent to receive, not only our own contributions, but any others that may be the consequence of our efforts, and to remit them to the people for whom they were intended. It was decided that an appeal should be made to the American people, in this cause, and we have dared to hope you will give the whole proceedings the high sanction of your name.

I am, dear sir, very faithfully and sincerely yours,
J. FENIMORE COOPER.

General Lafayette, La Grange.

La Grange, July 14, 1831.

My dear sir—I have had the pleasure to receive your favor of the 10th inst. including your resolutions adopted at the meeting in behalf of admirable Poland. Permit me, although I did not attend it, to proclaim my right of citizenship and to become one of the subscribers.

It is to me a source of patriotic enjoyment to see the sympathies of the United States mingle with those which the cause and heroism of the Poles have excited in Europe, particularly throughout France. Instances of American feeling on the subject we may already record. Whatever is collected in Paris, or other parts of Europe, or from the United States, I shall be happy and proud to transmit to the Polish authorities. With the highest regard, I am, my dear sir, your affectionate friend,

LAFAYETTE.

To Mr. J. Fenimore Cooper,
Rue St. Dominique, Paris.

From the United States Gazette.

The attention of the passengers on board of the steam boat Swan, from New York to Brunswick, was called by Mr. P. Ongen of New York, to the condition of the Poles. After explaining the object of the meeting, B. W. Richards, esq. (mayor) of Philadelphia, was called to the chair, and David Hoffman, of Baltimore, was appointed secretary—the following resolutions were suggested, and unanimously adopted.

1. Resolved, That we heartily sympathize with the Polish nation in their sufferings in the cause of liberty, and admire the heroism which has been displayed in the maintenance of their rights,

2. That we highly approve of the objects of the meeting of our countrymen in Paris, on the 9th of July, and trust that their call will be responded to in every quarter of our country.

3. That a subscription be now made, with the hope that this example will be followed throughout the union by all travellers, and that this humble commencement may be followed by a large aggregate result.

4. That a committee of three, consisting of Moncure Robinson, of Virginia, Stephen Baldwin, of Pennsylvania, and David Hoffman, of Baltimore, collect the proposed subscription, and place the same in the hands of captain Degraw, to be handed over to such agents as may be appointed in New York, to transmit what may be there collected in behalf of the same cause.

5. That captain Degraw be requested to suggest similar meetings on board of this boat, with similar objects, during the remainder of this season.

Mr. Abraham Payne, of the island of Madeira, addressed the meeting in an animated and forcible manner, and closed his excellent remarks by tendering as a present, for the benefit of the Poles, a pipe of his best Madeira wine, now in Baltimore—the proceeds of which will be paid to Mr. Hoffman, for that object. The pilot and engineer, and three deck hands of the steam boat Swan, gave three dollars. Total collection in money about $60.

B. W. RICHARDS, chairman.

DAVID HOFFMAN, secretary.

☞ A general meeting has been held in New York, W. A. Duer, chairman, to raise money for the relief of the Poles. It is probable that a handsome amount will be collected in the United States.

ANTHRACITE COAL FOR STEAM ENGINES. The experiments in the use of the anthracite coal for steam engines are matters of public interest, and we are happy to perceive by the following extract of a letter with which we have been politely favored, from a gentleman in Baltimore to another in this city, will probably be successful.

Baltimore, 22d August, 1831.

My dear sir—Feeling an interest in the prosperity of every thing relating to rail roads, I made it my business, on my return here, to enquire into the success of the use of anthracite coal in our locomotive engine; and believing that it might be of some service to your road, I will detail such information as I have obtained.

On the first trial it packed as it does with you; but by creating a powerful artificial draft (with a fan) and enlarging the gate below, they now meet with complete success. Our engine is of four horse power, and can carry 100 passengers twenty miles per hour; but, owing to the curvature of our road, it is not advisable to go over thirteen miles the hour, which it now does, overcoming an elevation of from 12 to 30 feet the mile. She goes and returns 15 miles (making 26) in 2 hours, and consumes but one quarter of a ton of coal, at an expense of $2.

Our wheels will run 1,000 miles with one oiling.

To the wheels of the locomotives upon the Mohawk and Hudson rail road, is attached a self-oiling box; invented by Mr. Jarvis, the ingenious and able engineer of the company.

DECLINE OF BOSTON. The Patriot states that the duties upon the goods entered at the custom house on Friday amounted to upwards of three hundred thousand dollars. These goods could not have arrived here without our ships, and if our ships are in port they cannot, of course, be doing a profitable business elsewhere—we believe this is the argument, and a very logical one it is. The fact is but one of the many indications of a declining trade, which are shown in the eyes and grieve the hearts of many patriots in our city. Boston was never before so near the brink of destruction; much of her little business is like to die a natural death, for want of nurses. Her streets are lumbered up with goods; the people who have not left her in despair are jostling each other about the streets, and hurrying to and fro, like men demented; her manufacturers make few or no goods except to order; real estate has not risen more than thirty-three per cent. within the last eight months; and, in short, consumption stalks through the streets in such a palpable shape, that even the prophetic croakers who erst made the city musical, though melancholy, with their lamentations, have laid aside their harps, and wait with gloomy satisfaction to have their predictions verified. We are convinced that Boston will soon lose a good portion of her business—for want of people to transact it.

[Courier.

MOHAWK RAIL ROAD. On Thursday the locomotive De Witt Clinton came down from Schenectady, on her first regular trip in 50 minutes, with a train of cars behind her. Yesterday a friend of ours left with a small train of cars at 28 minutes past 10—eight coaches having preceded. The engine went at the rate of nine miles an hour up to the long inclined plane of three miles in extent, with a descent of about 21 feet per mile. The last seven miles on a level were passed in thirty minutes exactly.

The engine left Schenectady with another train of four loaded coaches, at ten minutes past 12, and came the first 7 miles in 35 minutes, stopped 5 minutes, and came the last 4½ miles in about 17 minutes, being less than an hour coming the whole distance. Fine wood was used on this occasion, but it cannot be made to produce an uniform heat, and the velocity at some portions of the route was greater or less accordingly. Several miles, however, were run at a rate of from 20 to 23 an hour, which fact can be easily known from the number of strokes of the piston per minute.

The cars now leave Schenectady at a little after 12 M. So that our citizens can take a morning ride with great comfort. The sensation is delightful; a velocity of 20 miles an hour is very agreeable and novel. There has been more travelling yesterday and the day before than at any other preceding period.

The new locomotive from England is arrived. The inclined plane at Schenectady is nearly finished, and is an object of great curiosity. [Albany Adv.]

PARIS GAMING HOUSES. The number of these licensed enfes is seven, viz. four in the palais royal, one in the Rue Marivaux, Frascati, and the Cerule. They contain seventeen tables for play, and 150 employers, exclusive of spies, flat-catchers, and decoy-ducks. The administration of these infernal regions pay annually to the city of Paris, six millions, fifty-five thousand, and one hundred francs, for the exclusive privilege of ruining twenty or thirty thousand families every year; the city has, more or less, a certain per centage upon three-fourths of them; the bankers of the tables are relieved every three quarters of an hour, and each, in his turn, is obliged to enter in the cabinet of his chief, to make his report, viz. whether there are any new faces—how much a new comer has lost—whether he played with gold, silver, or bank notes, and displayed much money—whether he has a distinguished appearance, is tall or short—what his age may be—his residence—whether he is of Paris, or from the country, or a foreigner. The chef de partie, (so this privileged inquisitor is styled), writes these particulars in a register kept for that purpose. If the name of the player is not soon ascertained, they give him a supposed one, a sobriquet, ad interim. [London paper.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to Aug. 2, inclusive, received at New York, &c.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The reform bill was still in the house of commons, and proceeds slowly, because of the special opposition which the disfranchisement of every borough causes. The ministers held a large majority, and the work will be completed.

The British crops promised a bountiful harvest. All foreign grain, it was expected, would be immediately excluded, unless some from the United States, passing through Canada.

The ceremony of crowning the king, it is expected, will speedily take place—but a great part of the usual ceremonies will be omitted because of the bad state of his health. The small sum of 100,000 pounds a year has been settled, by parliament, on his wife, in case she survives him. She attended with her husband, when he signed the bill, which was presented by the speaker in the following humble terms:

"May it please your majesty, we your majesty's most faithful commons appear before you with respect and attachment to your majesty's house, and beg most humbly to announce to your majesty, that in conformity to your majesty's recommendation last parliament, we have passed a bill, (and with dutiful respect we now present such bill to your majesty) to make provision for her most gracious majesty, in the event of your majesty's decease, and of which bill we beg your majesty's acceptance."

A new bridge over the Thames, at London, has been opened. It is a magnificent structure, and, with the ground required for its location and accommodation, cost two millions of pounds.

The young queen of Portugal has returned to England from an excursion to France, and, by express command, was received with regal honors.

Lord Brougham has done himself great credit by the reforms which he has accomplished in the court of chancery, and by the industry and energy with which he has despatched the business—there are now no arrearsages.

Cobbett was tried before the king's bench about a week ago for a libel for a seditious publication. The trial excited a good deal of interest, as being directed against the press, and by a liberal ministry. Cobbett had cited all the ministers as witnesses; and in his speech lashed them very severely. The attorney general, sir Thomas Denman, was evidently afraid of him, and handled him lightly, calling him a perfect master of the English language. He was virtually acquitted, the jury not being able to agree upon a verdict.

FRANCE.

The king opened the chambers on the 22nd July with a speech, inserted on page 28. He is evidently gaining popularity and strength—if we may judge by what we see stated.

The anniversaries of the three days were celebrated with great pomp. The first with funeral ceremonies in honor of the dead—the second by magnificent games and shews—and the third by a grand military review of more than 100,000 men. All passed off well, and in excellent order, though disturbances were feared. The king laid the corner stone of a monument to be raised to the memory of those that fell in the revolution. He was attended by Don Pedro, ex-emperor of Brazil. There is a report that the latter has offered his daughter, the young queen of Portugal, to the second son of Louis Philip.

The French army is in fine order. The country was generally tranquil.

The following circumstance is related in one of the London papers—and whether it shall or not lead to serious consequences, the anecdote will serve as an illustration of the French character:

"An incident rather of a curious than an important nature, attended the first sitting of the French chamber of peers. As soon as the members and the public were admitted, a number of Austrian flags, which were recognised as those that Bonaparte had sent to the senate after the battle of Ulm, in 1805, were seen conspicuously placed upon the tribune, with statues of victory intermixed with them. The count de Semovalle, the grand referendary, explained that these ensigns had been new, for the first time, disinterred from one of the vaults of the chamber, where he had preserved them with a jealous care, from the period of the restoration up to that moment. His reason for producing them then was, that he thought France was in a condition to reclaim all its ancient military glory, without caring who was offended at the revival of it. This affair, which was puerile and theatrical in the last degree, excited cheers from the audience in the chamber; but out of doors, coupled with the declarations of the duke of Orleans, it has produced a more serious impression—that war with Austria is not improbable. There seems no good reason why such a piece of charlatanerie should be played off, unless to give gratuitous offence to that cabinet. It is reported that the Austrian minister has already claimed the standards; and perhaps the foolish transaction, if it was not preconcerted, may lead to serious consequences. It is again denied that the Russian ambassador had left Paris."

At the grand review on the last of the three days, the king announced the reception of a report that the Poles had obtained a great victory. It produced a mighty sensation among the troops—"long live Poland" burst, at once, from the lips of 120,000 men—and patriotic songs were chaunted by them under arms! The effect was wonderful. The soldiers embraced one another, and shouted and danced; and an abundance of wine was suddenly presented, in which they drank success to the Poles—success to the Poles.

The duchess of Berri was at Lucca, on her way to Naples.

The London Sun of Aug. 2, says—We have no news from Paris to-day. The question of peace or war mainly depends upon the fate of the election of the presidency of M. Lafitte, or the nominee of the minister. One thing is, however, very clear, that if France do not go to war at present to support the Poles, she will be compelled in a short time to resort to it in vindication of her own institutions, which can never be deemed safe after the triumph of Russia in Poland. If Louis Philippe thinks otherwise he will be grievously disappointed.

M. de Plaffenhoffen, who, it will be recollected, is prosecuting a claim for debt against Charles X. in Scotland, obtained, in the tribunal de premiere instance, of Paris, a judgment by which the ex-king is condemned by default, to reimburse a sum that, including interest and charges, amounts to upwards of 1,000,000 francs.

RUSSIA.

The cholera was raging dreadfully at St. Petersburg and many other places. Hardly one half of those attacked with this disease survive.

The following is an official statement of the progress of the disease for three days at St. Petersburg.

	Remaining from preceding day	New cases	Deaths	Recovered	Likely to recover

Letters from St. Petersburg of July 6th, communicate some particulars of a disturbance, which had broken out there among the poorer classes respecting the measures taken by the Russian government to prevent the extension of the cholera morbus. In various parts of St. Petersburg places have been appropriated for the reception of persons attacked by the disease, around which cordons had been placed. The poor people were impressed with an idea that their friends who were taken into these hospitals were unfairly dealt with—that instead of measures being adopted to restore the sick, they were buried alive or poisoned. The fact that admission was not freely granted, strengthened the opinion that something improper was going on within the hospitals. A great body of persons, in consequence, forcibly entered the hospitals, and dragged out their friends, many of whom were in the last stage of the disorder; they killed the medical men in attendance, and great disorder prevailed. An express was sent off to the emperor, who was near Peterhoff, and Nicholas soon arrived at the spot. He expostulated with the people on their conduct, and said they ought rather to implore God to put an end to the prevalence of the malady. The emperor then fell on his knees, and was joined in prayer by all the people. Thus the disturbance was quelled without any further outrages being committed.

There was a report at London that the emperor Nicholas had died at St. Petersburg of the cholera.

DENMARK.

Frederick VI. king of the Danes, the Vandals, and the Goths, and the duke of Sleswick, Holstein, Stomern, Lauenburg and Oldenburg, has given a new constitution to his subjects. Two elective chambers; voters, all householders and landholders; the qualified to sit being landholders, clergy, and, (with leave), officers of the government. Meetings of the states once in two years. Minor matters to be declared in future proclamations.

PRUSSIA.

It is stated that Prussia has declared that her inactivity is not neutrality, with respect to the contest between the Russians and the Poles; and that she will assist the former by facilitating the passage of provisions and the munitions of war. There is much speculation as to events that may grow out of this position.

Berlin was threatened with the cholera, and the people was flying from the city in great numbers.

POLAND.

It seems certain that the Polish general Gielgud had been compelled to fly before the Russians in Lithuania into the Prussian territories, when he was assassinated by another Polish officer. Such appear to be the facts—but particulars are not given. The troops remain in Prussia, about 2,500 men.

It was stated at London on the 27th July that the Russians had crossed the Vistula, and were expected to invest Warsaw. Much sympathy was felt for the existing condition of the Poles. There were reports of several small battles near Warsaw—in which the Russians appear to have suffered the most; but they were concentrating their forces. The Poles were resolute, gathering strength and preparing for a terrible contest.

The Russian army in Poland is not of that immense overwhelming force as to excite so serious apprehensions for the fate of that country. The whole amount is 63,000 infantry, 19,000 cavalry, and 332 pieces of cannon. Of this force there are with gen. Toll 26,500 infantry, 7,900 cavalry, and 132 pieces of cannon; the remainder of the army is in Lithuania, Volhynia, &c.

The emperor continues to fulminate his ukases against those districts of ancient Poland which have risen. Podolia, Volhynia, Grodno, Wilna and Bialystec, are all declared in a state of war. In Volhynia the insurrectionary spirit is said to be burning with great fierceness.

There was a report by way of Metz that the great battle which was expected near Warsaw had taken place, and that the Russians were utterly defeated with the loss of 16,000 men and 80 pieces of cannon. We regret that we cannot place much reliance on this report; but it is well known that the Poles had resolved on "victory or death," in the literal meaning of these words; and they will surely fight desperately, well knowing that a general massacre will follow the success of the Russians.

AUSTRIA.

Vienna, July 7. According to a report of the board of health of Galicia, the number of persons attacked by the cholera in that province, from the first appearance of the disorder to the end of June, was 37,000; of whom 19,655 had recovered, 13,356 died, and 5,989 still remained ill.

There is a strong report of a general rising in Hungary, in favor of the Poles.

BELGIUM.

Leopold had arrived at Brussels, taken the oaths, and been installed king—to the great apparent satisfaction of the people. The speech of the regent in laying down his power, and of king Leopold in assuming it, are given in pages 29 and 30.

At the latest advices, things appeared quite satisfactory at Brussels, and the new ministers appointed were agreeable to the people. The king of Holland, however, will not acknowledge the new king of Belgium—and threatens hostilities. His army, well appointed, is 100,000 strong.

So great was the influx of strangers at Brussels on the arrival of the king, that nearly 4 dollars were given for a bed room, and more than 20 for a window in the Place Royale to behold the ceremony of his installation. The streets through which he passed were splendidly decorated. Report has assigned one of the daughters of the king of France as a wife for Leopold.

The Belgians have taken offence at that part of the speech of the king of the French, announcing that the fortresses of Belgium would be demolished; and the Belgian government has officially declared, that no overture had been made to it upon the subject, and that that clause is not found in the conditions which it has accepted.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

The Dutch appear to be very seriously preparing for war on Belgium, which it will require all the address of the other powers to prevent. Leopold is in the mean time rendering himself popular by a general tour in the provinces. On the 28th he arrived at Antwerp, where his reception was a brilliant pageant. A warm-hearted congratulatory address was presented to him, to which he made an appropriate response. In the evening he visited the theatre, and on the following morning reviewed the troops. His majesty seemed determined to be popular with all classes. He has formally announced his intention of espousing a Catholic wife, and of raising up his children in the Catholic faith.

SPAIN.

It appears that much attention is latterly paid to the army. One strong corps was to proceed towards the French frontier, and another towards that of Portugal. The latter supposed to assist Don Miguel in his need—if driven from Lisbon, either by the French or his own subjects.

ITALY.

Private accounts from Genoa state that the new alliance between Sardinia and Austria is no longer a mystery, and the king of Sardinia is assembling an army of 140,000 men, under the command of Charles Albert.

It appears that Italy was on the eve of another revolution. The papal troops had refused to act against their countrymen—the tri-colored flag was flying at several places, and the national guard was re-organizing, the Austrians having retired.

PORTUGAL.

France has completely humbled the tyrant of Portugal. The squadron under admiral Roussin gallantly forced a passage to Lisbon, took possession of all the Portuguese ships, and dictated what Miguel should do, allowing him only two hours to decide. The prisons of Lisbon are said to contain 40,000 persons! The reign of Miguel is terrific. He appears to be a perfect savage.

Miguel had not yet fulfilled the terms dictated at the last advice, and the tri-colored flag still floated on the Portuguese vessels of war. There are reports of a general insurrection at Lisbon.

TURKEY.

Much fermentation is said to exist because it is supposed that the sultan intends to diminish the power and revenue of the priests. He has made many important reformations in the affairs of his empire, and contemplates other great innovations on the old customs of his people.

COLOMBIA.

The black population at Caracas had risen—taken possession of the jail and liberated the prisoners—killing many persons who opposed them; but they were subdued and 30 of them (including two women) immediately shot.

BRAZIL.

There has been great disturbances at Rio Janeiro and other places in Brazil. We may expect that this fine country, like Italy, will speedily pass into the dominion of the colored population, and that the slave trade will be avenged. Assassination was the order of the day, and many persons have been killed in the different fights that the people have had with one another. A letter says—the state of affairs is wretched in the extreme, no one will pay his debts, and there is no law to compel payment; all the wealthy people are desirous of leaving.

ALGERIENS.

The French have not reduced the interior, and the Arabs, assembling in numerous bodies, were yet troublesome. Indeed, they lately attacked a strong French force, and killed and wounded 6 or 700 men. But it is not to be supposed that this state of things will last long. Algiers was becoming a French city—the adjacent parts of the country were very rapidly improving, and population was advancing, by the influx of emigrants; and if the possession by France be undisturbed by the European powers for a few years, the colony will supply immense quantities of grain, cotton and sugar. [We hope that our cotton planters will not ascribe the effects of these things to our tariff.]

BRIEF NOTICES.

Ballooning. Mr. Durrant lately ascended to the height of 3,600 feet, from Castle Garden, New York—when the balloon, containing 10,000 square feet, had only the “apparent size of a water melon;” and such was his command over the balloon, that (aided by a boat which towed it along after it had approached close to the water) he landed on the very spot from whence he started about an hour before.

A new air gun. A trial of a new air gun, the invention of M. Perreault, of Rouen, was recently made in Paris, in the presence of lieutenant-general Pelet and several generals and superior officers of artillery. This terrible instrument of destruction is mounted on rollers or little carriages. The guns can be fitted on one carriage, and each pointed in a different direction. They are discharged by means of a wheel, which an infant would be able to move. Each cannon fires off five hundred balls a minute, and 5,000 balls can be discharged without its being necessary to let in a fresh supply of compressed air. All the apparatus required for the three cannons can be carried by one horse. A battery of those guns to an indefinite length may be formed, and their effects upon a mass would be to cut them through as a saw cuts a plank.

Amiabilities between Johnson and Adam Smith. Mr. Baswell has chosen to deny, for reasons which will be presently obvious, that Johnson and Adam Smith met at Glasgow; but I have been assured by professor John Miller that they did, and that Smith leaving the party in which he had met Johnson, happened to come to another company where Miller was. Knowing that Smith had been in Johnson's society, they were anxious to know what had passed, and the more so as Dr. Smith's temper seemed much ruffled. At first Smith would only answer, “he's a brute—he's a brute!” but on closer examination, it appears that Johnson no sooner saw Smith than he attacked him for some points of his famous letter on the death of Hume, (ante v. ii. p. 267 n.) Smith vindicated the truth of his statement. “What did Johnson say?” was the inquiry. “Why he said,” replied Smith, with the deepest impression of resentment, “he said, you lie!” “And what did you reply?” “I said, you are a son of a ———.” On such terms did these two moralists meet and part, and such was the classical distaste between two great teachers of philosophy. [Walter Scott, from Croker's Boswell's Johnson.]

A handsome fee. Charles the second had a narrow escape from apoplexy in the spring of 1655, and was only saved by the resolution of sir Edmund King, who bled him on the spot, and without waiting the arrival of the other physicians. For this breach of etiquette a pardon was formally made out, and a thousand pounds granted to the practitioner; “but,”—there is always a but—“it was never paid.”

Veneration for a fiddle. A German writer, of whom I afterwards knew a little, was in some respects an original worth studying, though not imitating. He loved nothing so well as fiddling, and had two violins, a best and a second best, on the first of which, I firmly believe he would not have allowed his own father to draw a bow. Quitting England to settle in South America, he tore himself from his beloved instrument for the first time: but it was only to export it, highly insured, in a different, and, as he thought, a safer ship, than the one he was to sail supercargo in! [Harmaticon.]

Mexico. At New Orleans papers have been received from Mexico up to the 5th July, and letters from Tampico to the 23rd. Congress was to have met on the 21st of July, in extraordinary session. The greatest tranquility reigned throughout the republic. A condueta had arrived at Tampico with $700,000, and 33 bars of silver—and two others were on their way with 100,000 dollars each.

Singular case. In a neighboring town a few days since, a man who had been engaged in the operation of skinning a cow, which had died probably by the bite of a rattlesnake, gave sudden indications of having been mortally poisoned. His arm has since swollen to a considerable size, and but slight hopes are entertained of his recovery.

The crew of the U. S. schooner Poipease have contributed $200 for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Fayetteville.

Distressing shipwreck. The Lady Sherbrook, from Londonderry for Quebec, was lost on the night of the 19th ult. on Cape Ray, N. F. and out of 15 seamen and 285 passengers, only the captain, mate, three seamen and twenty-seven passengers were saved.

Pyramids of Teotihuacan in Mexico. At a recent meeting of the London Geographical society, a communication was read from lieut. Glennie, descriptive of these interesting memorials. The village of Teotihuacan is in lat. 19 deg. 43 min. and in lon. 98 deg. 51 min. E.: the variation of the needle being 9 deg. 49 min. E. The village is elevated 7,492 feet above the level of the sea. The pyramids are distant about a mile and a half from it; the largest is 727 feet square at its base, and 221 feet high, with two of its sides parallel to the meridian. A rampart of about 30 feet in height surrounds this pyramid, at the distance of 350 feet from its base, on the north side of which are the remains of a flight of steps, with a road leading from them in a northerly direction, covered with a white cement. The remains of steps were also found on the pyramids, which were covered with the same sort of white cement, as well as broad terraces extending across the sides. The number of pyramids surrounding the large one was estimated by Mr. Glennie at above two hundred, varying in their dimensions. They are all constructed with volcanic stones, and plaster from the adjacent soil, all coated with white cement, and the ground between their bases seems formerly to have been occupied as streets, being also covered with the same sort of cement. One of the smaller pyramids was covered with a kind of broken pottery, ornamented with curious figures and devices; and in the neighborhood of these edifices abundance of small figures were found, such as heads, arms, legs, &c. moulded in clay, and hardened by fire.

Pardoning power. The New York Commercial states that "such is the facility with which pardons are obtained in that state, that there are at this time fifteen hundred convicts loose upon the community, who have been pardoned, and whose terms of imprisonment, as adjudged by the courts, have not yet expired."

Dogs. It appears that 2,865 dogs have been killed in the city of New York, since certain cases of hydrophobia happened there. We have a strong hope that they will be, at least, much reduced in all our large cities and towns.

Philadelphia. Twenty-two houses on Shippen street were destroyed by fire, on the 28th ult. together with an infant—caused by "a useless burning of shavings." Four of the buildings were of stone—the rest of wood. Several firemen were much injured.

Russian manufactures. During the month of June there was an exhibition at Moscow of the productions of the arts and manufactures, methodically arranged in eight rooms. Among a great number of machines was one by Ivan Gourehkoff, for making shawls in imitation of Cashmires, which worked in presence of the public. There were 5,800 different articles, sent by 480 artists, manufacturers, and workmen.

AMERICAN CLAIMS ON FRANCE.

It appears by the subjoined article that our minister, Mr. Rives, has succeeded in making an arrangement with the government of France for the liquidation and ultimate payment, (in part, at least, if not the whole), of the claims of our citizens for the illegal capture and confiscation of their property some thirty years ago. We expressed the opinion, soon after the occurrence of the French revolution of 1830, that that event was decidedly auspicious to the adjustment and final allowance of these long standing claims: and we are now to find that our anticipations have been realized. The concession which our minister has stipulated on our part, of a reduction of the duty on French wines, however valuable it may be to France, is one which we should have been willing to see made without any equivalent; and the other, the payment of the claim of Beaumarchais, is only performing an act of justice which, in the opinion of many of our most enlightened countrymen, ought to have been rendered by our government long ago.

From the New York Mercantile Advertiser.

Simeon Draper, esq. of this city, passenger in the ship Formosa, capt. Orne, arrived on Thursday evening, is the bearer of despatches from Mr. Rives to our government. Among the despatches is the treaty lately concluded with the French government by our minister at Paris. An article appeared in the Journal du Havre of 5th July on the subject of this treaty, which is not only premature and unauthorized, but incorrect in many of its details. We learn by Mr. Draper, who obtained his information from Mr. Rives, that the amount of claims to be paid by France for spoliation of American property, is twenty-five millions of francs, payable in six equal yearly instalments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, from the date of the treaty being ratified by our government, which interest will swell the amount to about twenty-eight millions five hundred thousand francs.

Mr. Rives has stipulated, on behalf of our government, the payment of one million five hundred thousand francs, in settlement of the Beaumarchais claims;

That wines, (white and red) shall be admitted in our country on the following terms:

Wines in bottles shall pay 20 cents, in place of 50, in casks 10 15.

All other wines, now paying 10 cents, shall be admitted at 6 cents duty.

The French government, on their part, stipulate to relinquish all the Louisiana claims; that American long staple cotton shall be admitted at 20 francs per 100 kil. (the same duty as short staple pays), in place of 40 francs, as now charged.

We have yet no positive information as to the classes of claims that are admitted, and therefore prefer not to touch upon the subject, though we are well aware that much anxiety prevails on this head.

The famous O. P. Q. correspondent at Paris, of the London Morning Chronicle, pays a high and well deserved compliment to Mr. Rives, for his zealous attention to the interest, of his country. He "seized the lucky moment," and has met with much, if not complete success—the revolution of three days having introduced new men and new rules of action into the government of France.

We are at a loss to understand the part which relates to a regulation of our tariff—though entirely willing that French wines should be introduced on the most liberal terms, a rightful reciprocity being extended towards our productions.

Paris, July 16. Mr. Rives, the talented, amiable, and respectable minister of the United States of America in this country, has just concluded, on the behalf of his government, a treaty with France, on the subject of the claims of the former on the latter state, in respect of American merchant vessels seized and confiscated in execution of the decrees of Berlin and Milan. This claim has been made by the American government ever since 1810, but always without effect. Napoleon evaded it; Louis XVIII shuffled it off; Charles X always talked of a more convenient season: but the government of Louis Philip has done justice to the claims of the federal government. These claims have been ably asserted and vigorously defended by Mr. Rives, who, although he labours under the disadvantage of speaking the French language most imperfectly, has yet written the most able and convincing letters, and which, when published, will do him great justice, as they have done the state some service.

The claim, as you know, is not made on behalf of the state, but on behalf of American merchants, and has been finally settled at one million sterling; from this £50,000 will be deducted to repay certain French citizens for the losses they also sustained in consequence of seizures made by the American government. In return for these concessions on the part of France, the American government has consented, by its minister, to a reduction for 10 years on the importation duty on French wines, and to further proportional reduction, should the American government reduce the duties on other foreign wines. France, on the other hand, is to admit long and short silks in her ports on paying the same duty, which will be advantageous to American commerce. The basis of this treaty is mutual concession. It is just, honorable and wise. The American government will ratify it with pleasure, and the French chambers should receive it with satisfaction. It is the first act of M. Sebastiani that I can unhesitatingly approve since he has been named minister of foreign affairs, and it is a treaty which reflects great credit on the zeal, patriotism, and talent of the American minister at Paris, Mr. Rives. This treaty will have the effect of yet further endearing France to America, and will tend to cement that which ought to exist between two free and enlightened nations. I will hope that France and Great Britain will soon be bound together by a treaty of commerce on a broad and liberal principle, which shall destroy jealousies, remove prejudices, and lead to an alliance in favor of liberty and civilization.

The Salem (Mass.) Gazette says that the 5,350,000 dollars, which France has by treaty agreed to pay in full satisfaction of the claims of our merchants for spoiliations, "will probably give but a small per centage upon the actual amount of the claim. The capture, plunder, and wanton destruction of American ships and merchandise by the French, were estimated, some years ago, by the late Thomas Fitzsimons, of Philadelphia, at fifty millions of dollars: to wit—twenty millions under the orders of the directory and their agents, and thirty millions during the imperial reign of Bonaparte. These estimates were made with great care, by a well informed and judicious merchant, and probably approach the truth."

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION, Of friends of the American System.

The attention of the friends of the American System, (says the Boston Courier), is solicited to the following document. The free trade party are using great exertions to produce an excitement that shall cause a reaction, if possible, in the public mind and reduce the country back to its state of colonial vassalage—rendering it dependent on Great Britain for the supply of its most ordinary wants. These efforts ought to be met by corresponding efforts on the part of those who live by the labor of their hands, the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer—of all who feel it a duty and a pleasure to cherish the institutions of their own country in preference to those of foreign nations, and to reciprocate the benefits of trade and commerce with their neighbors rather than with smugglers and the agents of foreign manufacturers. It is important that the recommendation in the letter of the committee, to form a state association, auxiliary to the national society, be acted upon without delay. The enemy is in the field, and has grown bold in consequence of the apparent indifference of our friends. Let us not be overpowered without an attempt to preserve existence.

TO THE FARMERS, MECHANICS AND MANUFACTURERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Fellow-citizens—On the 18th May, 1831, delegates from several of the states, representing the interests of wool growers and manufacturers, assembled in the city of New York and organized a convention, by the appointment of the hon. NATHAN WILLIAMS, of Utica, New York, as president, and Messrs. HENRY SHAW, of Massachusetts, and SAMUEL D. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, secretaries. The deliberations of the convention resulted in the adoption of two reports, with accompanying resolutions, which have been spread before the public.

The first of these reports disclosed an examination into alleged frauds upon the revenue in the importation of woolen goods, and concluded by the appointment of a committee, to investigate and expose the daring attempt to evade the laws of the land, by foreign agents and their affiliated associates in this country. That committee is now executing its trust. Agents are on the alert both in Great Britain and elsewhere, and facts have already come into their possession involving extensive frauds; clearly demonstrating that a course of deception and perjury is systematically pursued, the inevitable effect of which is to undermine the industry and blight the prospects of the manufacturer and wool grower. The brief allusion to the labors of the committee, seemed but an act of justice, while the nature of its pursuits forbids, for reasons which the public will approve, a more detailed account of its plans and operations.

The second report adopted by the convention, enumerated some of the various reasons for the organization of a national association of farmers, mechanics and manufacturers, with branches in the states, and concluded with a resolution appointing the undersigned a committee to address the public on the object and design of the proposed association. In discharging the duty confided by the resolution, the undersigned would in the first instance refer to the principle and practice of our government, as a full and complete justification of the convention. But who that reflects will require us to justify? Our government rests upon the principle that the people possess the sovereignty, and our practice under that government, as well as in all the mixed regulations of society illustrates it. Feeling the influence of government so slightly, whenever our rights are invaded, our interests threatened, or our advance in improvement impeded, we as a people, naturally fall back upon ourselves, and in the elements of society, combined in primary assemblies or associations, gather up and embody opinion as the appropriate means of redress. We take upon ourselves a responsibility in this way, which in all other governments the people have confided to their rulers, and acting under its just obligations, accomplish purposes towards which the government has been found careless or indifferent. How delightful is the theory of that government which admits the right to associate without the imputation of revolt, and finds itself strengthened by any legitimate movement of the people. Justified by considerations of this nature, the convention resolved to form a national association of agriculturalists, mechanics and manufacturers.

In extending an invitation to these several branches of industry to assemble for the purpose of organizing an association, it becomes us to explain its object. It is simply this—to develop the resources and increase of the productive industry of the country by the protection and improvement it will afford. Protection, by the continuance of the American System on its broadest principles. Improvement, by the maintenance of social intercourse on the footing of equality. The mechanics of this country constitute a body of intelligent and industrious men—they are scattered over the whole land—no branch of industry can prosper without their agency. To the stock of a nation's wealth, they bring their full proportion. By their personal efforts they swell to an Immeasurable extent the stock of a nation's comforts. The values which the mechanic produces are, from the very nature of his situation, small in the detail, but the aggregate swells beyond computation. Though so essential, he is so mixed with all the relations of society as apparently to have no separate social existence. To bring this class of working men up to a level of perfect equality with their fellow-citizens; to apprise them of their importance in society; to enable them to compare their labors, and thus to improve them; to make them acquainted with each other, and thus give them identity as a body; to inquire how and to what extent they are protected by the laws, are among the objects of the national association.

To the manufacturers, little need be said to enlist them in the support of an institution designed to establish a brotherhood of laborers on the principle already suggested. The capital they employ; the deep dependence of that capital upon the movements of the government; the embarrassments witnessed and felt by the evasions of the law designed to sustain them, and through them the other branches of industry, must admonish them that any measure which combines in harmonious action the industry of the country, must, in the nature of things, add to their security. Nor is this general consideration the only obvious inducement. The reasons urged to the mechanics apply equally to them. The manufacturers, like the mechanics, of whom they form a part distinguished only by the greater extent of their labors, are spread through the country without a medium of communication and ignorant of each other's wants, capacities and pursuits. The present state of the cotton manufacture, arising from the diversified labor of the looms, compared with what it was two years since, when nearly all were employed on the same fabric, might suffice to illustrate our position; but we would call to the recollection of the manufacturer and the wool-grower the price of wool three years since, reduced below the cost of producing, and compare it with the present advance. Fluctuations like these result from a total ignorance of the supply to meet the demand, and are not more disastrous in the low years to the producer, than in the high years to the consumer. To prevent evils of this description, by a frank disclosure of each other's pursuits, by collecting the facts that belong to the subject, and diffusing them, will form a prominent object of the association.

To the great body of the agriculturists, the association will be the medium of communicating the wants of the manufacturer. But more especially to that portion of them engaged in the growing of wool. It will affiliate them with those employed in manufacturing, and by placing them both in possession of each other's wants and capacities, create an identity and uniformity of interests, a confidential relationship, which all the base insinuations of wayward and interested speculators will be unable to shake. By reaching with all necessary accuracy the amount of wool manufactured, and the amount produced, both interests will be enabled to adjust, without loss to either, the supply to the demand. It will bring each acquainted with the cost of producing, and thus enable them to settle the scale of prices upon the basis of reciprocal profit. It will extinguish a race of hungry speculators who thrive the best upon excessive fluctuations, and therefore contrive to create them—who gamble in the productions of the farmers, and raise or depress the prices as best suit the game they are playing, and who violate every moral principle by endeavoring to excite prejudice between those, who, if they thrive at all, must thrive by mutual confidence. To the farmers, therefore, and particularly the wool growers, the undersigned appeal, confident that they will not refuse to unite in the councils of their fellow laborers.

It cannot be concealed, even if it were desirable, that in the great branches of manufactures of iron, cotton and wool, reliance is placed upon the fidelity of the government, not only in maintaining in all its parts, the present judicious tariff, but in a vigilant execution of its provisions. But in our country experience has evinced that all laws, however judicious, can only be executed by the agency of public opinion. This is the police that directs its sleepless energies to the detection of offenders. It is indispensable that its agents be enlightened. The association will contribute to this object. It will exert a vigilance in detecting the movements of those who seek to abolish a system by which the capital and labor of millions in amount is now sustained.

By its suggestions it will aid the government in detecting those frauds through which the treasury is annually robbed of millions. Through the medium of its reports it will collect and diffuse a vast body of statistical facts, not more important to the members of which it is composed, than to the government itself. It will afford a medium of communication and furnish facilities for social intercourse and the interchange of kind offices between the farmer, mechanic, and manufacturer that cannot fail to be mutually useful.

Such, in brief, are among a multitude of considerations that led the convention to recommend the organization of a national association. The undersigned would beg leave to direct the attention of the friends of the American System to the efforts, the unprecedented efforts which their opponents are now making, as an additional reason for rallying in defence of their principles, the dearest interests of the country. The object is obvious, and will those by whose labor the nation is not only sustained but enriched, quietly allow themselves to be deprived of those rights to which they are entitled in return for the blessings they confer? Renouncing all political action, except so far as a maintenance of the tariff as now adjusted may be deemed political, the committee respectfully, but earnestly call upon agriculturists, mechanics, and manufacturers, to assemble in the capitals of the several states, districts, or territories, on the last Wednesday of September next, by delegation or otherwise, there to appoint delegates three times the number of the state delegation in congress, and in equal proportions among the three great laboring interests of agriculture, mechanics, and manufactures, to meet in Clinton Hall, in the city of New York, on the second Wednesday of October following, for the purpose of organizing a national association, and also to establish branches in the several states, districts and territories represented.

HENRY SHAW,
PETER H. SCHENCK, } committee.
SAM'L D. HUBBARD,

New York, August 15, 1831.

Resolved, That the hon. N. Williams, Jacob T. Walden, Zachariah Allen, and E. H. Robbins, be a committee respectively to invite the mechanics, manufacturers, and the agriculturists in the several states, and in the District of Columbia, to appoint delegates to assemble in the city of New York on the second Wednesday of October next, for the purpose of organizing a NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

New York, May 30, 1831.

In conformity to the above resolution, appointing us a committee for that purpose, we have the honor to transmit herewith a statement of the proceedings of a convention of manufacturers and others, recently held in this city, to which we invite the attention of the friends of the cause of national industry in your state.

We hope that you will personally take the proper steps to organize a state association, auxiliary to the national association, and that your state will send delegates to meet in this city, in October next, in conformity to the recommendation of the convention on that subject. Very respectfully,

N. WILLIAMS,
JACOB T. WALDEN, } committee.
ZACHARIAH ALLEN,
E. H. ROBBINS,

COMMODORE ELLIOTT.

We copy from the Pennsela Gazette the following address made by Judge Brackenridge to com. Elliott, on his departure from that station, with the reply. It is always a grateful duty for us to notice such manifestations of respect, as we have generally observed, (and we say it with national pride) that the urbanity of manners, the firmness of character, and the correct deportment of most of our naval officers, make them popular (and we think deservedly so) wherever they are, and we trust they will ever continue loved and respected by our friends, and feared by our enemies.

Departure of commodore Elliott.

This distinguished officer, on his embarkation, was accompanied to his boat by a numerous cortege, consisting of the most respectable inhabitants of the city. Just before stepping into his boat, he was addressed in the following terms by judge Brackenridge.

"Commodore—In behalf of the gentlemen present, permit me to express their regret, and to which I will add my own, that you are about to bid us adieu, and to quit the station, where you have commended with so much honor to yourself and to your country. Your deportment as an officer and a gentleman, has been such as secure our respect and esteem. In your transactions, and in your local intercourse, we have ever found you just and liberal, as well as affable and conciliatory. In your official character, we are sensible, that you have been a warm and sincere friend to Pensacola, and that you have earnestly recommended this place as the most suitable situation for a naval depot, upon which it must chiefly depend for its future growth and prosperity. For this you are entitled to the thanks of all its citizens.

"We are aware, sir, of no circumstance which can justly subject you to blame, much less to censure. Permit us to wish you a prosperous voyage, and a speedy return to the bosom of your family. We sincerely hope that, in our bidding you farewell, it is not for the last time, but that we may again have the pleasure of taking you by the hand on this spot."

The commodore made the following reply:—

"Gentlemen—The mark of respect which as citizens of Pensacola, you have been pleased to tender me, on a temporary absence, called for by a discharge of my public duty, cannot but leave in my mind a favorable impression. I pray you, therefore, gentlemen, to feel assured, and to carry the expression to each of your families, that I shall look back with pleasure to the time I have sojournd among you. I trust the day is not distant, when every cause calculated to retard the prosperity of your town will be removed. I have been delighted with its splendid situation, and have done all in my power to do justice to its naval advantages. Accept my best wishes for your individual happiness, and the reciprocated hopes, that, at some future day, if kind Providence should spare us, we may meet again on this spot."

After the boat had put off, three cheers were given from the wharf, and returned by the brave tars.

TERRIFIC HURRICANE AT BARBADOES.

The New York Post contains a letter from the consulate of the United States at Martinique, just received by the collector of New York, accompanied by a gazette extraordinary, issued from the Barbadoes Mercury office, bearing date August 13, giving an account of the ravages of one of the most terrible hurricanes of which we remember to have heard. It passed over the ill fated island of Barbadoes on the night of the 10th inst. and in eight hours left it desolate, covered with ruins and dead bodies. A letter to the American consul at Martinique, dated August 15th, says—"This island, I much fear, is ruined, and it will be impossible for us to recover."

Consulate of the United States of America, St. Pierre, Martinique, 15th Aug. 1831.

SIR—The British government brig, the "Duke of York," has this moment arrived from Barbadoes, bringing the painful intelligence that that island had been almost entirely destroyed by a hurricane on the 10th inst. Fortunately I have obtained a paper, which I now forward. It, however, gives but a poor idea of the damages and losses sustained, as appears from the memorandum on the back by a gentleman of high respectability. Private letters estimate the number of lives lost at between four and five thousand, and great fears are entertained lest the effluvia from the bodies under the ruins, (putrefaction having already commenced), may add disease to famine and want. Many of the inhabitants who have ever been accustomed to the luxuries of life, are now without clothing or shelter. Referring you to the newspaper, I have the honor to be, sir, in haste, your obedient servant.

JOHN S. MEIRCKEN.

To the collector of any port in the United States.

The following is a description of the hurricane and its devastations, which we copy from the gazette above mentioned:

"On Wednesday evening the 10th, about 7 o'clock, the wind blew very fresh at north, the clouds began to collect thick in the N. E. passing away in scuds as fast as they collected, with a rapidity of motion almost incredible. They continued to do so until about 9 o'clock, when the sky became bright, and almost a perfect calm succeeded. At about half past 10 o'clock the same fatal night, the wind again began to spring up, blowing pretty fresh from the S. W. shifting backwards and forwards from this point to N. W. and increasing in violence every instant, and continued till about five the following morning, (by which time the work of destruction had been completed), when it shifted again to S. E. and blew exceedingly strong till about half past eight, when it somewhat abated in violence and gradually died away, leaving the whole island one unvaried scene of desolation and distress. In Bridgetown there is scarcely a house which has escaped injury—hundreds have been razed to the ground, and many of the inhabitants buried under the ruins, others unroofed and partly thrown down so as to be completely untenable. Trees of immense size and strength were either uplified by the roots or bereft of their branches. All the vessels in Carlisle's bay were driven from their moorings and thrown on shore. At the outer ports in Speights, the Hole and Ostin's towns, every house has either been thrown down or rendered untenable—their inhabitants sharing the fate of the numberless victims who have been crushed to death. In the country, the whole face of nature is changed—on the plantations, almost without a single exception, the buildings, mills and negro houses have been destroyed, and many of them have suffered materially in slaves and cattle.

"The provisions which had been housed, as well as the standing corn and canes in the fields, have been so completely destroyed as scarcely to leave a vestige behind, and to add to the heart-rending picture, at this moment, many of the estates are without a single article of food of any kind. No force of language can indeed convey an idea of the horror and distress every where observable throughout the island; and which, every way the eye is turned, the heart grows dim and the heart becomes faint at the saddening and sorrowful picture. Many of the opulent and respectable families, as well as those of the middling and poorer, by this melancholy catastrophe, having thus been driven out, destitute of a covering—many who the day before were surrounded by their families and comforts, have no where to lay their heads.

"Up to this moment the number of killed has not been ascertained, nor all the unfortunate creatures who have been inhumed in the fallen dwellings taken from beneath them. The interval of time between Thursday morning and the present, has been employed by the living in burying the dead. The bodies which have been discovered have been borne through the streets to their silent and narrow homes in coffins, trees and whatever else could be obtained for them. Amidst numberless other distressing cases of this kind, it is our painful duty to notice the melancholy late of deputy-assistant-commissionary-general Flanner, who, with his wife, five children, his niece and two servants, were all buried under the ruins of their dwelling on Wednesday night, from which they were not taken until the following morning—his unhappy wife and two of the children alone have survived. At St. Ann's, many of his majesty's troops have been killed and upwards of 100 wounded by the falling of the barracks.

The most remarkable phenomenon attending the storm of Thursday morning, was the sudden gusts of wind, which, instead of thunder, invariably accompanied the most vivid flashes of lightning, and came with a force not to be withstood—Hollow, subterranean noises were also heard, and some imagine we were also visited during the night with earthquakes—this, however, we do not vouch for, as we were not sensible of them.

"We have hastily thrown together these few particulars, amid the scenes of indescribable horror and confusion, and shall continue to furnish such additional ones as may reach us. The following is a list of the vessels stranded in the bay:—Barks Irelam and Arethusa; brigs Exehange, Quebec, Decagon, Mary, Keziah, Alliance, Antoinette, Horatio Nelson, Elire; brigantines Samuel Hinds and Heroine; schra. Ark and Perseverance, mail boats Barbadoes and Montague."

Here ends the account of the Barbadoes paper, but the letter of the 15th says, of one of the vessels above mentioned:—"The American brig Antoinette is on the beach, with 200 puncheons of meal entirely lost."

SPEECH OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH.

*From the Messager des Chambres, dated July 24.
CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES—ROYAL SITTING.*

As early as eight o'clock in the morning, the crowd assembled round the chamber, the doors of which were not opened till noon; the two first rows of the reserved galleries were occupied by elegantly dressed ladies, the gentlemen were seated behind. The hall was fitted up in the same manner as for the royal sitting in 1830. On the right and left of the throne, which was erected in the place of the president's bureau, were seated the dukes of Orleans and Nemours. Below the throne, to the right and left, were the seats of the ministers, and immediately below them the marshals of France. The seats of peers were but scantily occupied. We remarked Messrs. de Broglie, de Cases, Pasquier, Roy, Portal, the duke de Choiseul, Simonville, Talara, &c. The left side, allotted to the deputies, was entirely filled. Messrs. Lafayette, Guizot, Dupin, Lafitte, Royer, Gillard, Mauguin, Ch. de Rémusat, Thiers, Vienne, and a great many other deputies took their usual seats.

A great number of strange faces was observed on all the benches. Among the new deputies we particularly remarked Messrs. Arago, Paulfre, Merilhou, &c.

At one o'clock, a salute of artillery announced the arrival of the king: the deputations went to meet him.

The queen, accompanied by her children, and madame Adelaide, was introduced into the gallery reserved for her near that of the diplomatic body.

Immediately afterwards the king, dressed in the uniform of the national guard, entered, preceded by the deputations of the two chambers, and followed by a numerous staff. Cries of "vive le roi!" rose in the hall. His majesty having uncovered, took his place on the throne, having on his right hand the duke of Orleans in the uniform of a colonel of hussars, and the duke of Nemours in that of a colonel of lanciers.

The king, still uncovered, said to the peers and deputies, "gentlemen, be seated." He then put on his hat, and delivered the opening speech in a firm voice.

"Messrs. the peers and gentlemen deputies—

"I am happy to find myself amongst you, in the centre of this place where France has received my oaths.

"Penetrated with the duties which they have imposed upon me, I shall always give effect to the national will, of which you are the constitutional organs, and I expect on your part the frank and entire co-operation which will assure to my government that strength, without which it will be impossible to answer the expectations of the nation.

"I have said, gentlemen, that the charter shall be a truth: what I have said is accomplished; the charter is the constitutional monarchy with all its conditions loyally maintained, with all its consequences frankly accepted. (Lively applause.)

"It is true that by the uniform action of all the powers of the state, we shall put an end to those prolonged agitations which feed the guilty hopes of those who work for the return of the fallen dynasty, or of those who dream of the chimera of a republic. (Loud applause from the chamber here interrupted his majesty, and loud cries of 'long live the king!') Divided upon the object, they agree, however, in the will to overthrow, no matter at what price, the public order, founded by the revolution of July, but their efforts shall be disconcerted or punished. (Fresh applause.)

"In calling me to the throne, France has willed that the royalty shall be national; it did not desire that royalty should be powerless. A government without strength would not suit the desires of a great nation.

"I have just returned from travelling in France; the proofs of affection which I have received in this journey have very deeply touched my heart. The wishes of France are present to my thoughts: you will aid me to accomplish them. Order shall be protected; liberty be guaranteed; and every factious effort confounded and repressed. Thus, that confidence will be renewed for the future which alone can re-establish the prosperity of the country.

"It is to carry this into effect, it is to consolidate more and more the constitutional monarchy, that I have caused to be prepared the different projects of laws which will be proposed to you.

"You will, I hope, recognize in that which has for its object the decision of a great constitutional question reserved by the charter for the examination of the chambers, that I always seek to put our institutions in harmony with the interests and wishes of the nation, enlightened by experience and matured by time.

"You will have likewise to examine, conformably to the promise of the charter, the projects of the laws destined to complete the departmental and municipal organization, to determine the responsibility of ministers, and of other agents of government, and to regulate the liberty of instruction.

"Some other projects of laws upon the recruiting of the army, upon the penal code, upon finance, and on different public interests, will be equally submitted to you.

"I admit the whole extent of the sufferings which the actual commercial crisis has caused to the nation: I am afflicted at it, and I admire the courage with which they have been borne. I hope that they now approach their determination, and that soon the consolidation of order will give the necessary security to the circulation of capital, and restore to our commerce and industry that spirit and activity which, under a government always guided by the national interests, can only be momentarily interrupted.

"The state of our finances is satisfactory: if our wants are great, abundant resources are exhibited for their aid.

"The annual budgets for 1831-1832 will be presented to you in the opening of this session.

"Reductions have been made in the different branches of the administration. They would have been carried still farther, if the increase of our means of defence, and the development of our military force, had not, up to this time, imposed upon us great sacrifices. (Bravos.)

"I shall hasten to diminish this burden as soon as I have acquired the certainty of accomplishing it without compromising the dignity and safety of France.

"This certainly will depend upon a general disarmament. France desires this, the governments of Europe will feel its necessity,—the interest of all requires it.

"I have the satisfaction to announce to you, that up to the present time I have not been under the necessity of employing all the resources which the chamber had placed at my disposal.

"Since the revolution of July, France has regained in Europe the rank which belongs to her. Nothing, henceforth, shall wrest it from her. (Bravos.) Never was her independence better guaranteed: our national guards, who are worth armies—our armies, the fit depositories of the inheritance of our ancient glory—will defend this independence as they have hitherto protected our internal peace and liberty.

"I have to felicitate myself upon the amicable relations which foreign governments preserve with mine.

"We ought to seek to preserve the bonds of friendship, so natural and so ancient, which unite France to the United States of America. A treaty has terminated a controversy for a long time pending between two countries which have such claims for mutual sympathy.

"Other treaties have been concluded between the Mexican and Haytian republics.

"All these acts shall be communicated to you as soon as they have been ratified, and when the financial stipulations which they contain shall be submitted to your sanction.

"I have given new orders to our cruisers to assure the execution of the law of last session, for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade.

"As soon as I demanded it, the troops of the emperor of Austria have evacuated the Roman states. A real am-cestry, the abolition of confiscation, and important changes in the administrative and judicial system, have been given. Such are the ameliorations which will, we hope, assure to those states, that their tranquillity shall be no longer troubled, and that the equilibrium of Europe will be preserved by the maintenance of their independence.

"The kingdom of the Low Countries, as constituted by the treaties of 1814 and 1815, has ceased to exist. The independence of Belgium, and her separation from Holland, have been acknowledged by the great powers. The king of the Belgians will not form part of the German confederacy. The fortresses raised to menace France, and not to protect Belgium, will be demolished. (Loud applause here again interrupted the speech.) A neutrality recognized by Europe, and the friendship of France, will assure our neighbors an independence of which we have been the first support.

"The power which rules in Portugal has committed outrages on Frenchmen—it has violated against them the laws of justice and humanity; to obtain redress vainly demanded, our ships appeared before the Tagus. I have received intelligence that they have forced the entrance of that river; satisfaction, up to that time refused, has been since offered. The Portuguese ships of war are now in our power; and the tri-colored flag floats under the walls of Lisbon. (Great applause, and cries of 'long live the king!')

"A sanguinary and furious conflict is prolonged in Poland. The conflict excites the liveliest emotions in the heart of Europe. I am endeavoring to put an end to it. After having offered my mediation, I have sought to induce that of the great powers. I have wished to stop the effusion of blood; to preserve the south of Europe from the evils of the contagion which this war is propagating; and, above all, to assure for Poland, whose courage has recalled the old affections of France (cries of 'bravo,') the nationality which has resisted all time and its vicissitudes. (Loud applause.)

"You will doubtless judge, that in these difficult negotiations, the true interests of France, the interests of her prosperity, of her power and her honor, have been defended with perseverance and dignity. Europe is now convinced of the loyalty of our disposition, and of the sincerity of our wishes for the preservation of peace; but it is also with the demonstration of our strength to sustain a war, that we rely, should we be called upon to resist unjust aggression.

"It is in persisting in the political system followed up to this time, that we shall be able to assure our country of the benefits of the revolution which has saved our liberties, and to preserve them from new commotions, which would at once compromise our existence and the civilization of the world.

"We approach, gentlemen, the great anniversary. I shall with satisfaction see you joined with me in its solemnities. May they be grave and touching commemorations, to awaken sentiments of union and concord, which can alone constitute our triumph."

The speech appeared to produce a great effect upon the assembly.

The sitting was closed in the midst of cries of "long live the king."

The king was received throughout his passage from the palace to the chamber with great popular applause. He was dressed in the national guard's uniform, and attended by a grand military cortege, composed of the marshals of France, and a number of the other general officers.

The king left the palais royal at one o'clock and departed from the chamber of Paris at two o'clock.

END OF THE BELGIC REPUBLIC.

REGENT'S SPEECH TO THE BELGIAN CONGRESS.

"Gentlemen,—By your decree of the 24th February last, and conformably to the 55th article of the constitution, you did me the honor of appointing me regent of Belgium. On the 25th I had the honor of being admitted into the bosom of the congress, and of solemnly taking the oath prescribed by the 56th article of our social compact.

"My first cares were to compose a ministry. I called to it the same individuals to whom the preceding government had entrusted the branches of the general administration. It was in confirming in their high functions the same men who had so perfectly aided in acquiring and consolidating our liberty that I wished to give to the nation a first pledge of my entire adhesion to the principles of our revolution, and of my firm resolution to secure the enjoyment of all its consequences.

"I caused to be notified to the governments of France and England the decree of the 24th February, which nominated me regent of Belgium, and credential letters were delivered to Belgic agents at these two courts with the title and rank of ministers plenipotentiary.

"The French government admitted, without hesitation, our minister, who took rank along with foreign diplomatic agents accredited to the courts of the palais royal. His majesty Louis Philip, did me the honor of addressing to me by his autograph letter of the 19th of March last, congratulations on my accession to the regency, and expressed to me at the same time, and in formal terms, the lively and invariable interest which he takes in Belgium.

"It was by this first act that Louis Philip began to realize the promises which he had made me in February last, when I had the honor of taking leave of him. He then said on taking me by the hand, 'Tell the Belgic nation that I give them my hand in the person of the president of the congress, and that the Belgians may always reckon on my friendship.'

"We were not so fortunate with the cabinet of St. James's.—Our minister was not received with anything but civility (effusion) by the English ministry; and the national honor not permitting me to leave him longer in an equivocal situation, I ordered him to be recalled.

"The ministry, in the mean time, wishing to put an end to the unsatisfactory result of the provisional state of a regency, and to close by a definitive government, had recourse to our agent in London instructions to sound the dispositions of his royal highness the prince of Saxe Coburg, but obstacles of mere etiquette paralyzed the intended effects.

"In the interval other men were called to the ministry, and the new ministers followed the indirect proceedings of their predecessors.—I then stated on that subject is known to you. You know, gentlemen, how the happy iteration has been brought about, at which we are this day present.

"I shall not, gentlemen, detain you with any observations on the acts of my regency. I shall confine myself to saying, that the effervescence of the passions incidental to our revolutionary state, the stagnation of commercial business, anxiety about the future fortunes of our country, have brought about events and caused arrangements which have prevailed and the government from occupying itself as efficaciously as would have been desirable, with the institutions which are destined to complete the work of our political regeneration.

"In the state of threatened hostilities with our neighbors, the government was under the necessity of devoting its chief attention to the army. The infantry has been considerably increased and organized the formation of the cavalry has been completed, the artillery has been put on a respectable footing, the service of the commissariat, of the hospitals, and of transports, has been secured; and, finally, by the side of the regular army another army is formed in the ranks of the civic guard, equally impatient to measure its strength with the enemy.

"The concert of all the citizens, who, forgetting the spirit of party, are going to raise themselves to one point, will not contribute less to the courage and excellent spirit of our army, to support negotiations, to obtain an honorable peace, to consolidate our independence, and, if need be, to defend the integrity of our territory.

"Our finances are in as prosperous a state as circumstances would permit, and the levy of the taxes is effected as easily as in profound peace.

"If I have been, gentlemen, happy enough to aid in leading into port the vessel of the state, (for I regard the accession of prince Leopold to the throne of Belgium, and the recognition of him by the majority of the great powers of Europe, as the termination of our glorious revolution and the establishment of our liberties), if I have been able to accomplish any good, far be it from me to ascribe the merit to myself. No, gentlemen, I claim only the smallest share; for I confess, in the face of the nation, all Europe, that without the special protection of Providence, no human prudence could have foreseen either the events or their results, nor could it have directed them in the interests of our country.

"It was likewise in the noble firmness of the congress, and in the wisdom of our deliberations, that I have found the most powerful support.—Permit me, therefore, gentlemen, to address to you the expression of my lively and sincere gratitude.

"But, gentlemen, let us declare that our task has been rendered very easy, by the excellent qualities of the Belgic people—a people as submissive to the laws, as docile to the voice of the chiefs who deserve its confidence, as it has shown itself jealous of its rights and impatient of the yoke of arbitrary power—of that people so courageous in battle, so firm in its resolutions—of that people essentially moral, of whom history will say, that during eleven months of revolution, and of privations among the most numerous clans, with the exception of some excesses evidently provoked, there were never fewer crimes; of that people whose devotion and love will always be the recompense of a good government.

"It is with the most perfect security, gentlemen, that I commit the destiny of this good people to the hands of a prince whose noble character and private virtues are the best guarantees for those which he shall display from the throne.

"With the most heartfelt emotion I may now say, I have seen the dawn of happiness opening on my country. I have lived long enough.

"I deposit in your hands, gentlemen, the powers which you had conferred on me, and I beg you to be so good as to record my declaration."

BELGIC FORTRESSES.

A line of strong fortresses on the southern frontier of Belgium, had been established by the great allied powers, to keep France in check. These are to be razed, as appears by the following protocol, officially transmitted to the plenipotentiary from France:

Protocol of a conference held at the foreign office, April 17, 1831, between the plenipotentiaries of Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia.

The plenipotentiaries of Austria, of Great Britain, of Prussia, and of Russia, having met, have directed their attention to the fortresses constructed since the year 1815, in the kingdom of the Netherlands, at the expense of the four courts; and to the determinations which it would become necessary to take with respect to these fortresses, when the separation of Belgium from Holland shall have been definitively effected.

Having carefully examined this question, the plenipotentiaries of the four courts were unanimously of opinion, that the new situation in which Belgium would be placed, with her neutrality acknowledged and guaranteed by France, ought to change the system of military defence which had been adopted for the kingdom of the Netherlands; that the fortresses in question would be too numerous not to make it difficult for the Belgians to provide for their maintenance and defence; that, moreover, the unanimously admitted inviolability of the Belgian territory offered a security which had not previously existed; finally, that a part of these fortresses constructed under different circumstances, might at present be razed.

In consequence, the plenipotentiaries have finally decided, that as soon as a government shall exist in Belgium, recognized by the powers taking part in the conferences of London, a negotiation shall be set on foot between the four powers and that government, for the purpose of selecting such of the said fortresses as should be demolished.

SPEECH OF KING LEOPOLD.

Prince Leopold, on his way to Brussels, was the following day received with the marks of respect and esteem which he deserved on account of his installation, and report of his speech on the occasion, is copied from the Moniteur Belge:

Brussels, July 22. After the king with the procession had arrived at Brussels, and proceeded to the platform, where the congress was ready to receive him, according to the programme before published, the president of the congress having caused the acclamations of the multitude to cease, declared the sitting opened, and addressing the king, said—

“Sir—We are met to receive the oath presented by the constitution. I shall first invite the king to speak, who will resign his authority into the hands of the congress.”

The king then rose, and turning towards the king, delivered the following speech which has been already published.

M. de Gerlache standing opposite to M. S. de Chokier, replied to him in the following terms—

“Sir, the right—When I told you five months ago, in the midst of the congress that elected the temporary head of the nation, your nomination was ratified by the unanimous acclamations of your former colleagues, and the whole Belgic nation—that this spontaneous elevation was a tribute paid to your virtues by your equals and professors of profound gratitude for the services that you have rendered to the country, and an appeal to new services—we could easily judge from your preceding conduct, what line you would have followed in the elevated situation to which your colleagues and the whole nation raised you.

“To have enjoyed great power without having for a moment abused it—to have remained always the same under the most trying causes, is a fact that will appear quite rational to those who know your character. I merely repeat what every body says. History will one day respect the conciliatory part you have acted amidst divergent opinions and fermenting parties. It will say that the national assembly, desiring to place in the hands of an individual, powers till then too much divided, sought for one who should direct, and unify, who should lay the axe and the confidence of all, and be willing to devote himself for his country. You, sir, were this man. History will say that this man having exercised a part of the royal prerogative during a revolution of five months, has not lost a single friend or made a single enemy.

“It is in the name of the congress, and of the nation, that I thank you. I venture to say that you have fulfilled our expectations, which you have just resigned to this assembly.” Loud acclamations followed this speech, after which the constitution having been read by Mr. Ch. Vilain XIV, and the king having taken the oath, and signed the provisoire verbal, the president, &c. also signed it, during which time the king took his seat on the throne.

The nine seats which were in front of the throne were removed and his majesty was alone on the upper platform; the right was below; to the right and left of the king were the generals and ministers, who were at first behind his arm chair. The members of the bureau placed themselves on the right and left of the throne; the members of the congress were standing and attentive. The scene was entirely changed, and the new coup d’œil greatly struck the crowd, whose acclamations redoubled. Silence being proclaimed, his majesty delivered the following speech—

“Gentlemen.—The solemn act which has been performed completes the social edifice: commenced by the patriation of the nation and its representatives. The state is definitively constituted in the form prescribed by the constitution itself. This constitution emanates entirely from you; and this circumstance, owing to the situation in which the country has been placed, seems to me to be fortunate. It prevents collisions which might arise to the detriment of the different powers and impair the harmony that ought to prevail between them. The promptness with which I have repaired to Belgium must have convinced you that, faithful to my word, I have delayed coming among you only till the obstacles which opposed my accession to the throne could be removed by your selves.

“The various considerations which have been adduced in the important discussion which produced this result, will be the subject of my most serious deliberation.

“I have received, from my entrance on the Belgic territory, marks of affection and good will, for which I still feel equal emotion and gratitude.

“At the sight of the population, ratifying by their acclamations the act of the national representation, I could not but be convinced that I was called by the wish of the country, and I felt all the duties that such a reception imposes on me.

“A Belgian by your adoption, I shall also make it my duty to be as Belgian by my policy.

“I have also been received with extreme kindness in that part of the French territory through which I passed, and I have considered these testimonies of good will, which I highly value, as a pledge of the relations of confidence which ought to subsist between the two countries.

“The result of every political communion is to affect for a time the welfare of the people. I am therefore anxious to direct my immediate attention and most active solicitude to the development of the commerce and manufactures, which are the vivifying principles of national prosperity. The relations which I have formed in the countries which are our neighbors will second, I hope, the efforts which I shall immediately make to obtain this end; but I take pleasure in believing that the Belgic people, so remarkable both for good sense and resignation, will give credit to the government for the difficulties of a position connected with a state of distress, which at this moment affects all Europe.

“I intend to avail myself of every kind of information, to encourage all the means of amelioration; and it is in the places themselves that I have already begun to do so, and that I intend to collect the information which is the best calculated to guide the cause of the government in this respect.

“Gentlemen, I have accepted therefore what you offered me only with a view to perform a task equally noble and useful—that of consolidating the institutions of a generous people, and to maintain its independence. My heart knows no other ambition than that of seeing you happy. On so affecting a solemnity, I must also express to you one of my most ardent wishes. The nation grows from a violent crisis. May this day efface all hatred, stifle all resentments; may one only thought animate all Belgians—that of a frank and sincere union.

“I shall esteem myself happy to concert in this noble result, which has been so well prepared by the wisdom of the venerated man, who has devoted himself with such noble patriotism in the salvation of his country.”

“Gentlemen, I hope to be a pledge of peace and tranquility to Belgium; but the expectations of man are not infallible. If notwithstanding all sacrifices to preserve peace, we should be threatened with war, I should not hesitate to appeal to the Belgic people, and I hope that it will, without exception, rally around its sovereign for the defence of the country, and the national independence.”

After the king had declared the sitting closed, and the procession about to return to the palace, his majesty would not again mount his horse, but proceeded to his palace on foot, amidst the acclamations of the crowd.

After the inauguration, the deputies met at the palace of the nation. M. de Gerlache announced that the king would receive the deputies, (those of one province at a time), at 8 o’clock; and that the congress is invited to be present at a sedes at St. Gudule to-morrow at noon.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

On the 1st inst. at the triennial meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, Stephen Girard, esq. officiated as chairman, and John Potter, esq. of South Carolina, as secretary. A comprehensive and luminous report was submitted in writing, by Nicholas Biddle, esq., the president, in behalf of the directors of the bank, showing, in a masterly manner, the condition, the character, and the importance of this great national institution. This able and instructive document will, no doubt, be published. After it was heard, the following resolution was moved by Horace Binney, esq., and the gentlemen who were accordingly appointed a committee, made, in the afternoon, the annexed report, which was adopted without dissent.

Resolved, That the communication made by the board of directors to this meeting, be referred to a committee of seven to report thereon, and that the same committee be authorized to report upon such matters as they may deem to be interesting to the stockholders.

The committee appointed were—H. Binney, Robert Ralston, R. L. Colt, Paul Beck, Manuel Eyre, Joseph Humphill, James Ronalson.

The committee to whom was referred the communication from the board of directors—

REPORT:

That they have verified by a comparison with the tabular statements of the bank, the material facts reported in this interesting paper, and find them to be correct. The reasoning by which the board of directors has deduced from the comparison between the bank and the present prosperity of our country, and has sustained the principles which have regulated the administration of its concerns for many years, requires no comment. All who read the communication, which it is presumed will be given to the public, will discern, for themselves, not merely the actual propriety of this institution, greater and more stable than at any former epoch, but the manner in which its great public and private trusts have been performed, its public trust towards the government and people of the United States, and its immediate private trust towards the stockholders, and those who have confided to it their funds and their credit. The perfect harmony of these interests, under the operations of a bank organized as the Bank of the United States has been by law, and administered as it now is, is believed to be demonstrated; and it would be waste and superfluity in the committee to attempt to add either to the cogency or the variety of the considerations, by which the board of directors has completed the demonstration. The committee will not, however, deny themselves the satisfaction of submitting to the stockholders a few of the inferences, with the communication, taken in connection with the past and known history of the United States and the bank, appears to justify.

1st. That the bank, at its origin, and at great cost and sacrifice, effectually promoted the restoration of specie payments; and that its able administration for several years past, has finally established a currency, as universally sound within the United States as can ever be expected, or as is essential to the general welfare; and that this has occurred in a community, whose currency, for a part of the time, has felt the influence of active, though temporary causes of derangement, and is at all times exposed to danger, by the number and variety of its banking institutions.

2d. That the bank, through the whole course of its operations, has effectually assisted the treasury in the collection and distribution of the public revenue; and that of late years it has been signally efficient in preventing the discharge of the public debt from disturbing the operations of commerce, or the course and value of pecuniary investments.

3d. That the bank, by its judicious intervention in the business of domestic exchanges, has given such facility and regularity to this indispensable instrument of internal trade, that neither the want nor the cost of it any longer exists, to embarrass any operation whatever.

4th. That by its extensive operations in foreign exchange, the bank, for several years held in its hands, and has at times used, with striking effect, the power of arresting all sudden and violent fluctuations in this branch of commerce, and, promises, by the same means, greatly to economize the use of the precious metals in the future trade of the United States with China and India.

5th. That these public services of the Bank of the United States, are the peculiar result of an institution organized and administered as this has been; that the organization of any bank or body whatever, essentially different, would fail in the attainment of most or all of the great objects adverted to; and that an efficient administration is alone necessary to develop the powers and public uses of the bank in its existing form.

6th. That while the bank has been administered for several years upon these principles, which are demonstrably the best both for the public and the stockholders, yet that adverse circumstances at earlier days, and among them, chiefly, the cost and sacrifice attending the restoration of an unsound currency, which an immense loss, that would otherwise have fallen upon the treasury and people of the United States, was assumed by the bank, have prevented the stockholders from deriving the usual returns of money invested at the lowest rate of interest—the original subscribers not having realized an interest equal to five per cent. per annum, paid semi-annually, and subsequent purchasers of the stock at an advance, having generally received no interest.

7th. That the stock of this bank is distributed in such amounts, to such a variety of persons, and for such different purposes and trusts, that all charge or allegation of monopoly by any body of men whatever, is shown to be without foundation; whereas the same circumstances prove the deep and critical interest which widows, orphans, charitable societies, and other trusts, have in the prosperity and continuance of the bank.

8th. That the welfare of this bank is now identified with that of the people of the United States, from those who wield the largest operations of commerce, to him whose interest in the currency does not go beyond the just compensation for his daily labor.

These inferences your committee believe to be sound, and that no material interest which they may have as stockholders, ought to prevent them from using every proper and efficient means to bring them forth. Their proof may be made manifest to all who know the history of the bank and the country, by perusing the communication of the board of directors.

There is one other subject within range of the reference to the committee, upon which they deem it their duty to report.

The charter of this bank will expire by its present limitation on the 2d of March, 1832, and there will consequently be, at one triennial meeting after the present, and that at a point of time too near the expiration of the present charter, to authorize measures in regard to its renewal. It is fit, in the opinion of your committee, that before that meeting, power should be given to the board of directors, to prosecute them if they think proper. This power should be large and definitive, not merely to solicit a renewal, but to abide, if they think right, by the terms on which congress may impose. A board of directors, who have administered the bank in the manner detailed in their recent communication, are safe depositories of the entire power of the stockholders on the subject of a renewal of the charter.

With these remarks the committee terminate their duty, by offering to the adoption of the meeting the following resolutions:

Resolved, That an administration, by which the interest of the stockholders and public are successfully blended, is that system which is properly characteristic of a bank of the United States; and that to the present able administration of the bank, the stockholders and the public are indebted for the full, efficient, and profitable development of such a system.

Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be presented to the board of directors for their comprehensive and lucid report upon the operations and present condition of the bank, with an assurance that the stockholders place an unabating confidence in their wisdom and fidelity in the further administration of its concerns.

Resolved, That the confidence of the stockholders continues to be in the able and faithful president of the institution, and that their thanks be given to him for the enlarged and liberal views which have distinguished his administration of the bank, and for the skill with which he has united in its operations, a regard to the public welfare with a steady support of the rights and interests of the stockholders.

Resolved, That if at any time before the next triennial meeting of the stockholders, it shall be deemed expedient by the president and directors to apply to congress for a renewal of the charter of the bank, they are hereby authorized to make such application in the name and behalf of the stockholders, and to accept such terms of renewal as they may consider just and proper.

(Signed) Hor. Binney, Manuel Eyrer,
Robt. Eaton, Joseph Hemphill,
Rowell L. Colt, James Ronaldson,
Paul Beck, Jr.

Bank of the United States, Sept. 1, 1831.

Resolved, That the reports adopted by the stockholders, be referred to the president and directors, for the purpose of being printed and circulated in pamphlet form for the benefit of the stockholders.

The New York Daily Advertiser says, that the following is the substance of the report of Mr. Biddle to the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, at their late triennial meeting in Philadelphia:

Number of stockholders, 4148. The government stockholders having paid for their stock have taken it up.

1469 stockholders own from one to ten shares each; 900 females own 29,000 shares; 320 trustees and executors, 20,000; 126 corporations and charitable societies, 14,300.

More than one-fourth is held in the above manner.

The capital is distributed between the bank in Philadelphia and 25 branches. Since 1817, two branches have been discontinued, and nine new ones created—making an increase of seven in fourteen years. These proceeded from thirty-eight applications.

The situation of the bank on the 1st of August, 1831, was as follows:

Public debt, fund,	3,800,000
Discounted on personal security,	41,600,000
— on funded security,	800,000
— on domestic exchange,	14,400,000

A LETTER FROM MAJOR LEWIS.

Washington, 31st August, 1831.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GLOBE:

Sir,—Mr. Branch, in a letter dated 22d inst. to the editor of the "Roanoke Advocate," written for publication, says he told major Eaton that if he "would obtain the consent of his brother-in-law, major Lewis, to read a confidential correspondence which passed between major L. and myself, in the winter of 1827-28, on this 'disturbing subject,' he would then be convinced of the distinctness and correctness of my course, &c."

"I might have gone further, and said that major Lewis, in 1827-28, when there could be no unworthy motive to mislead either of us, considered Mrs. Eaton an unsafe associate for his daughter, although he was now endeavoring to induce general Jackson to drive the out of the cabinet, because I would not compel my daughter to associate with her."

I will not stop to inquire by what right a gentleman, and a man of honor, presumes to speak of a correspondence, considered by both parties to be confidential, without asking or obtaining permission. Upon that point I leave him to his own reflections. As to the circumstances adverted to in that correspondence, I have to say, that the gossip tales of this city had reached me in Nashville, and not having the means to ascertain their truth or falsehood, residing, as I did, 500 miles from Washington, it was natural for me to derive information from some friend on the subject, before I permitted my daughter to reside in the family. Major Eaton, under whose protection I placed her while going to school in the city, at that time boarded with major O'Neal, the father of Mr. and Mrs. Eaton.

When I came here, in 1829, I found Mrs. Timberlake the wife of major Eaton, whom I believe to be one of the purest men living. That he had joined himself for life to that lady, was, to me, the strongest evidence of her purity; and having been an opportunity to inquire into the reports I had heard, I satisfied myself that they were totally without foundation. Had Mr. Branch been disposed to tell the whole truth, he would have said, that I had become so completely satisfied, with regard to the subject of my inquiry, that when I brought the same daughter to this city again, one of my first acts was to take her to visit Mrs. Eaton, at whose house we spent much of our time.

The honor of attempting to degrade and drive from society the wife of a confiding and deserving friend upon reports, which to use his own language, "tell the whole truth, he would have said, that I had become so completely satisfied, with regard to the subject of my inquiry, that when I brought the same daughter to this city again, one of my first acts was to take her to visit Mrs. Eaton, at whose house we spent much of our time.

I have only to add, that the charge of my "endeavoring to drive him (Mr. Branch) out of the cabinet, because he would not compel his daughters to associate with Mrs. Eaton," is wholly unfounded; and if Mr. Branch did not know it to be so, he might have known it, if he had made the proper inquiry.

I am, with much respect, your obedient servant.

W. B. LEWIS.

CATHOLICS IN TURKEY.

To those acquainted with the character heretofore committed, upon the slightest pretext, in the name of religion, upon the Catholics in the Turkish empire, and the fanaticism which often excluded them from the exercise of their religious ceremonies in places constructed by them for religious worship, as well as the exactions practiced upon them by the subordinate officers of the porte, and their constant liability of being deprived of their property without the possibility of redress, the following document, will be read with surprise and pleasure.

Translation of the imperial diploma, delivered by the sublime porte, to the Armenian Catholic bishop, at the beginning of the month of Shishan, in the year of Hegira, 1250, corresponding to January 1831, of the Christian era,—from a copy in which the preamble was omitted.

The tributary Catholic subjects of the sublime porte, hitherto deprived of a chief, (bishop), were, from ancient times, dependent upon the Greek or Armenian Catholic dogmas not being conformable to those of the religion professed by the Greek and Armenian nations, the Catholics had to attend the church of the Franks, where their marriages being solemnized, and sacraments administered by other priests, they could not properly observe the precepts of their religion. The sublime porte having discovered that Catholic subjects under our imperial protection have long suffered under these painful restrictions; and considering that it is the duty of the sovereign father of all subjects, to provide for their safety and spiritual peace, we have resolved to relieve our Catholic subjects from those restrictions and sufferings, by permitting them to worship in the churches destined for them, in order that, hereafter they may not be compelled to attend the churches of the Franks; and, in consequence of an imperial rescript, dated the 21st of the month of Rigel, of this year, 1250, we have conferred the title of bishop upon the most illustrious Catholic elect of the nations of the Meshik. The priest Agob, son of Emanuel, and subject of the sublime porte, chosen and elected by the Catholics themselves, and the bearer of the present diploma, on condition that he will pay, in advance, to the imperial treasury, the sum of fifty thousand aspres by way of price due to the miri; and that he will, besides, pay annually to the miri, a rent of three hundred and thirty-eight thousand aspres. And, by this imperial rescript we have ordained and do ordain, that, generally, all the Catholics of this residence and empire, and each of them, in particular, great and small, do recognise the aforesaid priest Agob, for their bishop; that they do not transgress his commands or disregard his decisions on any subject connected with the dogmas of their religion. That no others do meddle with his affairs. That no one interfere in cases where incumbents having incurred the penalty of removal, their places shall be given to others. The dismissal or promotion of priests shall only take place by virtue of an official representation by the bishops to the sublime porte. Priests who are not provided with a special authorization, shall have no power to consecrate forbidden marriages with infidels or Franks, (these marriages were at all times forbidden by political enactments, though not by religious regulations.)

If any woman of ill fame shall elope from their houses, or if any female ray shall sue for separation, or is to be separated from her husband, no one but the bishop or his vicar shall have power to interfere; and in all cases, of binding or dissolving the matrimonial bond, in all proceedings for divorce, and in contestations between two rays, the bishop shall take cognizance of the same, and reconcile the parties. The police officers shall not interpose, nor impose any pecuniary penalty, to compel the taking of oaths in the mode prescribed by their religion. The estates of ecclesiastics of said nations, dying without heirs, the property of religious females secured by the bishop on account of the miri, shall not be interfered with by any officers of the treasury. What ever shall have been bequeathed by any priests, women or other subjects of the Catholic religion, in behalf of the poor of their churches, or of the bishop to collect the sums due to the miri and to pay them over to the bishop, shall not in any manner be impeded in any place they may visit. No opposition shall be offered to the bishop's hearing his staff of command, or riding any animal he may please; nor shall his domestics be molested, either on account of their dress or costume, or while conveying to the bishop's house, food or the produce of the vine, honey, oil or such other things as are usually given by virtue of the title of possession. No duties of gazel or averiz, nor any other duties, shall be levied, either on the person of the bishop or on any others who may visit the porte by his order, nor upon any individual in his service. Suits brought against him shall only be heard and decided in the audience room of the sublime porte. The bishop will, according to custom, take possession of the vineyards, gardens and other real property bequeathed to the poor of the church, as also of effects belonging to the church, and no one shall meddle with them. If there should be any among the priests, who remove from one place to another without the permission of the bishop, or create any disturbance, they shall be reprimanded and punished through the intervention of the bishop. The Greek and Armenian patriarchs, or any of their dependents, shall in no manner disturb the bishop in matters relating to his religion, nor meddle with his other affairs. Let it so be known and full faith given to the imperial seal.

THE COFFEE TRADE.

We have been favored by a very intelligent correspondent in Boston, with the annexed statement of the growth and consumption of coffee throughout the world. In the accompanying note he says, "It is as correct as such general statements can well be made. It was prepared some three months since, when you loaned me the London brokers' pamphlet concerning coffee, and its accuracy has been tested by every subsequent arrival from Europe, bringing accounts of the reduced stocks of coffee in all the European ports."

COFFEE FOR 1831. Annual production.

Java now produces	lbs. 37,000,000
Sumatra and other parts of India	12,000,000
Brazil	60,000,000
Spanish Main	8,000,000
Cuba	48,000,000
Porto Rico	10,000,000
St. Domingo	23,000,000
British West Indies	33,000,000
Dutch West Indies	10,000,000
French West and East Indies	13,000,000

Total yearly production lbs. 250,000,000

Annual consumption.

Holland and the Netherlands consume	lbs. 88,000,000
Great Britain and Ireland	27,000,000
Germany and the Baltic	45,000,000
France, Spain, Portugal, and the Mediterranean	60,000,000
The United States	50,000,000

Present yearly consumption lbs. 305,000,000
The stocks of coffee in Europe, Dec. 31, 1830, were lbs. 80,000,000
Do. do. in the United States, less than 10,000,000

Together 90,000,000
Whole growth of 1831 250,000,000

Consumption in Europe and America, 1831 lbs. 340,000,000
205,000,000

Estimated stocks in Europe and America at end of year 35,000,000
Of which there will be locked up in the United States 30,000,000

Leaving in all Europe, 31st Dec. 1831, only lbs. 15,000,000

The growth of coffee has yearly decreased from five to eight million pounds since 1828 (when it was greatest), and must continue to decrease two or three years more. It cannot be much increased until three or four years after it reaches 10 or 15 dollars in the West Indies. The very low price of sugar in all countries adds to the increase of coffee consumption.

	Import.	Consumed.
1826	133,000,000	141,000,000
1827	202,000,000	181,000,000
1828	210,000,000	205,000,000
1829	202,000,000	214,000,000
1830	101,000,000	212,000,000

The increase of production of coffee from 1828 to '30, was 30 per cent.
The increase of consumption from 1826 to 1830, was 60 per cent.
The increase of production has stopped, while the increase of consumption goes on and will go on, till checked by high prices.

In 1816 coffee in Hamburg was 6mk bee per lb. being 15 cts. per lb.
In 1817 it rose in Hamburg to 8 " being 16 cts.
In 1818 it rose in Hamburg to 16 " being 32 cts.
It thence gradually fell to 12 " being 25 cts.
And did not go below 10 (till after '30) being 20 cts.
Coffee continued to fall in Hamburg till 1830, when it was worth 3 1/2 mk bee per lb. being about 25 cts. per lb.
In February 1831, it was worth 4 1/2 mk bee about 30 cts.
And had not then reached by 30 per cent. the price from which it started in 1816.

The stocks of coffee in Europe.

In 1828 December 31st, were	lbs. 74,000,000
1829	87,000,000
1830	107,000,000
1831	151,500,000
1832	109,000,000
1830	80,000,000

And as shown in the foregoing will be in 1831, only 15,000,000

*By Europe is meant the Netherlands, England, France, Hamburg, Bremen, Copenhagen, St. Petersburg and Trieste.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 3—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, SEPT. 17, 1831.

[VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,043]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our affections! We have been sorely distressed because of the great amount of matter on hand, that must be published—and, in ridding ourselves of one infliction, by disposing of Mr. Crawford's long statement, we hoped much!—but lo, major Estlin has published an address two or three times as long as Mr. Crawford's, and others must follow it! What can we do? We will do all that we can; and, with the aid of extra sheets and a close type, preserve the record of things as they happen, "without favor or affection."

We owe due respects to the editor of the Albany Argus, and shall fully pay them—as soon as time is allowed to seek for and obtain certain papers.

Mr. Crawford's long expected reply has appeared. We feel but little, if any, interest in the things discussed—but, judging from what we hear, this paper seems to have fallen much short of the expectations of all the various parties to its contents. We insert it of necessity, that the record may be kept up; but do not observe that it has a single fact of striking importance, though redundant with severe expressions and rather coarse terms—and some imprecations that seem altogether uncalled for. In our poor judgment—and in this matter we certainly speak without feeling—the friends of Mr. Crawford ought to have suppressed this publication, in respect to the character and stoneling which he once held before the people of the United States; and it is probable that the delay has been caused by attempts to do so—but some politicians are "soul-less"—and always ready to sacrifice the most sacred principles to self-gratification, in the pursuit of political opponents.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" Since writing the preceding paragraph, we meet with the following on the same subject:

From the National Gazette—"Mr. Crawford's reply to Mr. Cullison is really pitiable. His understanding and taste must be greatly impaired, or he was much overrated when he was a party-idol. Our readers would not think the reply entitled to the space which it would occupy in our paper."

From the Richmond Whig. "We finish Mr. Crawford's address to-day, and to do so, are obliged to exclude much other matter. We have had time only to give a hasty glance at it, and do not mean therefore to speak of its merits—we however, have seen enough of its style, to authorise us to express our gratification, that Mr. Crawford has recovered the dignity befitting the occasion and his character."

From the New York Commercial Advertiser. "The residue of Mr. Crawford's strictures upon the vice president arrived this morning, and the publication therefore is completed in this paper. We have not published this precious specimen of imbecile garrulity because it possesses either interest or value, but simply to maintain our own character for impartiality, which must not be questioned. Fortunately this country is yet so free that nobody is obliged to read it."

"THE FREE TRADE" CONVENTION. "In the midst of counsellors there is safety." No less than thirty delegates to the convention, to be held at Philadelphia, have been appointed at a meeting held in the city of New York—and a legion of delegates have been named from the little counties of Virginia located on tide-water, some of which hardly contain more citizens than are employed at many of our manufacturing establishments. So there will be a large gathering."

"The meeting at New York at which the thirty delegates were appointed, seems to have been a 'mighty small' concern, though there had been much drumming to cause a large collection.

VOL. XL. No.

We all recollect the abuse that was heaped upon the "Harrisburg Convention," because of its proposed interference with, or dictation to, the congress of the United States! The present proceeding is justified by the same men on the plea of necessity, to counteract the doings of that convention, and the effects that succeeded it; and it is again stated as if this was the first time in which the "free trade" folks have moved in this way.

This class of persons are blessed with weak memories! How is it? Have we not had secret and irresponsible "chambers of commerce" for many years, which modestly interfered to regulate the whole exterior and interior business of the country—whose operations were simultaneous and combined? which have asked for and generally obtained almost every thing they desired, to protect the navigating interest, by enormous discriminatory duties, by squadrons of vessels of war, by the thunder of the nation's cannon, supported at the national expense? We have said that these things are right—that the splendid frigate Potomac has lately sailed to the East Indies, to protect a trade, the whole depredations on which have hardly amounted to as much as her cruise will cost us. And this is right. But why is property abroad, far out of the jurisdiction of the United States, more sacred than property at home? Why the business of ship owners and seamen more precious in our eyes, than that of the owners of furnaces and forges, and of the people who labor in or are subsisted by them? And how is it that the merchants, perpetually asking and always obtaining protection in their proper pursuits, have been so rank and wrath at others, (having twenty times a greater interest than their own), seeking like shelter under the laws of a paternal government? How is it? Look at the statute book!—it is filled with acts to favor American merchants; and why, except on the broad ground that we stand upon, may not American products as well be exported in foreign ships, by foreign merchants, as in American ships and by American merchants? Let him who dares answer this question! And may not that protection which has rendered us the second navigating nation in the world, not be exerted to render us the second manufacturing? Every argument that can be used for the one, must equally apply to the other. The principle or operation of both is the same.

†The righteous and patriotic resolution, to export our own products in our own shipping and cause the "starry banner" to be respected,—in the support of diplomatic agents, of the navy on foreign stations, and expense of the last war, (PURELY ONE ABOUT NAVIGATION), have cost the people of the United States not less than two hundred millions of dollars—and we say it is well; for national independence may not be valued by dollars and cents. And see!—we keep up a fleet in the Mediterranean that costs more than a million of dollars a year—and yet the whole value of our domestic exports to countries within the straits of Gibraltar in 1829—(the last year reported), was only as follows:

To Spanish ports	185,994
France,	886,112
Italy and Malta,	289,755
Trient, &c.	409,288
Turkey, Levant, &c.	27,600
	1,708,650

France might nearly as well have received her supplies through her Atlantic ports, and could, at least, have protected her own commerce. So the navy for the protection of our trade in the Mediterranean has cost the nation just about as much as the whole amount risked by individuals. Here is "free trade!!!"—"trade left to itself"—"regulating itself" with a vengeance! But we say it is well. We go for the whole "system."

But to return to the abuse of the "Harrisburg Convention," for the reasons assigned. Has every body forgotten that the convention system began with the "merchants and others interested in commerce?" That a convention was breathed secretly, I believe, through the "chambers of commerce," and met at Philadelphia in November 1820, of which William Bayard, of New York, was chairman, and John Vaughan, of Philadelphia, secretary—whose memorial may be found in the 19th volume of the REGISTER, page 257? This memorial has the whole ring of bells about "free trade," and suggested the ruin of the revenue, if increased duties were imposed on foreign productions! Yet the members of this convention had enjoyed the protection of 100 cents per ton on foreign vessels, against 6 cents per ton on the entry of their own—with the payment of 15 per cent. less duty than goods imported in foreign bottoms were required to pay, at our custom houses!—and this it was that built up the navigation of the United States, and made these men rich! As to the ruin of the revenue—events have laughed at the prediction. We intend not, however, at present, to go into a discussion of these things, our object being only to offer certain facts which excessive "free trade" modesty would zealously conceal. From 1789 to 1816, a period of twenty seven years, the American merchants had (what they call in respect to others), a "monopoly" in the foreign trade and navigation of the United States—let the "AMERICAN SYSTEM" go on with the same freedom and support for twenty-seven years, and then may the merchants fairly interfere with it; but until then, let them do unto others as they have been done by. ISN'T THIS HONEST? It is—or the merchants are a superior—a privileged class! Will this be claimed, or admitted? We think not. They are as we are—not wiser or better than other folks. The greatest merchant in New-York, unless he lives more prodigally than I do—(he does not live better), pays no more revenue, in proportion to his family, than the editor of the Register, except in his own will to favor British rather than American working people.

Albert Gallatin and chancellor Kent, were appointed by the "free trade" meeting at New York, and Thomas P. Cope and Samuel Archer, by that held in Philadelphia, as delegates to the convention. It is believed that neither of these distinguished gentlemen will attend.

THE HAT MANUFACTURE in the United States probably has a present value of not less than fifteen millions of dollars a year, equal to fully one half the whole product of cotton—the domestic consumption being added to the foreign export. Before the revolution, there was a law of the "mother country" that forbade our hatters from taking more than two apprentices, and certain regulations by which the hatters of one "province" were prohibited from sending their products into a neighboring province. Such was the early jealousy and rank monopoly of John Bull—that our fathers might be kept poor, and dependent upon him for all the necessities of life which he dared refuse, unless profitable to himself in the supply; but our political Sampsons burst the cords that bound them, and accomplished a revolution unprecedented for its grandeur and effect. FRANKLIN and the rest, however, saw that the "revolution was not over," in the ACKNOWLEDGEMENT of our dependence; they knew that it could not be ESTABLISHED except in the encouragement of labor and profits of production, and hence the prompt institution of many associations for the consumption of "home-made" goods—and we have the lofty authority of Mr. MADISON for saying, that this purpose was the leading one that brought about our federal union and built up the present constitution of the United States—and PROTECTION was extended by many acts of the first congress.

We will remember when great quantities of English hats arrived at Philadelphia—where "English hat-stores" were pretty numerous—where a large part of the more wealthy class used English hats, and many dunces, who could not afford it, bought them: but after a while, a wholesome impulse was given to hating—the quality of our home-made hats instantly improved, and the quantity rapidly increased—so that we now export many times more hats than we import; which conclusively shows that the duty on this branch of industry has acted as a POWERY, (not as a TAX), to consumers—"stripping up the heels" of the new light political economists, and sustaining the just judgment of Franklin, Hamilton, Madison, and the host of sound statesmen, who rendered as much good to their country by the labor of their minds, as Washington, Green, Wayne, and the rest, bestowed by the power of arms.

These brief remarks suggested themselves on seeing the following, extracted from the London Morning Herald:

"The progress which the Americans have made in several branches of manufacture is really astonishing. A few years ago there was not a hat in the United States who could make a hat fit to be worn by a well-dressed man, and consequently all hats of a superior quality were imported from this country. A great change, however, has taken place. We have seen a specimen of gentlemen's hats, manufactured in New York, which are equal, if not superior, both as respects shape and quality, to the very best made in any part of this country. Although the materials are chiefly sent from England, [?] they are sold, retail, as low as 17s. or 18s. each,—that is, about one-third cheaper than in London."

THE show of very fine hats, at the last fair of the American Institute at New York, far exceeded any thing of the kind that we ever expected to see—and we said, as to them, "ne plus ultra;" but we suppose that the most extensive manufactory of such hats as pass into the general consumption of the United States, is that of our near and old neighbors, Messrs. Jacob Rogers and sons, Baltimore.

COTTON. By the heavy rains and mighty floods in the southern states, generally, it seems highly probable that the crop of cotton will fall much short of its last year's amount. The long wet weather has caused much of it to rot. A letter from Mississippi says there has been nothing like it since 1813-14. Perhaps a diminished quantity of cotton may not reduce the value of the crop. We have produced much more than the market would freely take, at fair prices, and forced sales have materially diminished the profits of cultivators.

PORCELAIN. The British manufactures of porcelain are very important. The product of the potteries, for home use or exportation, are worth several millions of pounds annually. Of the ordinary kinds, they are the best and nearest in the world—and in the most delicate and splendid, they are not behind the very best manufactures of China and Japan, and rival the most exquisite productions of France—which, for clearness, smoothness and taste, can hardly be excelled. It is a business in which not much has yet been done in the United States, though there is one pretty extensive factory in Philadelphia, at which beautiful and good wares are manufactured. The common kinds, however, will be added to various pursuits of the American people, as population presses upon labor—for we have an abundance of the proper clays and materials for glazing. Indeed, large quantities of the latter are exported to England.

A late London paper says—We have been favored by Messrs. Flight and Barr, with the sight of a magnificent display of Worcester porcelain, manufactured by them for the palace of Egypt. The dinner service is sufficiently gorgeous—its pattern being formed entirely of gold on a light ground, surrounding a crescent and star, the symbols of Turco Egyptian power. But it is in the desert service that the superiority of British manufacture has been evinced. Around, and in the centre of its various articles, flowers of every variety, beautifully grouped, and exquisitely drawn, on a cream colored ground, are gracefully arranged in compartments, surrounded by a splendid scroll pattern of embossed gold; the whole enamelled on a bright Pomona green, and fully sustaining, in chasteness of design and beauty of execution, the high character of this splendid manufacture.

STORMS. The city of New Orleans and its neighborhood were visited by a tremendous hurricane in the night of the 16th ult. It generally damaged the shipping in port—blew down many chimneys and some small houses, and unroofed others, and caused several crevices in the levee. Some plantations were nearly destroyed—the cane and corn being completely prostrated, but will be partly recovered. The water of Lake Pontchartrain rose so high as to overflow some of the back parts of the city. In Tremé street, it was three feet deep—torrents of rain assisting the inundation. At Terre aux Boeuf the plantations were all under water, in some places to the depth of five feet! A fearful epidemic is expected.

It was reported at New Orleans, that a number of fishermen and their families, amounting to 150 persons, had disappeared in the late gale at Barratarum—their boats were washed away, and they fled to their boats, and had not been since heard of. A large number of cattle were drowned.

In the night of the 12th August and on the morning of the ensuing day, a terrible hurricane was felt in Hayti. In the town of Aux Cayes only eight houses were left standing, and it was thought that 1,000 persons lost their lives, the bodies of 700 being found just after the storm subsided! The vessels in the harbor were all destroyed, and the crews of most of them perished. The like effects were felt at Jérémie and Jacmel—both towns destroyed, and the vessels in their harbors totally lost, with hundreds of lives. So also at St Jago de Cuba, and many other places. Fearful accounts of these hurricanes are yet to reach us. The coffee plantations have suffered much, and the price of coffee is said to have risen four cents per lb. in some of the islands.

FLOOD. South Carolina, Georgia, and the other southern country generally, has suffered much from excessive heavy rains and mighty floods. The courses of the Savannah, the Pedee, and many other rivers, are marked by unprecedented desolations—some of the streams, in confined places, rising 3½ feet, and in others spreading over the country for miles, and destroying the growing crops of corn, cotton, &c. The aggregate loss will be mighty. Many bridges, some of them important and costly structures, have passed away without leaving "a wreck behind" to mark the place where they stood. Much sickness is anticipated because of the rains and floods.

HAIL. The duchy of Parma was disturbed on the 17th June by a hurricane, the ravages of which have no parallel in history, at the very eve of a harvest, which was in the highest degree promising; every thing has been destroyed in a part of the country thirty miles in length, and from ten to fifteen miles in breadth. All was buried and destroyed under heaps of hail stones. According to the Italian journals, the smallest hail stones weighed half a pound; the largest, which were in great quantities, weighed three ponnies. They were of diverse forms—round, cylindrical and square; the latter were from one to three inches thick, and from two to eight inches broad. Thirty villages, between San Donno and Parma, are ruined by this storm. The desolation was increased by the inundation of the Taro and the Parma. The description of these disasters, given by the Parma Gazette, cannot be read without horror.

BARBADOES. We have additional details of the effects of the hurricane felt on this island; but the account published in our last seems sufficient to give a general idea of the mighty waste of life and property which it caused—to be compared only with the situation of the island after the famous hurricane of 1780. The howlings of the wind, the crash of houses, the screams of the affrighted, and the groans of the wounded, were in terrific discord—and a deadly pestilence was expected to follow, though famine may be averted by supplies from the neighboring islands. Barbadoes, therefore, much impoverished, will not easily recover from this awful dispensation.

THE SOUTH. The people in lower Virginia and the adjacent parts of N. Carolina, are excessively agitated, because of the late massacre in Southampton. There is a report that the Dismal Swamp is to be scoured, for it is said to contain from 2 to 3,000 blacks, and that these were in concert with the murderers in Southampton; it is said that troops were marching for Newbern, N. C. where an insurrection was expected, or had actually broken out; and it is well known that the white people in all this section of country are arming themselves, and that suspicion and fear prevails to an unprecedented extent. Five full and efficient volunteer companies have been formed, or renewed, at Petersburg, Va. Great apprehension prevails that inflammatory papers have been distributed among the negroes in North Carolina, but no fact has yet been discovered to sustain the supposition. If such are discovered, we hope that the authors of them may be designated, and blasted by the contempt and scorn of every honest man. We hate—without reservation hate, negro slavery, and regard it as the supreme curse of our land—but we have the blacks, and must make the best of the unhappy condition in which we are placed that we can. And this we think is certain—that a large majority of the slaves are better fed and clothed, more comfortable and virtuous, than the free negroes, who are the very pests of society in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Providence, &c. Much experience has taught us that emancipation, without removal, adds to the grievance under which we are suffering; and it is this belief that prevents thousands of humane masters from liberating their people, fearing that too many of them would become vagabonds and thieves, if cast upon the taking care of themselves. We have such a surfeit of them, as to make us many thousand times wish that we had a home almost any where—it is received from seeing black faces, though some very worthy persons have them; and, with much revulsion of feeling, we see it proposed to drive an entire colored people out of Virginia! Verily, we have enough of them, and our jail, penitentiary and poor house, are besides chinkily filled with them. We cannot accept any more—we have much more than our share already! We are willing to bear our own part of the evil, or relieve it by supporting the African colonization society, and must insist that Virginia shall bear her part, also. She should do unto others as she would that they should do unto her. A man cannot be justified in placing his own incumbrance upon his neighbor's ground. It is a procedure that should be nullified. But does it not appear that those who talk so much about "nullification," are like idle boys playing with squibs and crackers, in a powder magazine?

[A negro man supposed to be the famous gen. Nat. of the Southampton negroes, arrested and detained at Baltimore as a runaway slave—has been demanded by and given up to the executive of Virginia. Many of the prisoners have already been executed.]

The Fredericksburg Arena has the following remarks—It is gratifying to state that the language held by our editorial brethren of the north, in relation to the late disastrous occurrences, is entirely unobjectionable. We have seen no taunts, no cant, no complacent dwelling upon the superior advantages of the non-slaveholding states; on the contrary, there has been a burst of generous sympathy, an unequivocal expression of horror at the scenes enacted by the deluded wretches. We have no doubt, that should it ever be necessary, the citizens of the northern states would promptly fly to the assistance of their southern brethren—we speak of the vast majority—innates there are, doubtless, who so far from this acting would not very much scruple to foment disaffection, and excite servile insurrection.

P. S. Aug. 1. A letter dated Raleigh, Sept. 13, was received by Mr. Barnum, of the City Hotel, Baltimore, by yesterday's southern mail, saying that Expresses had arrived announcing that Wilmington was in the hands of the blacks and burnt!—that it was reported they were advancing on Raleigh—that the citizens had been all night under arms—and the women, almost distracted, were flying all directions. All business was stopped, except in preparation for events. At the instant of writing an express arrived from Johnson county, (adjoining that in which Raleigh stands), demanding arms and ammunition! Wilmington was, (must we say?) a large town, and had a great commerce.

ELECTIONS. Other trials have been made in the Bristol and Essex North districts, Massachusetts, to elect members of congress, and also in the yet vacant district in Vermont, without success. It is not worth while to give the particulars.

Maryland election of electors of senate.

The names printed in italic were the administration candidates, and those marked * are elected.

Annapolis city—Mr. Claiborne, * no opposition.
Allegany county—Mr. Ridgely* 688, Mr. Shaw* 669—Mr. Swan 668, Mr. McMahon 664.

Queen Ann county—Mr. Grayson* 687, Mr. Newman* 673—Mr. McKenney 635, Mr. Emory 631.

St. Mary's county—Messrs. Gerard N. Causin and Cornelius Combs. No opposition.

Somerset county—Mr. Teackle* 987, Mr. Bell* 987; Mr. Stewart 827, Mr. Polk 812.

Talbot county—Mr. Dickinson* 656, Mr. Hughlett* 643—Mr. Stevens 436, Mr. Reardon 433.

Washington county—Mr. Wason* 1,937, Mr. Magill* 1,905—Mr. Clagett 1,328, Mr. Tighman 1,424.

Worcester county—Mr. W. A. Purnell* 1,160, Mr. Spence* 1,159—Mr. E. K. Wilson 1,103, Mr. C. Purnell 1,023.

Recapitulation—Jackson 12, anti-Jackson 28.

Charleston election. The election for municipal officers in the city of Charleston, which has been so warmly canvassed, has gone against the union party, Henry L. Pinckney, a distinguished nullifier, has been elected intendant of the city, in opposition to J. R. Pringle, the present intendant, by a vote of 1040 to 932; the number of votes being greater than ever given at any preceding election.

The Louisville Focus, says the Nashville Herald, in publishing a list of the members of congress from this state, has the name of Jacob C. Isaacs as opposed to the present administration. This is an error. Mr. Isaacs is a thorough going Jackson man, but is in favor of internal improvement.

Virginia representation in congress. It appears from the Abington Republican, that Charles C. Johnson, esq.

†It is not much our practice to assign causes for particular results of elections, and especially such as can excite political discussions—but it may be observed, that while Mr. Heath received the full number of his party vote, his opponent did not, for peculiar reasons, or proceedings hard to be justified—which cannot be stated in this work, without elevating from its usual course; but which may be presented in another way, for the public reflection. A comparison of the votes of the two highest on the delegate tickets in October last, with the votes at the late election, will show this:

Oct. 1830 Mr. Hunt, (J) 4,471 Mr. Stewart (C.) 4,087
Sept. 1851 Heath 4,434 Niles 3,738

has evicted the late member, Mr. Draper, in the Washington district, by a majority of 57. It is thought that Mr. Draper will contest.

It also appears that Mr. Coke is re-elected by a majority of about 1,100.

The Kenhawa district only remains to be definitely heard from. The contest has been close between Messrs. Maxwell and Smith, (both Clay men), though it is supposed that gen. Smith is chosen.

[We have the returns—Mr. Maxwell appears to be elected by a majority of 378 votes.]

The representation in congress, will then stand thus:

Re-elected—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Bouldin, Davenport, Craig, Gordon, Dodridge, Armstrong, Patton, Stevenson, Coke, Barbour, McCoy, Allen, Claiborne, Mercer, [Maxwell.]

Newton in the place of Loyal; John J. Ranne, for John Roane; Johnson for Draper; Chinn for Taliaferro; John Y. Mason for Trezvant. [Richmond Whig.]

Indiana—Indianapolis, Sept. 3.—The returns heretofore published, which embraced all the counties except Allen, Elkhardt, and St. Joseph, gave to each of the candidates for governor the following vote:

	Noble.	Reed.	Stapp.
	23,282	20,954	6,870
Elkhardt	159	21	2
Allen	193	9	6
St. Joseph	111		12
	23,745	20,984	6,890

The official returns for representatives to congress have now been received from all the counties in the state. The round numbers, if we have added them correctly, are as follows:

First district.

Rateliff Boon.....	11,281
John Law.....	10,905

Second district.

John Carr.....	4,855
William W. Wick.....	4,610
James B. Ray.....	1,732
Jonathan Jennings.....	1,681
John H. Thompson.....	1,486
Isaac Hawk.....	1,454

Third district.

Jonathan McCarty.....	6,243
Oliver H. Smith.....	5,289
John Teat.....	3,107

The "Farmers Journal," of Pennsylv., corrects an error into which we fell, respecting Mr. Blair, re-elected to congress, though strongly opposed—saying he is "a zealous friend of the president," "though a consistent advocate of internal improvements by the general government, which by some has been considered the test of opposition to the present administration." The time was, when opposition to the leading measures of an administration, was regarded as an opposition to the president; but now persons who have voted against every proposition of the administration, may still be "true and zealous friends of it!" Hence our error.

CHOLERA MORBUS. The authorities in various cities of the United States are adopting measures to prevent the introduction of this fearful disease, which many think is contagious—which others pronounce it not to be so, and say that it exists because of a peculiar state of the atmosphere. The latter, opinion, probably, has the most friends.

The landing of many kinds of foreign goods at New York, is forbidden, unless under special permission from the board of health—and vessels arriving from places where the Cholera prevails, are not allowed to approach the wharves nearer than 300 yards—subject to the orders of the board of health.

Our accounts of the ravages of this disease are dreadful. Between the 27th June and 10th July, 2,850 cases occurred at St. Petersburg, with hardly a single cure; and, at the last advices, the new cases were between 550 to 600 a day, and on the increase. The imperial family, and nearly all who were masters of their own movements, had fled from the city—20,000 of the laboring classes had taken out passes to depart! and the city had a dismal appearance. The Swedes and Danes have many armed vessels stationed to prevent the approach of fugitives from the diseased places.

GEORGIA AND THE CHEROKEES. We understand, says the Milledgeville Recorder, that at the late sitting of the superior court in Walton county, judge Clayton, delivered an opinion, the substance of which, as well as our informant could understand it, was to this effect:—that the Cherokee Indians have the right, notwithstanding the act of the last session, to dig gold on the lands in their occupancy.

FATAL DUEL. From the Missouri Republican of August 30.—The personal controversy which was carried on for some time previous to the election, in the other papers of this city, between major Biddle and Mr. Spencer Pettis, has had a most melancholy termination. A challenge passed from Mr. Pettis to major Biddle on Thursday last: it was accepted, and the gentlemen met on the sand bar opposite this city on Friday afternoon. Maj. Biddle being near-sighted, he, as the challenged party, stipulated five feet as the distance at which they were to fight. On the first fire, both gentlemen were mortally wounded. Major Biddle was shot thro' the abdomen, the ball lodging within. Mr. Pettis was shot through the side, just below the chest, the ball passing entirely through the body. Mr. Pettis survived until Saturday afternoon. Major Biddle died yesterday morning. Both parties are said to have conducted with remarkable coolness upon the occasion; and supposing the wounds to be mortal, they exchanged forgiveness upon the ground.

The remains of Mr. Pettis were attended to the place of interment, in the city grave yard, on Sunday afternoon, with every demonstration of respect. An immense concourse of our most respectable citizens joined in these last sad duties. Maj. Biddle's funeral takes place to-day, at 10 o'clock.

[Maj. Biddle was a pay master in the army, and brother of Mr. Biddle, president of the bank of the United States, and com. Biddle, of the navy. Mr. Pettis was the member-elect to congress from Missouri. The parties had long been in a state of bitter contention, and not long since, major Biddle inflicted a severe personal chastisement on Mr. Pettis, for which the latter was tendered "satisfaction." Major Biddle was a married man, but had no children.—Mr. Pettis was unmarried. Both seemed to believe that the duel would have the fatal termination that ensued.]

NAVY OF THE U. S. A good practice has been introduced by Mr. Secretary Woodbury—that of publishing, on the 1st of every month, all material changes that take place in the condition or position of the vessels of the United States, in commission—and because of the decease, transfer, &c. of officers in service. The following was last issued:—

Naval register. Vessels on each foreign station at last advices:

Pacific. Frigate Guerriere, sloop St. Louis, and schooner Dolphin. The two former to be relieved by the frigate Potomac and sloop Falmouth.

Brazil. Sloop Vandalia, sloop Lexington on her way to join this station.

West Indies. Sloops Erie and Vincennes, schooners Grampus and Porpoise.

Mediterranean. Frigates Brandywine and Constellation, sloops John Adams, Ontario, Boston and Concord.

Frigate Constellation, captain Wadsworth, and sloop Boston, were at Vourla, near Smyrna, on the 23d May, officers and men all well.

Sloop Natchez, capt. Newton, arrived at Norfolk on the 23d ult.

Schooner Shark, lieu. com. Boerum, arrived at Norfolk on the 23th ult.

The two last named vessels are undergoing repairs, and will, it is presumed, in a few weeks, be in a situation to resume their stations in the West India squadron.

Naval department, Sept. 1, 1831.

OHIO CANAL. The water was let into the canal at Circleville, on the 1st inst., and in 3 or 4 days had reached the aqueduct on Deer creek. The water was expected to reach the locks near Chillicothe about the middle of the month. The Chillicothe Gazette says, in the course of a few weeks boats may be expected in that town from the waters of Lake Erie.

DR. MITCHELL. We alluded briefly yesterday to the death of this distinguished scientific man, which was announced to us but a short time previous to the publication of the paper. He died in his sixty-eighth year, after an illness which afforded little room to hope for his ultimate recovery; but still his departure was sudden and unexpected. He was a man who with wonderful faculty of recitation, and untiring industry, had accumulated more knowledge as to facts, books and natural history than most men, however celebrated, of his or any other age. There were few subjects on which he could not furnish such information as would lead the inquirer aright in his researches. He enlarged the boundaries of discovery in natural science, and stimulated and assisted all who were pursuing the same objects. He was, for a great number of years, professor of various branches in the college of physicians and surgeons, and was dean of the faculty. His labors are dispersed in many volumes. Many cabinets are enriched by his collections. And there are few philosophical societies of note in the world, of which he was not a member. He was elected to the assembly of this state soon after the revolution, and was afterwards a senator in congress, and the colleague of De Witt Clinton. His acquaintance with history, and with civil and international law, was extensive and accurate. There was an amiable simplicity in his character, connected with a consciousness of his own acquisitions, which was confounded with vulgar vanity only by the vulgar mind. He did much to promote the cause of science; and science must regret his loss.

[N. Y. Com. Adv. Sept. 7.]

LONDON YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.—The editor of the Philadelphia Friend, gives the following summary notice of the proceedings of the late yearly meeting of Friends in London, derived from the letter of a respectable correspondent in that city.

The society's ancient testimony against titles and other ecclesiastical demands, was a subject which gained large attention; and a lively exercise pervaded the meeting, that friends might be found especially faithful herein in this day, when, perhaps more than at any former period in modern times, such impositions are called in question; at the same time members were cautioned, that, while in noble simplicity and firmness, they adhered to our testimonies, they should avoid any participation in the popular clamor of the day.

"One sitting of the yearly meeting was pretty much occupied with the anti-slavery subject, and some other matters connected with it. A further grant [by voluntary contribution] to friends of North Carolina was agreed upon, to enable them to remove the colored people under their care to free states. Friends seemed disposed to encourage one another to perseverance in the abolition of slavery, hopeful in the apprehension that the work was making progress.

The situation of the aborigines of the British colonies especially those of Australasia, claimed some notice as objects of compassion for their sufferings from oppressive settlers; and I was ready to say, a burst of indignation escaped, (but friends though strong in expression, were temperate), when they heard of the attempts to supplant the poor Cherokees, the particulars of which were received from the meeting for sufferings of Philadelphia.

The lamentable prevailing vice of drinking ardent spirits, and the unlawful use or occupation of the first day of the week, were both subjects which occupied the meeting's attention.

On the reading of the American epistles, and other information which reached the meeting, a subscription was recommended throughout the yearly meeting, in and of the fowls of their transatlantic bre thren for furnishing a supply of bibles, Friends' books, school books, as well as to assist in fitting up meeting houses, within those parishes the American yearly meetings where assistance may be needed.

Elizabeth Ronson was set at liberty by the select yearly meeting, to perform a religious visit in some part of the continent of Europe, and in pursuance of this prospect, with her husband, she had left London, in the steam packet, for Calais. Also, James Backhouse obtained the approbation of the same meeting, to enter upon his arduous prospect of paying a visit, in the love of the gospel, to the settlement of New-Holland.

PORTUGAL. A London paper gives us the following as the condition to which France has reduced Don Miguel. It is, indeed, a most humiliating one—and can be regarded only as a prelude to his expulsion. The royal honors recently paid to the daughter of Don Pedro, as queen of Portugal, in England and France, we regard as setting the fate of the worthless and wicked Miguel. The conditions imposed by the French admiral upon Don Miguel, are stated to be: 1st, The dismissal of the superintendent-general of police. 2d, The reversal of all sentences pronounced against Frenchmen for political opinions. 3d, An indemnity of 800,000 francs for the expenses of the expedition. 4th, The insertion in the Gazette of the Portuguese government, together with placards containing these facts posted on the corners of the streets through which Bonhomme was paraded.

TREATY WITH FRANCE

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

We translate the following article from the French government paper (the Moniteur) giving what may probably be regarded as an official exposition of the stipulations contained in the treaty lately negotiated between France and the United States. The stipulation for a reduction of duties on French wines obviously exceeds the competency of the treaty-making power, and will require the action of both houses of congress, either before it can be ratified, or before it can take effect. The Moniteur states, that the treaty cannot be ratified until the close of this year or the beginning of the next.

1. The United States, since 1810, have demanded an indemnity of France, for the value of American vessels seized and confiscated under the Berlin and Milan decrees. The amount of this claim was seventy five million francs. The French government, not inclining to admit any claims except those which applied to vessels illegally seized or confiscated, has agreed to pay to the United States an indemnity of twenty five millions, and has reserved the right of making a deduction from this amount of a million and a half, as an indemnity to some French citizens for their claims upon the federal government.

2. On the other hand, France, relying on the 3d article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, which had placed the French navigation in that country on the footing of that of the most favored nation, demanded that her shipping, on entering the ports of Louisiana, should be exempt from the payment of extra duties, as the English shipping has been since the treaty of Ghent, in all the ports of the union. But the federal government insisted that we gave too absolute a construction to the 5th article of the treaty of Louisiana, and opposed our views the more strenuously, because the advantages which our shipping would thus have enjoyed, not in all the ports of the union, but to those of Louisiana only, would have given that state a monopoly of French commerce altogether at variance with the spirit of the institutions of the United States.—Under these circumstances, the king's government, wishing to reconcile those national interests which it is bound to maintain, with the just and benevolent sentiments which it must ever entertain towards the federal government, has thought proper to abandon its interpretation of the treaty of Louisiana, and in lieu thereof, to stipulate for a specific and favorable rate of duties on our wines.

From the exchange of the ratification of the treaty, therefore the wines of France which will be admitted into the ports of the union, on payment of duties which are not to exceed the following rates: six cents for red wine in casks, 10 cents for white wine in casks, and 22 cent for wine of all kinds in bottles; the present rate of duties on those several kinds of wine being respectively 10, 15 and 30 cents. This stipulation is to be obligatory on the federal government for the term of ten years; and it is further agreed, that if that government shall reduce the duties imposed by the existing tariff on wines in general, it shall at the same time cause a proportional reduction to be made in favor of the wines of France, so that the latter may retain the same relative advantage which is secured to them by the rates specified in the treaty.

It is also agreed, that the long staple cottons of the U. States shall in future pay in France the same duty as the short staples. This equalization, which has existed since 1826 in regard to the long staple cottons of Brazil, will prove equally advantageous to the American planter and our own manufacturers.

RESPECT TO GOV. BRANCH.

Windsor, 18th Aug 1831.

DEAR SIR—The undersigned committee, appointed by a respectable meeting of the citizens of Bertie, assembled for the purpose of expressing their high regard for your private virtues, as well as the high opinion which they entertain of your firm and unswerving course, prominently displayed by the many important services rendered your state, and more especially by your late demonstration of attachment to those principles which have always governed you, are instructed to solicit you in favor them by partaking of a dinner to be given in Windsor, at such time as may suit your convenience.

The committee will further say, that they sincerely hope no private circumstance may occur to deprive them of the pleasure they anticipate in meeting you around the social board.

With due regard, we are, &c.

ALEX. W. MEBANE,
GEO. B. OULLAW,
JNO. E. WOOD,
JOS. D. WHITE,
THEO. G. PETERS,
THOMAS BOND,

To the Hon. JOHN BRANCH, Enfield.

Enfield, Aug 20th, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—Your invitation of the 11th inst. to unite with a portion of my fellow-citizens of Bertie county "around the social board," has been duly received. Under the most auspicious circumstances of my life, such marked kindness, connected with the flattering manner in which allusion has been made to my private and public character, could not fail to be highly acceptable. But situated as I am—recently expelled from the cabinet of gen. Jackson by the ascendancy of certain "malign influences," and still pursued in my retirement with a fiend-like vengeance, which, it seems, cannot be satiated but by the destruction of my good name—nothing, I assure you, could be more grateful to my feelings than the generous confidence and support of those who have known me from my earliest entrance into public life.

With a purpose bent on their own selfish gains, and regardless of the fame of the chief magistrate, or the best interests of the country, these influences are untiring in their efforts to drive from the administration most of its old and long tried supporters; and gladly would they force me from my principles into the support of the recent associate and leader of a part of them, well knowing that I could not expose his course without utter ruin and disgrace—all this and more besides is attempted, under the fatal delusion that the name of the "hero of New-Orleans" has a magic in it to hallow any thing and every thing. With the feelings inspired by such an extraordinary state of things, you can well imagine the pleasure I should derive from accepting your invitation and mingling freely with fellow citizens animated by such noble sentiments. But, gentlemen, I regret to inform you that the indisposition of my family requires my undivided attention, and I will make it my duty, the first moment their strength will permit, to remove them to a climate more favorable to the restoration of their health. I am therefore constrained to forego the high gratification I should otherwise derive from making my acknowledgements in person while partaking with you at the festive hour.

I pray you, gentlemen, to accept for yourselves, and those you represent, my cordial assurances of respect, esteem and gratitude. Most truly yours, &c.

JOHN BRANCH.

LETTERS FROM LAFAYETTE.

It will be recollected that the editor of the REGISTER was designated to transmit the flags mentioned below to the venerable Lafayette; and by one of the late arrivals, their reception has been acknowledged as follows:

La Grange, June 28, 1831.

My dear sir—The celebration so affectionate and splendid, which in honor to our great week of July, was performed at Baltimore, has been duly published in France, where it has excited high pleasure and gratitude. The flags arrived much later, and were disposed of agreeably to the kind intention of the donors.

My connexion with the first company of the 5th regiment, Maryland volunteers, is founded not only upon late grateful remembrance, but upon the pleasing recollection of public and personal obligations during our revolutionary war. The national guard of Paris being divided into legions, I have thought the company of grenadiers of the 5th legion was the corps to which the flag ought to be presented. The recollection of the officers of the company has occasioned a delay until I know to what captain, after the ballot, I was to send the flag. I know it has been received with feelings of pride and gratitude of which I can already be the interpreter, although the official answer has not reached me.

As to the flag of the Printers' association which has acted a conspicuous part in the grand celebration, and is, in their name, by a unanimous vote, presented to me, I have the honor to acknowledge it in the enclosed letter.

Your most valued Register is in my possession down to the 37th volume, February 20th. No man can, better than I do, esteem its excellences. Permit me to enclose a document that may throw some light on the present state of French politics.* With the most affectionate regard, I am, my dear sir, your sincere, obliged friend,

LAFAYETTE.

La Grange, June 28, 1831.

My dear sir—Amidst my obligations to the citizens, and particularly to the printers of Baltimore, and in addition to the proud and grateful feelings which the grand celebration in honor to the Parisian week of July has excited in my heart, I have been happy to receive the tri-colored flag used on that occasion, and so kindly presented to me by an unanimous vote of the printers' association. It holds at La Grange a conspicuous part in a trophy, each standard of which recalls to the mind an honorable event of the French revolution. I beg you, my dear sir, to present the association with the high respect and most affectionate acknowledgements of their and your obliged friend,

LAFAYETTE.

BLASTING OF ROCKS.

From the Philadelphia Chronicle.

The subjoined paper suggests a practicable and efficient method of guarding against a species of accident which has been frequent and fatal in this country. It will be sufficiently recommended to public attention by the distinguished name attached to it.

For the Daily Chronicle.

I have observed in the newspapers an account of the death of a workman dreadfully lacerated and bruised by the blasting of a rock.

This, and many other like occurrences will, I presume, create sufficient interest in the following communication to justify its appearance in a newspaper.

I have ascertained that the process for blasting rocks may be rendered safer than the firing of a towing piece, by a new application of galvanism. I was led to make this improvement in consequence of an application by a patentee (Mr. Moses Shaw) for assistance in perfecting his patented mode of blasting rocks by an electrical discharge from a Leyden jar.

In a letter dated June 1st, 1831, he says, "I have been engaged in blasting rocks by means of a fulminating powder, introduced into several cavities, and ignited in all of them simultaneously, by a spark from an electrical machine, by which means masses of a much larger size, and of a much more suitable shape for any object in view, may be procured, than by the old plan. I have, however, to lament my inability to succeed in this method of blasting during a great part of the year, when, in consequence of the unfavorable state of the weather, the ignition cannot be effected by electricity in any mode which I have devised, or which has been suggested by others, although I have consulted all the best informed professors to whom I have had access."

It occurred to me as soon as this statement was made by Mr. Shaw, that the ignition of gunpowder, for the purposes he had in view, might be effected by a galvanic discharge from a deflagrator, or calorimeter, in a mode which I have long used in my culometrical experiments to ignite explosive gaseous mixtures. This process is free from uncertainty which is always more or less attendant upon the employment of mechanical electricity for similar purposes.

The expectation thus arising has since been fully verified. I have ignited as many as twelve charges of gunpowder at a distance of one hundred and thirty feet from the galvanic machine employed. This distance is much greater than is necessary to the safety of the operator, as the deflagrator may be shielded so as not to be injured by the explosion, and by means of levers and pulleys, it may be made to act at any distance which may be preferable.

There is no limit to the number of charges which may be thus ignited, excepting those assigned by economy, to the size of the apparatus employed.

These remarks have reference to the principal and highly important subject of Mr. Shaw's project; which is, to ignite at once a great number of charges in as many perforations so drilled in a rock as to co-operate simultaneously in the same plan. By these means it is conceived that the stone may be separated into large prismatic or tabular masses, instead of being reduced to irregular fragments of an inferior size. The object to which I propose now to call attention more particularly, is a modification of the common process of blasting by one charge, which renders that process perfectly safe.

This part of the subject I shall introduce by premising that almost all the accidents which have taken place in blasting rocks, have occurred in one of the three following modes:

1st. The explosion has taken place prematurely, before the operator has had time to retire.

2nd. A premature explosion has ensued from a spark produced by the collision arising from ramming into the orifice of the perforation, containing the powder, the brick dust or sand employed to close it.

3rd. The fire not reaching the charge after the expiration of a period unusually long, and the operator returning to ascertain the cause of the supposed failure, an explosion ensues when he is so near as to suffer by it, as in the instance near Norristown, lately published.

The means of communicating ignition, to which I have referred, are as follows:—

Three iron wires, of which one is of the smallest size used for wire gauge, the others of the size (No. 24) used by booters, are firmly twisted together. This is best accomplished by attaching them to the centre of the mandrel of a lathe, which is made to revolve while the mandrel of a lathe, which is held by a vice so as the other ends of the wires are held by a vice so as to keep them in a proper state of tension. After being thus twisted a small portion is untwisted, so as to get at, and divide the larger wires by means of a pair of nippers. In this way the smaller wire is rendered the sole agent of metallic connection between the larger ones. These are tied in a saw kerf, or made in a small piece of dog wood, to secure them from working; which if permitted, would cause the smaller wire to break apart. At one end, the twist formed of the wires is soldered to the bottom of a tin tube of a size to fill the perforation in the rock to such a height as may be deemed proper. This tube being supplied with gunpowder, the orifice is closed with a cork, perforated so that the twisted wire may pass out through it without touching the tube, at any point above that where the finer portion alone intervenes. To the outside of the tube a copper wire about No. 16 is soldered, long enough to extend to a stout copper wire proceeding from one of the poles of a galvanic deflagrator or calorimeter.

The wire passing thro' the cork, from the inside of the tube, is in like manner made to communicate with the other pole. The connections between the wires, and the poles, should be made by means of soft solder, previously to which we must imagine that the tube has been introduced into a perforation made for its reception in a rock to be blasted. The tin tube may be secured within the rock by the usual method of ramming in brick dust or sand, by means of a punch, having holes for the protection of the wires of communication already described.

The apparatus being thus prepared, by a galvanic discharge, produced by the movement of a lever through a quarter part of a circle, the finer wire is ignited in the place where it intervenes solely in the circuit, so as to set fire to the surrounding gunpowder.

It is impossible that it should be effected by a spark elicited by ramming, as no means of ignition can have access to the charge besides the galvanic discharge; and as this can only occur by design, without an intention to commit murder or suicide, or unparliamentary neglect, it is inconceivable that an explosion can take place in this method of blasting, when any person is so situated as to suffer by it.

It must be obvious that in all cases of blasting under water, the plan of the tin tube, and ignition by a galvanic circuit, must be very eligible.

Mr. Shaw is now in Philadelphia, and I hope he may meet with the patronage which his project merits.

ROBERT HARE.

PRUSSIA AND POLAND.

Paris, July 21. It is not true that the king of Prussia sent any answer to the letter of the Polish general-in-chief complaining of the scandalous violation of neutrality by the Prussian authorities: the king returned the brave general's letter unopened and in silence. This at Berlin was dignity!

General Jean Skrzynecki, commander-in-chief of the Polish army, has felt himself under the necessity of writing the following letter to the king of Prussia:

"Stettin, July 9, 1831.

"SIR: I take the liberty of addressing you, with the hope that your majesty will deign to admit that my character of commander-in-chief of the Polish army, and the importance of the subject to which I am about to call your majesty's attention, warrant my adopting this course.

"Sire, since your elevation to the throne, justice and uprightness have never ceased to illustrate your paternal reign. In appealing to those sublime virtues, I experience some relief, amidst the vexations and annoyance occasioned to us Poles by the civil and military authorities of Prussia. In conjunction with several European cabinets, you have proclaimed the principle of non-intervention, and I have no doubt but the ministers of your majesty have received instructions in accordance with your royal wishes. The Polish army would consequently be wrong were it to complain of your majesty. They are only anxious to acquiesce with your grievances.

"Every day we witness occurrences which convince us agreed to observe towards Poland, the civil and military authorities not only violate the spirit of the laws of neutrality, but what is more, they afford direct and efficacious assistance to the Russian army, without the latter would have been long since compelled to retire from our country.

"The Prussian authorities supply the Russians from the magazines of Thorn, and the vicinity of that place, with provisions.

"2. Prussian artillerymen have been admitted into, and embodied in, the Russian army, and fight against us.

"3. The Russian forces draw warlike stores from the Prussian fortresses.

"4. The clothing of several Russian regiments were made in Prussia.

"5. The Prussian engineer from Marienwarder was commissioned to collect the necessary materials for the construction of bridges, to enable the Russian army to cross the Vistula at Zlotorya.

"I could refer to various other circumstances to show the hostile intentions and acts of the Prussian authorities. I confine myself to the facts I have mentioned, persuaded as I am, that as soon as your majesty shall have been made acquainted with them, you will deign to prevent the recurrence of practices which, no doubt, take place unknown to your majesty, because they are directly in contradiction with the sentiments of political probity which you have ever professed.

"Bidding your majesty to excuse my troubling you with this despatch, I entreat, sire, you will listen to the voice of humanity, addressed to you through the organs of those whom, be they ever so weak, giants would be unequal to overcome, were they not secretly assisted by the civil and military Prussian authorities."

"That letter was returned to general Skrzynecki, with this declaration, 'that his majesty the king of Prussia could not enter into correspondence with a power that was not acknowledged by the emperor Nicholas!'"

POLISH PROCLAMATION.

Proclamation of the national government to the Polish nation.

"Fellow countrymen!—In the contest which must eventually decide between the existence of Poland or her entire destruction, the nation trusts to the heroism and devotion of the army. The army has justified this confidence, and has exceeded the expectation of the people anxious for the result of our exertions. From that moment the glory of Poland, which for a time had been humiliated, and even forgotten, having attained a vigour not to be produced by ages, has made itself known beyond the bounds of Europe. The enemy, irritated, has summoned forth all his energy, and become even more barbarous. We have been signally successful against him, but we must aim at his entire destruction. It is to ensure this that we must make yet further efforts. It is for this the national government invokes the Most High, who will never cease to protect us, so long as we struggle to defend our spotless country. We invoke our national liberty, which now stands on a point from which it may be plunged into eternity or destruction. We invoke all the kings and heroes who have ever perished for faith, loyalty or the welfare of mankind. We invoke the safety of Europe, the future race, and eternal justice; and, strong in the example of our illustrious ancestors, we proclaim the levy en masse of the nation, (pos polne ruszenie) that this appeal may be heard in the remotest points of our beloved country, so that the inhabitants of the small portion called the kingdom of Poland may be animated by the same sacred flame which burned so brilliantly in Samogitia, Lithuania, and Volhynia, the situation of which was infinitely more embarrassing. They have revived the deeds of our fathers: let us not allow them to excel in this honorable rivalry.

"Ministers of religion!—Our struggle is for our country, for our faith, and for virtue. It is the struggle of children for their fathers, and of fathers for their children. Invoke God, that He may inspire you with his Holy Spirit, the spirit of the primitive Christians, and with that spirit strengthen you in the sanctuaries, in the burying places, and on the field of battle. Do not abandon your flocks, encamp with them in the fields and the forests; suffer with them, and, by your exhortations, strengthen them.

"Fellow countrymen,—Our enemy has vowed our annihilation, but he cannot attain it but by your indifference. Strengthen the ranks of our army with your sons and your brothers, revenge those who have fallen, and let every hillcock, every tree, every highway, every foot path, contain for that enemy vengeance. Perish those hordes that only seek pillage or murder, and let them not find sleep in that country which these barbarians have sullied for half a century with their crimes and our blood.

"Villagers:—The martyrdom of your brothers, the holy faith, and holy Poland, call upon you at once: it is time to put an end to this sanguinary war. The invading army has ruined your crops, has destroyed your pasturage, has consumed your herds, has poisoned habitations with unhealed pestilence, destroying houses by fire, and families by assassination. The survivors have nothing better to expect from him. On your fields, your grain, cultivated by the sweat of your brow, lies rotten. The crop is at hand; then the enemy, who can never be less thirsting for your blood, will throw himself upon you to complete the catalogue of his victims. Will you await that they should dishonor your wives and your mothers—that they should exterminate your children? No: you will be more prompt than he will be. Whenever your fields do not need your labor, arm yourselves with every thing within your reach; throw yourselves on the enemy. His ranks are already thinned, and your courage will precipitate his flight. Before beginning your harvest you will place it out of the sight of the enemy. A just God will aid you in expelling the intruders and will cause the blessings of peace to descend upon you, and liberated Poland awaits with frankness to bestow those rewards that you so highly merit.

"Chiefs of every rank, destined to command the levy en masse, be impressed with all the sanctity of your high calling. Here awaits you the recompense worthy of a loyal and patriotic heart. After the example of our forefathers, your occupation should be to join military heroism with civil energy. This is what civilized Europe expects, being convinced that in her actual situation, every soldier should be a citizen and every citizen a soldier. It is the force of great national calamities that an intimate union of all classes is required, for there is no class before death, before God, and before country.

"Poles,—At this holy call of a levy en masse, invoke, after the custom of your ancestors, the all-powerful name of God. It is he who has covered with imperishable glory our heroic chivalry under the Poles and the Jagillons. Think of what will happen if we were now to yield. Shall those hopes be destroyed which the third generation has cherished in their hearts, which will become the glory of Poland? Revived with so many charms, and so much blood lately spilt, consult on the means which locality, the wants and the national genius present. Let the whole country become one camp—let all the energy of force and all the dexterity of intellect be combined to distress the enemy. The greatest activity and the most discerning circumspection must guide your actions—the guile of the serpent, and the desperation of the lioness. Such are the characteristics of your calling—a brotherly feeling in its most extensive sense. One for all—all for one. To arms, Poles! to arms!

"Prince A. CZARTORISKI, president.

MR. CRAWFORD'S EXPOSITION.

From the Georgia Journal.

TO THE CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The appearance of the address of the vice president of the United States renders it unnecessary to offer any apology for the following address. The review of the correspondence, signed A. B., originally published in the Georgia Journal of the 21st of April last, and several articles in the Globe and other newspapers, have, in my judgment, sufficiently explained my conduct to all impartial and unprejudiced minds; and those of a different description it is improbable that any thing that I can urge will convince. Besides, it is not very important to the people of the United States, before whom there is no probability I shall ever again be placed, to form any definite opinion of my motives or conduct in the transactions developed in the correspondence between the president and vice president. I say it is not very important to the citizens of the United States; but it is important to me individually, to have my conduct correctly understood; for no man, however retired he may live, ought to be indifferent to public opinion. It also appears, from the newspapers, that an explanation from me is expected and desired. I therefore submit to the apparent necessity of appearing before the public.

I understood from letters received during the last session of congress, that the vice president and his friends were endeavoring to make the impression that the difficulty between him and the president had been produced by me, from a desire on my part to ingratiate myself with the president. If this impression had been made by their joint efforts, the vice president has dispelled the illusion, for, by his publication, it is clearly established that the measure did not originate with me; but that in the whole affair I have been passive. In fact, I assert, without the fear of contradiction, that no intercourse, either verbal or written, has taken place between the president and myself, since a few days after the presidential election in the house of representatives, in February, 1825. During the call gen. Jackson then made upon me, no reference whatever was made to what had passed in relation to the general or myself. I considered the call as evidence of a better state of feeling on his part than had been understood to have previously existed; and as I had never cherished any feelings of hostility towards him, I was perfectly willing that the past should be buried in oblivion. But the publication of the correspondence has relieved me from the necessity of saying any thing more upon this subject.

Two other charges have been made against me: 1st. That the confidential letter of gen. Jackson, which I say was produced and read in the cabinet, was not produced and read. And 2d. That I have improperly disclosed cabinet secrets.

Upon the first objection, negative testimony is relied upon. Mr. Monroe, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Wirt, do not recollect that it was produced and read; or rather Mr. Adams and Mr. Wirt do not recollect it; for it is manifest that Mr. Monroe has no recollection upon the subject, having relied wholly upon Mr. Wirt. But Mr. Calhoun has a distinct recollection that it was not produced and read. Without relying upon that rule of legal evidence, which declares that one affirmative witness countervails many negative ones, there is, I believe, abundant evidence in the correspondence itself to support my statement. Here I beg leave to transcribe an article from the Globe of the 20th February last, which has much force and cogency, and proves, at least presumptively, that my statement concerning the confidential letter is correct. The Globe says: "After all the statements, and retractions, about the production of general Jackson's letter before the cabinet in July, 1818, Mr. Monroe's letters, published by Mr. Calhoun, go far to confirm Mr. Crawford's statement. In the conclusion of Mr. Monroe's letter to gen. Jackson, dated December the 21st, 1818 (printed 1830 by mistake in the pamphlet) Mr. Monroe thus speaks of the confidential letter: your letter of the 6th of January was received whilst I was seriously indisposed; observing that it was from you, I handed it to Mr. Calhoun to read, after reading one or two lines myself. The order to take command in that quarter had before then been issued. He remarked, after reading the letter, that it was a confidential one relating to Florida, which I must answer. I asked him if he had forwarded to you the orders that had been given to general Gaines on that subject. He replied that he had. Your letter to me, with many others from friends was put aside in consequence of my indisposition, and the great pressure upon me at the time, and never recur red to until after my return from Loudoun, on the receipt of yours by Mr. Hambley, and then on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun. Now, when did Mr. Monroe return from Loudoun, and when was the letter by Mr. Hambley received? Mr. Calhoun has given us the evidence to show. In one of his notes he tells us that the first cabinet meeting on that subject took place on the 15th or 16th of July, 1818, Mr. Monroe having returned on the 14th from his residence in Loudoun. Mr. Monroe's letter to general Jackson, dated 19th July, 1818, begins thus: 'I received lately your letter "of June 21st, by Mr. Hambley, at my farm in Loudoun, &c." Thus, the time when the confidential letter was "looked up, on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun," is identified within a few days. It was after Mr. Monroe's return from Loudoun, on the 14th, and before the 19th of July, 1818, the very period at which the cabinet were deliberating about the Seminole war, and at the very time Mr. Crawford says it was produced before them. There is a remarkable coincidence between the details of Mr. Crawford's recent statement and Mr. Monroe's account of this affair, made in 1818, which proves the identity of the incidents alluded to: "Mr. Crawford says Mr. Calhoun made some allusion to a letter the general had written to the president, who had forgotten that he had received such a letter, but said if he had received such a one he could find it, and went directly into his cabinet and brought the letter out. Mr. Monroe, in his letter of the 21st December, 1818, says your letter, &c. was put aside, &c. and never recurred to until after my return from Loudoun, &c. and then on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun. Here is conclusive proof of two things, 1st. the confidential letter was produced on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, after Mr. Monroe's return from Loudoun, on the 14th, and before the writing of his letter to gen. Jackson on the 19th of July, 1818. 2d. Mr. Crawford was present when the suggestion was made and the letter produced. The cabinet, it seems, were several days in deliberation. Mr. Wirt might not have been present when the letter was produced. At any rate, the proof is conclusive that the letter was produced to Mr. Crawford on Mr. Calhoun's suggestion. Mr. Calhoun's own account of that letter is incorrect. He says—my recollection in relation to it accords with Mr. Monroe's statement. I came into the room when he had apparently just received the letter. He was indisposed at the time. I think he "handed the letter in my presence, and finding that it was from you, he gave to me the letter to read. I cast my eyes over it, and remarked that it related to the Seminole war, and would require his attention, or something to that effect. I thought no more of it. Long after, I think it was at the commencement of the next session of congress, I heard some allusion which brought the letter to my recollection. It was from a quarter that induced me to believe it came from Mr. Crawford. I called and mentioned it to Mr. Monroe, and found that he had entirely forgotten the letter. After searching some time, he found it amongst some other papers, and read it, as he told me, for the first time. Mr. Monroe's account of the matter, written in December, 1818, shortly after the meeting of congress, proves that this story, as to time, is entirely fabulous. That letter, connected with that of the 19th of July, proves that the hunting up of the letter on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, and the reading for the first time, took place directly after Mr. Monroe's return from Loudoun, on the 14th July, 1818, during the deliberations of the cabinet. Upon this evidence may Mr. Crawford turn round and pity and taunt Mr. Calhoun for decay of his memory. He has notoriously published to the world a gross misrepresentation of this affair with the evidence of its incorrectness before him, in his own documents. If memory had failed him, he might have relied, for correct information on that account given by Mr. Monroe, in 1818, which is certainly more likely to be correct than any statement made by him now. He, Mr. Monroe, could not have forgotten the facts. Thus vanishes one of Mr. Calhoun's clouds of dust, which he had raised, to blind the people in relation to his own conduct towards gen. Jackson."

I shall not, however, turn upon Mr. Calhoun and reproach him with his decay of memory, for if he is to be believed, he never had any to decay, as I shall show before this review is closed. No, it is the want of veracity which must be reproached to Mr. Calhoun, and not the decay of his memory. In support of the argument of the Globe, founded on Mr. Monroe's letters of the 19th of July and 21st of December, 1818, I shall produce a passage from Mr. Monroe's letter to me, of the 8th August, 1830:—"I lay in bed more than a week, during which that letter (the confidential one), was removed, and every thing relating to that war having been previously arranged, it was forgotten, and never read by me until after the meeting of the administration, and the decision as to the course to be pursued in reference to its management. My impression is, that I read it then on a suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, that it required my attention. Had I read it when I received it, I should have considered it confidential, and never have shown it to any one, however great my confidence in them might be." It is somewhat difficult to ascertain what Mr. Monroe's meaning in the foregoing quotation is. He states that "every thing relating to that war having been previously arranged, the letter was removed and forgotten, and never read by me (Mr. Monroe), until after the meeting of the administration, and the decision as to the course to be pursued in reference to its management." It is manifest that the first part of the foregoing sentence relates to the arrangement of the letters and papers concerning the Seminole war. The second member seems to present the idea, that the letter was produced and read on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, after the decision of the administration in reference to its management. The management of what? Of the Seminole war? That had terminated before the meeting. If Mr. Monroe intended to state that the letter was produced and read upon the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, that it required his attention, after the decision of the administration upon the course to be pursued towards Spain and towards gen. Jackson, then it is manifest that he is mistaken. It is impossible, in the nature of things, that Mr. Calhoun could have believed or suggested, that that letter required the president's attention, after the decision of the administration upon the events of the campaign had been formed.

It was impossible, in the nature of things, that the president's attention could be necessary to that letter after the decision had been made on the events of the campaign. I have before me a letter from a member of congress from this state, in which he urges that "the confidential letter must have been before the cabinet, as it was necessary to a correct decision of the questions growing out of the Seminole war, and that the president and secretary of war ought to have been impeached if it had been withheld." When Mr. Calhoun referred to the letter, my impression was, and is now, that he wished it produced, to prove that gen. Jackson, instead of acting in conformity to the orders of the war department, had determined to take the Spanish posts before he received orders to take the management of that war. It is probable that when he referred to that letter, he was not aware that it had not been answered. It is easy to understand why Mr. Calhoun should call the president's attention to that letter, before the cabinet had decided upon the course to be pursued towards Spain, and especially towards gen. Jackson—but after that decision had been made, it is impossible to conceive a motive for bringing it under consideration. Mr. Monroe is then evidently mistaken in stating that the letter was produced and read upon the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, after the decision of the cabinet upon the events of the Seminole campaign. It is a little remarkable, however, that the confidential letter is always produced upon the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun.

Mr. Monroe, in his letter to gen. Jackson of the 21st December, 1818, and of the 8th of Aug., 1830, to me, says, it was produced on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, and connects it with the proceedings of the cabinet, in which I say, I distinctly recollect it was produced and read, upon the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun. I will now state more at large the reasons of my distinct recollection of the circumstance. Mr. Monroe, before he left Washington, had particularly enjoined upon me not to leave Washington for Georgia until gen. Jackson's despatches should be received, and the cabinet should decide upon the events of the Seminole campaign. During his absence in Loudoun, I had frequent conversations with Mr. Calhoun, who uniformly informed me that gen. Jackson had no other orders for the government of his conduct, than those given to gen. Gaines. Those orders I had seen. His representations, which at that time I had no reason to doubt, made a strong impression upon my mind, and extremely unfavorable to gen. Jackson. I entered the cabinet, therefore, with decided impressions against the general; which were removed only by the production and reading of the confidential letter, of which to the best of my recollection and belief, it was the first intimation I had ever received of that letter. I am confident Mr. Monroe is mistaken in his recollection of my coming into his room after Mr. Calhoun, and reading the letter. It is worthy of remark, too, that in his letter of the 21st December, when it is more likely that his recollection was correct, than in the spring of 1830, he tells gen. Jackson that the letter was given to Mr. Calhoun, but does not remember me with Mr. Calhoun and that letter; and I have a distinct recollection of having him give the same account of it, several times. The vice president seems to connect me in the affair of the letter, in some of which did he think he has depended on Mr. Crowninshield's evidence by the letter he has received from him, but by comparing the two letters, it will be seen that the letter to him does not contradict a single syllable of his previous letter to me. Mr. Calhoun, in a note to Mr. Crowninshield's letter to him, says—"Nor could I have been present at any meeting of the cabinet on which I was,"—of the capture of St. Marks, late minister to Spain and Denmark, writes in the month of February last—"That it is now ascertained that the official news of the capture of St. Marks was received at Washington in the early part of May." He had particularly examined the records of the war department, and found that the despatch giving an account of the capture of St. Marks, in the note last referred to, says, that Mr. Crowninshield and the president left Washington on the 25th of May—and Mr. Crowninshield in his letter to Mr. Calhoun, says, that he could not know any thing of a cabinet meeting after the 25th of May.*

But the vice president surely has no regard to accuracy when he asserts that Mr. Crowninshield could not have been present at any cabinet meeting on the capture of St. Marks &c. &c. &c. &c. at which I was. Could not a cabinet meeting have been held before the early part of May and the 25th of that month? Mr. Calhoun asserts the negative—but every person that has understanding to count on, will assert the affirmative. This assertion of the vice president in the city of Washington, where the evidence existed, proves his reckless disregard of the truth in all occasions where he conceives it to be his interest to violate it. In regard to this assertion of the vice president, Mr. Erving observes: "These are stated assertions, since it is now ascertained that the official news of the capture of St. Marks was received at Washington, early in the month of May, nearly three weeks before either he or Mr. Crowninshield left that city; consequently it was very possible that that affair might have been the subject of a cabinet council when they were both present."† In the same letter Mr. Erving says, "That Sir,

* Gen. A. Jackson to the secretary of war.

Head quarters, division north, camp near St. Marks, April 26, 1831.

Reports his attack on the Yekasouka village—his taking the fort at St. Marks, &c.

The above communication is on file in the war department—post-marked New Orleans, April 30, 1831, and was received in the month of May, as appears from the record, from which the above transcript is taken.

"INDIAN BATTLE."

Milledgeville, April 17.

Captain Callis, who has just arrived in this place from Fort Hawkins, has politely furnished us with the following highly important intelligence:

About the 6th instant, general Jackson attacked and burnt the Mickaskee town, with an inconsiderable loss on his part. The loss of the Indians is not stated. It is supposed to be, and after the action, a number of the enemy surrendered themselves prisoners.—All their resources (among which were 1000 head of cattle) were taken or destroyed. The celebrated prophet Francis, and one of the principal chiefs, were hanged.

Gen. Jackson afterwards proceeded in St. Marks, and took possession of the fort without opposition. It is the impression that this blow has been decisive, that the war with the Indians is at an end, and the Georgia militia will soon return to their homes.

EDITORIAL.

We have a few further particulars of the late progress of the Indian war. The Tennessee detachment had one man killed and four wounded in the skirmish with the Indians at Mickaskee. Of the Indians, seven were killed; how many wounded, not known. Five negroes were taken the next day. The commander of the Spanish post of St. Marks, taken possession of by gen. Jackson, protested against the measure, but did not oppose its execution by force. The Georgia militia will be marched to Francis's hill, and in a few days be discharged. Capt. Arinthnot, a British officer, was captured at St. Marks, and is supposed to have been the same who, some time ago, commanded the Negro fort on the Appalachicola, which was destroyed by our forces under ed. Church. St. Marks, when taken, was strongly fortified, had twenty pieces of heavy ordnance mounted, and was garrisoned by about fifty men, who have since embarked for Pensacola.—Mr. Intosh, whose sagacity and enterprise are to merit commendation, has captured about one hundred more prisoners.

In the National Intelligencer of the 6th May, there is a despatch from gen. McIntosh to D. H. Mitchell, stating that a fight had taken place between his warriors and those of McQueen, in which the latter were defeated.

OF THE INDIAN WAR.

Major Perrault, of the United States' topographical corps, arrived at Mobile on the 20th ult. direct from the seat of war, gives Crowninshield asserted the accuracy of every fact in his letter to you, [me], and his relation to me circumstantially what posed in the cabinet consultation to which it refers. The question in the cabinet was, whether we should take possession of the Floridas. He was opposed to the project, and spoke against, and he mentioned to me in general terms the argument which he made use of on that occasion. He will recollect that a certain private letter was asked for, that Mr. Monroe had forgotten it, but went to look for it, in some cabinet box or trunk, (red or blue, I think he said), in this was found the letter. Mr. Crowninshield's recollection is minutely exact. He recollects as though he now could see the corner of the small box in which the letter was found, the very place in the room where he himself sat during the discussion, and all similar details.† Mr. Calhoun must, therefore, resort to some other shift or device to get rid of Mr. Crowninshield's evidence, more deceptive, than his naked assertion, that Mr. Crowninshield could not have been present at any cabinet meeting at which he was, on the Seminole campaign. The records of the war department show that this assertion is untrue.

The declarations before stated by Mr. Erving, were made subsequent to the date of Mr. Crowninshield's letter to Mr. Calhoun. He is a man of undoubted veracity, and although my memory does not enable me to offer any explanation upon this subject, I have no doubt that his statement in his letter to me is substantially correct; because his memory is distinct, and he states facts clearly and unequivocally. He is a man of unquestionable veracity, and his facts are recalled by Mr. Monroe, Mr. Adams, Mr. Wirt, or myself. They are besides facts that could not have been obtained any where else than in the cabinet council. This circumstance is conclusive, and must prevail with all unprejudiced minds.

It may be proper here to state, that I have no distinct recollection whether Mr. Crowninshield or Mr. Wirt were present in the cabinet council of July, 1831, or were absent from it. Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Adams I know were present. If I had recollectedly that Mr. Crowninshield had been absent as I now suppose him to have been, I certainly should not have applied to him for information. But the information given, evidently applies to a cabinet council at which he and Mr. Calhoun were present, and at which the confidential letter was produced. It is then demonstrated that the letter written by Mr. Crowninshield to the vice president, does not impugn in the slightest degree the facts stated in his letter to me. That letter does not give the date of the cabinet council to which it refers, and dates and references disprove the assertion of the vice president, that Mr. Crowninshield could not have been present at any cabinet, at which he was, upon the events of the Seminole campaign.

It remains for me to say a few words on the charge of disclosing cabinet secrets. I have but little to add to what I have urged in my letter of the 2d October. The principles stated in that letter are believed to be orthodox. In this republic, the president is appointed by the nation, and he appoints his cabinet by and with the advice and consent of the senate. The president and his cabinet are therefore responsible to the republic for their acts. Those acts for which they are responsible, ought, therefore, according to the principles of the government, to be known—otherwise the highest public functionaries known to the constitution are irresponsible. To this responsibility, inherent in our constitution, there is but one exception sanctioned by usage. If the secrets of the cabinet are disclosed while the cabinet is in existence, and charged with the management of the national concern, the cabinet might be rendered incapable of conducting those affairs successfully. This is the broadest ground upon which the secrecy of the cabinet transactions can be placed. By some it is contended, that in a government like ours, a secrecy should not be extended beyond the accomplishment of the objects which have been the subject of the cabinet deliberations. That when the measures which have been the subject of those deliberations have been effected, if they are beneficial to the republic, the people ought to know the extent of their obligations to their public functionaries; and if they are injurious to the community, that community ought to be placed in a situation to form a correct judgment upon the conduct of their public functionaries: I have acted upon the first principle; I have disclosed the proceedings of Mr. Monroe's cabinet on the Seminole war only after it ceased to exist, and then only in a respectful, and not a secret manner, and those proceedings had been communicated, not only to general Jackson but to the nation. It is a matter of general notoriety throughout the union, that general Jackson believed I had been indirectly to him in the cabinet deliberations on the Seminole war. By whom was that impression produced? By Mr. Calhoun and his friends. I am perfectly willing that the president of the United States should state how, and by whom that impression the subsequent additional intelligence relative to the operations and movements of general Jackson. After the conflagration of the Indian town of Mickaskee, and the destruction of the cattle and some few Indians, the general proceeded to St. Marks—the Spanish garrison surrendered as prisoners, and had arrived at Pensacola. From thence he directed his course to Suwanee, where there were about two thousand Indians and negroes, who, it was supposed, would be ready to take arms. P. confirms the account of the execution of the prophet Francis and an Indian chief, Arinthnot (Woodbine), in Jackson's possession, and in arms. The army of gen. Jackson is represented to be in health, high spirits, and amply provided, so that a decisive blow has no doubt been given. He has been joined by the Tennessee Volunteers. His force now, five thousand.—(Fed. Rep.)

was made upon his mind. The only ostensible act having that object in view, which is within my own knowledge, is the celebrated Nashville letter. That letter contained two falsehoods, one to my injury and use for Mr. Calhoun's benefit. No other human being was in on this treacherous globe, except Mr. Calhoun, who has an interest in fabricating those falsehoods; at least, the latter one. Until he shows that the letter in question was written by some one else not under his influence or direction, or shall point out some other person having an equal interest with himself in that fabrication, he must pardon me, at least, for considering him to be the author of that letter.

I here terminate this narrative, so far as my defence is concerned, and shall turn my attention more directly to the correspondence, and to the contradictions and commitments to which Mr. Calhoun has subjected himself in his several publications. Almost in the commencement of his address, he presents a letter from Mr. Wilson Lumpkin, containing one from Gen. Daniel Newman, enclosing the copy of a letter from me to Alfred Balch, esq., of Nashville, in answer to one received from him. Mr. Lumpkin, it will be observed, is very dissipated in the use of terms of reproach and vituperation; and general Newman is not much behind him. Of these two men it is sufficient to say, they are both apostates from the republican ranks. They will both, probably, deny this—They are, however, both Clark men. This they cannot deny, and they were both Clark men when about eight years old, namely, when they both about the same time made a political conversion. They are both unquestionably political turn-coats. Mr. Lumpkin is now the Clark candidate for governor. That party in this state is a mongrel party, formed of the worst materials of the political parties which have heretofore prevailed in Georgia. Gen. John Clark, the leader of the party, was believed to be a federalist—not flinging in 1824, but he was converted to support Mr. Adams, as declared for gen. Jackson. At the election in 1828, the only two electoral candidates for Mr. Adams were Clarkites; one of them had been his confidential secretary when he was governor. This man (gen. Clark), had succeeded in a wonderful degree in combining all the ignorance in the state in his support. It may be laid down as an axiom, that in the United States, if a man changes his politics, he has no other object in view than to change from selfish, and therefore dishonest motives. It is a notorious fact, that both these men were more than 30 years of age when they changed their politics. It is not wonderful then that there should be sympathy between them and Mr. Calhoun. The old adage, that birds of a feather will flock together, was never more fully verified than in this instance. The vice president is welcome to the copy of the letter which he has been obliged to give Mr. Balch, without his knowledge, permission, or consent. I have the letter of Mr. Balch now before me, in which he says, "The copy was not furnished with my knowledge, privity or consent." If I had supposed the copy of the letter would have been acceptable to Mr. Calhoun, I would have sent him a copy, and thereby possibly have saved his friend Newman from the shame and disgrace of publishing letters, he never wrote or said any thing of Mr. Calhoun; that I would not have written or said to him, had the occasion made it proper. Mr. Lumpkin, whom I have long known, prides himself upon being a very shrewd observer of passing events. Independent of his strong desire to communicate facts, to his friend the vice president, he assumes the character of a prophet, and ventures to predict what general Jackson will do, and what the result will be of the passing events, and the prophet, as he usually is called. He tells the vice president, "that from the day Pennsylvania took up gen. Jackson, every conspicuous friend of the vice president supported gen. Jackson, with constancy, zeal, and uniformity, and that gen. Jackson knows it." Leaving it therefore to be inferred, that every conspicuous friend of Mr. Calhoun in this matter, had been influenced so to act by the vice president. Now, unfortunately for his friend Lumpkin, the vice president declares to the people of the United States, that he was neutral between gen. Jackson and Mr. Adams. Wonderful! It is presumed that there was not another individual in the United States in this happy state of quiescence upon the presidential election. General Jackson and Mr. Adams were so unlike in their temper, manners, and principles, that it is at least difficult to conceive how any man who had the least common sense, could be neutral between them; and yet he was. But I believe Mr. Calhoun was not even neutral between those gentlemen. Does the nation recollect the letter of the 3d of July, 1824, by which Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Adams, and John McLean, then postmaster-general, withdrew their names from the 4th of July dinner, at Washington, because Ninian Edwards was excluded from that dinner? How happened this union? That letter, at least, shows a friendly feeling between them; and the act was done to prop the tottering reputation of one of Mr. Adams's political supporters, whose son-in-law wielded the vote of Illinois; which vote secured Mr. Adams's election. If it had been withheld, he would not have been elected, at least on the first ballot. Mr. Calhoun states that his opinion between the two candidates, towards whom he was in the happy state of neutrality, was founded upon principle, which he is, however, careful not to disclose, but leave to be inferred from the subsequent conduct. What that principle is, I am entirely at a loss to conjecture; nor has his subsequent conduct furnished any clue to arrive at it. Does he mean that the principle he alludes to is, that the candidate who receives the highest electoral vote must necessarily be elected by the house of representatives? The constitution has no such principle in it. If that had been the intention of the framers of that instrument, they would have said that the candidate receiving the highest number of electoral votes should be president. Or does he mean that the representatives of a state are bound to give the same vote as the electors had done? That principle is not in the constitution. The only limitation imposed upon the house of representatives, is, that they shall elect one of the three highest of the candidates. This the house of representatives did, and therefore violated no principle of the constitution, however they may have infringed upon the principle of the vice president, who is entitled to be elected. I believe the clause that tell what he means, if he means any thing, which is very questionable. Mr. Lumpkin, after stating the conduct of the vice president's friends, adds: "How then can it be possible that gen. Jackson can suspect the friendship, constancy, or sincerity of you, or your friends. No, he cannot. He will not, he does not. I have quite too much confidence in the general to believe such idle tales." But gentlemen, he has been detected in the course that Mr. Calhoun has pursued, and he is equally deceived in that which the general has pursued, and will probably continue to pursue, towards the vice president. The keen observer of passing events and the prophet are alike mistaken, both as to the president and vice president; but possibly he may be more fortunate than I have been in discovering the important principle which the vice president thinks ought to have governed the election of president, by the house of representatives, in February, 1825.

I proceed now to comment upon Mr. Calhoun's notes; to my letter of the 2d of October, 1830. It is, however due to myself, to state, that, that letter was written without any expectation that it would be published. I am, however, glad, that it was published, and that it has been accompanied with notes, by the vice president. This letter establishes a fact, which is a relief to me. John C. Calhoun established the Washington Republican for the purpose of vilifying my reputation; and 2d, That he was the instigator and inventor of the charges of Ninian Edwards, against my official and private character. The evidence by which these charges are established, would be received in any court of justice in the civilized world; and is a hundred times stronger than that which he has deemed sufficient against me in the courts of the United States. I have applied in our courts, that where the parties to a suit are together, and one alleges a fact touching their law suit in the presence and hearing of the other, which is not denied by the other, it is good evidence against the party not denying it. My letter to the vice president, of the 2d of October 1830, was answered by him on the 30th of that month. That letter, was, therefore, in his hands from the 30th of October, to the 1st of February, when he annexed a parcel of notes to it, in the "Telegraph." I shall in the sequel, state the evidence upon which those notes are ascribed to the vice president. They are such, that he at least, will be constrained to admit. In my letter to the vice president, of the 3d of October, 1830, I charge him with having established the Washington Republican for the purpose of vilifying my reputation, and that it was a vehicle for the work of his office, or his private editor, or his private clerk, or his private secretary, or his private friend, or his private enemy. I have not the means of ascertaining whether the letter be correct or not, but I do decide, that I should not let it be admitted. How does that benefit the vice president? Had McKenney been appointed a clerk before he became editor, or even while he was, Mr. Calhoun would in all probability, have alleged, that any interference by the secretary to prevent the abuse which was heaped upon me, by that press, would have been an infringement of the liberty of the press. But if the appointment was made, after his removal from editorial office, it is apparently more to remunerate the secretary, he had rendered by abusing me. In my letter of the 2d of October, I inform Mr. Calhoun, that he had been charged in a Charleston paper, with being concerned with the Ninian Edwards conspiracy, to destroy my reputation, and charged him with having excited Edwards to the act, and with reviving the charges; and state what general Noble informed me, of (his Calhoun), daily visits to Edwards, for 8 or 10 days before he set out for the west. No part of this charge is denied in the notes. The whole charge is therefore admitted. In the vice president's elaborate essay of the 20th of May, 1830, to the president, speaking of the Nashville letter, he says, "the Mr. Crawford, offers no reason for charging me with so dishonorable an act, as that of betraying the proceedings of the cabinet, and that for the purpose of injuring one of my associates in the administration." He adds, "I think the cabinet is to be blamed for this, and not Mr. Adams." In my letter of 2d October last, to the vice president, is stated, 1 "copy a question from your letter of the 20th May, 1830, thus expressed: you ask, why not charge Mr. Adams with having written it?" My reply is that the answer is conclusive. "That letter contained two falsehoods, one intended to injure me, the other to benefit you, (John C. Calhoun), and that which was false (John C. Calhoun), benefited Mr. Adams half the credit of defusing general Jackson, and giving it to you, (John C. Calhoun). Admitting for the sake of argument, that Mr. Adams was disposed to injure me, no one will, I think, suppose that he would voluntarily ascribe to you half the merit of his own actions, to the man who was the most strenuous opposer of his wishes. If the intrinsic evidence of the letter, fixes it upon you, (John C. Calhoun), and not upon Mr. Adams, subsequently, the vice president, corroborate the evidence deducible from the published letter." To the foregoing reasoning, no objection is taken in the notes. The reasoning is, therefore, admitted to be legitimate and sound. But it may possibly be urged by the vice president, that this is carrying the principle of admission too far. This would be admitted if Mr. Calhoun had confined his notes to facts; and had not introduced into them, in substance, the evidence of the vice president, of the 2d of October last, 1st, "you say that the decision of the cabinet was unanimously agreed to." This, I believe, to be untrue, and I believe you knew it to be untrue, at the time you wrote it. My reasons are the following: The cabinet deliberations commenced on Tuesday morning, and on Friday evening, I thought all the questions had been decided, and Mr. Adams was directed to draft a note to the Spanish minister, conformably to those decisions. I intended to set off for Georgia on Saturday morning, and in order to prepare the department for my absence, I was busily employed in office, when about 1 or 2 o'clock, I received a note from the president requesting my attendance. When I entered, the greatest part of Mr. Adams' note had been rejected, and the remainder was shortly after, because it was written not in conformity to the decisions which had been made by the cabinet, but expressly contrary to them. He was again directed to write the note, conformably to the decisions. This was late on Saturday evening. The next morning, I set off for Georgia." Mr. Adams' letter of the 25th of July, 1830, now before me, reiterates all the arguments he urged in the cabinet, and in it he informs me, "That the exposition which appeared in the Intelligencer, was not written by him." From all these facts, I think it is fairly inferrible that Mr. Adams did not agree to the decision of the cabinet, and that you must have known for it, as it is certain that he did not agree to it, on Saturday, and it is highly improbable that any argument should have been urged to convince him after he had been twice directed, to draft his note in conformity to decisions which had been previously made." To this train of reasoning, the vice president appends the following note: "This appears to be a non sequitur. The decision may have been unanimous, and a new acquiescence, by a majority, may have been made. I am perfectly willing that the intelligent reader should decide the question of logic, between us, by adding a single observation, that in the ordinary routine it was the duty of the secretary of state, to have drawn the exposition which appeared in the Intelligencer; and that he would have done it, is highly probable, but from his having dissented from the principles it contained. In this foregoing note, the vice president evidently objects to the argument presented in my letter, and he excepts to the argument in this case, he was more strongly bound to except to the argument, tended to fix upon him, the writing of the Nashville letter, if it was illogical and unsound, especially as it was presented in compliance with his express demand, contained in his letter of the 29th of May, 1830. By his objecting to the correctness of the argument, in one case, and waving any objection to that furnished at Adm. request, he should be considered as having acquiesced in the correctness, and legitimate soundness of the conclusion, that he is the author of the Nashville letter.

I will now explain the reason why I consider the vice president at the author of the notes appended to my letter in the Telegraph. In his elaborate letter of the 29th of May, he says, "He, Mr. Crawford, was at Middletown on the 10th of August, a few days after he passed through Augusta, and a little after there appeared a statement in the Georgia Journal, somewhat varied from that made in Edgfield, but agreeing with it in most of the particulars. I cannot lay my hand on the article, but have a distinct recollection of it. You no doubt remember it, circumstances fixed it upon Mr. Crawford, and it has not, to my knowledge, been denied." Here it is seen that Mr. Calhoun relies upon my silence as evidence of guilt; as evidence that I had communicated cabinet secrets to the editor of the Georgia Journal, although he does not pretend that the statement in the Georgia Journal was chargeable upon me, but that journal, and does not deny the circumstances that he says fixed it upon me. When it is presumed, that he had Clark's pamphlet before him, and, which, though written by the most vindictive and malignant being that ever existed, admits that the editor of the Georgia Journal, formally stated, in the following paragraph: "It may be proper to state, that we did not, as has been erroneously supposed, derive our information from the secretaries of the cabinet, Mr. Crawford, respecting the reported division of the cabinet, on the propriety of arresting Gen. Jackson for his late conduct." I never suspected, that I had been charged with any connection with the statement in the Georgia Journal, until some time in October of the year 1830, when a pamphlet published by John Clark, then governor of Georgia, fell into my hands, which contained the charge, accompanied by the evidence of the charge which the governor had been able to collect; but the evidence was of a nature so ridiculous, that none but the author would have made the charge. The same Wilson Lumpkin, who figures in the correspondence and address of the vice president, informed me that gov. Clark had sent the charge and the evidence, to gen. Jackson, to be by him laid before the president. It is presumed that Mr. Calhoun was constant of this fact, as he tells the president in his letter of the 29th May, 1830, "You no doubt remember it." I was never informed by Mr. Monroe, whether this charge was submitted to him. But he informed the senators from Pennsylvania, that the general had urged my removal from the cabinet, and they communicated it to me, the same day. The pamphlet just referred to, contained no currency. I do not recollect to have seen a single reference to it in any newspaper, not even the Washington Republican, although the pamphlet was published expressly to affect the presidential election. It was so ridiculous and malignant, that even Mr. Calhoun's press, the Washington Republican, which teemed with daily abuse of me, thought it prudent not to use it. Yet it is a charge contained in such a pamphlet, and under such circumstances, that the vice president considers evidence against me, because I had not denied it.

A number of the Globe, dated in the latter end of February last, contains explanatory of the notes appended to my letter of Oct. 2, 1830, by the vice president, which is headed by the following remark:—"The editor of the Telegraph has published Mr. Crawford's letter to Mr. Calhoun, patched all over with the notes of his antagonist. It is but fair to give the explanatory notes given by a friend of Mr. Crawford." Here the charge is direct and positive. The vice president was in the city, and must be presumed to have seen the charge. Mid. silence, therefore, is evidence, that he was the author of the notes. It is, at least, evidence to which he cannot object; for it is tenfold stronger than that which he has urged against me. This remark has already been published in a variety of papers, and must, therefore, have reached him through a variety of channels. He has contradicted none of them, and must be presumed to have acquiesced in the truth of the charge. Besides, no one can believe that Mr. Calhoun would have confided the task of writing the notes to another person. In his letter of the 31st Oct. last, returning mine, it is seen that he intended to use that letter against me. I have never before the appearance of Mr. Calhoun's publications, understood and felt the force and intensity of that exclamation of the patriarch Job, "Oh that mine adversary had written a book."—Mine has written two books and one set of notes, by which he is convicted by legal evidence,—1st of having written, or caused to be written, the Nashville letter, which, in his letter of May 29, 1830, he asserts never to have seen. 2d, of having set up the Washington Republican, for the purpose of vilifying my reputation. 3d, of having conspired with Ninian Edwards to destroy my official and private character. In his letter last referred to the vice president pronounces; "that it would have been dishonorable for him to have written the Nashville letter to injure one of his associates in the administration." No rational being, will, I think, dissent from this sentence. But he is by his notes, convicted of this dishonorable act. Now it is respectfully submitted, that the conclusion to be drawn from this evidence, is whether it is more dishonorable to have written that letter, which contains but one falsehood, to the injury of that associate, than to have established a press, for vilifying the reputation of the same associate, which teemed with daily falsehoods upon that associate.

The vice president affects much patriotism and great veneration for the fundamental institutions of the United States. There is none of those institutions more vital than the liberty of the press. That liberty can never be impaired in the United States, but by its licentiousness. It is firmly believed that no press established in the union carried the licentiousness of the press to such extremes as the Washington Republican, not even excepting the notorious Peter Porcupine. The vice president is therefore an enemy to the liberty of the press. Again, it is respectfully submitted to the community, to decide, whether it was more dishonorable to have excited Ninian Edwards to conspire with him to blast my reputation for ever and fix a stigma upon my innocent and unoffending children? The foregoing questions are submitted with the fullest confidence, that the answers will be such as a virtuous community ought to give; that the dishonorable conduct, rises in regular gradation and terminates in a climax. The vice president is convicted of the crime of enmity against his friend, as represented by him as his bitterest enemy, his most inveterate enemy. It is true I feel no friendship for him, and have not since the publication of the Nashville letter, and have never made declarations of friendship for him since that period. What is the evidence which he produces of my enmity to him? 1st. My letter to Alfred Balch, esq. 3d. My letter to Mr. Barry, respecting the rejection of vice evidence. The rejection was required to expiate this evidence, with the charges which have just been established by legal evidence, against the vice president, and decided between us, which has furnished the most evidence of enmity and resentment. Some English author I do not recollect which at this moment, says that a man who has been injured by another may forgive the injury, and even become the friend of the person who inflicted the injury, but that the person who inflicted the injury, can never be reconciled to, or be the friend of the person who injured. If this reasoning is applied to the vice president and myself, it must be evident that he can never become my friend, but that it is possible I should become him. But what does the vice president mean when he charges me with being his bitterest enemy? Does he mean that I would do him an act of injustice or personal injury? If he means this he is wrong. There is not a human being in the world to whom I would do a personal injury, or an act of injustice. But if he means I am not friendly to his further promotion he is right. I know his radical unworthiness, and could not conscientiously aid his further elevation to office. If I were to do it, I should render myself the accomplice of the injury which he might and probably would inflict upon the community.

At the vice president, in his notes to my letter, insists upon Mr. Duffie's evidence, and that is evidence in the foundation of almost all his reasoning, and of almost all the inferences drawn in his elaborate letter of the 30th of May, 1830; it is proper at once for me to say there is no truth in any part of Mr. McDuffie's statement, except that I passed through the village of Edgfield, in the summer of 1818, and was at the house of col. Simpkins. Every thing beyond that in Mr. McDuffie's statement, is the fiction of his brain, (see Judge Moore's letter.) After reading that letter

*Lexington, (Ga.) June, 1831.

Dear sir,

In answer to the inquires you made of me the other day, I beg leave to state—the conduct of gen. Jackson in the Seminole war of 1818, produced as great feeling in our little town as it did in any other part of our state. You had written on to Thomas W. Cobb, esq. one of our representatives in congress, and who then resided in Lexington, that you would leave Washington for Georgia as soon as a cabinet meeting should adjourn which would be held to make some inquiry into this matter. Your arrival in Lexington was looked for with great anxiety, and I remember the day you did arrive, that Mr. Cobb and Dr. D. Dunn, now of Tennessee, were at my house at the time you were expected in that day's stage, no other person was present except those gentlemen and myself. This was the last of July of that the reader is informed that I passed through the village of Edgefield on Friday morning, and arrived at Lexington, on Sunday, to dinner. Col. Simpkins and Mr. McDuffie, my neighbor, presented my introduction. Messrs. Moore, Cobb, and Dudley Dunn, were my personal and political friends and neighbors. Can any man in his senses believe I would have made the disclosures, attributed to me by Mr. McDuffie on Friday morning, and on Sunday should have refused all such communications to my personal confidential and political friends? But in the presidential canvass of 1823 and 1824, every thing was wielded by Mr. Calhoun and his friends, to injure me, and none of those friends were more active than Mr. McDuffie. I remember in one of his dinner speeches at Cambridge, I think, he designated me as the radical chief, a term at that time, in the estimation of Mr. McDuffie and his patron Mr. Calhoun, of the bitterest reproach. If the facts contained in Mr. McDuffie's letter to the vice president, had been known, they would have been proclaimed at every cross roads, muster ground, and even upon the home tops not only in South Carolina, but throughout the United States. Not a whisper, however, was heard of them during that period of excitement, because they had not been instilled, and were conceived and brought forth only when it was believed to be necessary for the vice president's defence. Edgefield, whose letter in the French publication has been for many years a subject of the interior courts of Oglethorpe county, and very extensively known in this state, and where he is known enjoys the reputation of a man of honor, honesty, and veracity, equal to that of any man in the state or United States. His statements are therefore entitled to full credit. Dr. Dunn, who now resides in West Tennessee, on doubt recollects the same facts and will doubtless confirm them when required. It may be alleged that the vice president, had been in house was confined to the time which elapsed between the breakfast of the passengers and the starting of the stage. Every person who has travelled in the stage, knows that it is generally ready to start before the passengers have finished their meals. My visit to Mr. Simpkins, must therefore have been but a few minutes, yet Mr. McDuffie has furnished his friend with materials for an hour's conversation at least. The reasons contained in my letter of the 2d of October, were sufficient to have convinced any truth speaking man of the falseness of Mr. McDuffie's statement, but I am not at all surprised that the vice president did not feel their force, as his own conduct did not enable him to appreciate them.

The vice president's pamphlet, discloses a piece of evidence that I had not before seen. It is the letter of Robert S. Garnett, late a member of congress from Virginia. Mr. Garnett, in his letter, seems to be in haste to make the important communication. To use the humanitarian phrase he seems to have gone off at half past ten. In his letter to the vice president he makes me say that Gen. Jackson ought to be censured, and the extract from his diary which immediately follows, (and which, it is presumed, was before him when he wrote his letter), makes me say that the general ought to be censured. Now it is seriously submitted to every rational and reflecting person, whether even the diary of a man is entitled to any credit who cannot distinguish between the words censured and censured. I conscientiously believe that I never used either of the words ascribed to me by Mr. Garnett. My conduct towards Mr. Cobb, upon the subject of his resolutions, contradicts Mr. Garnett's story. So does Judge Moore's letter. So does my recollection of the sentiments entertained of the propriety, or rather of the impropriety of a legislative inquiry into the subject. But I will not press this subject further, for I really have no unkind feeling towards Mr. Garnett, and had rather be subjected to the slight stain of inconsistency, his diary may cast upon me, than that he should be subject to a much greater imputation.

The vice president in one of his notes, says that a very material part of Mr. Adams' letter to me has been withheld by me. That material part is negative wholly, and it will be seen by the annexed extract of my letter to Mr. Adams. I did not expect to be remembered any thing about the confidential letter, and assigned my reason for it. Mr. Adams has done so as received a copy of my letter from Mr. Adams, as I have authorized him to furnish. If there is any thing in that letter which in his opinion tends to contradict or weaken the force of that extract, he can expose it by publishing the whole letter. Mr. Adams states the grounds on which it was proposed to bring general Jackson to trial, but does not state by whom it was urged. In my letter of the 2d of October, 1850, to the vice president, I state that "Mr. Adams told me that all the members of the cabinet were of the opinion, and made any proposition of an entirely voluntary character to the general, and add that if he denies that the charge in Mr. Adams' letter applies to him, I will obtain the necessary explanations." The vice president appends no note to this part of my letter, and must therefore be considered as admitting the truth of my statement. But his pamphlet shows that he has addressed a letter to Mr. Adams, on the subject of his letter to me and has not ventured to ask the question of him. This is therefore a second admission of the truth of the charge that he proposed to bring general Jackson to trial. I still believe there was no express proposition to arrest or try Gen. Jackson. But the vice president's own admission if duly considered and analyzed, amounts in substance, to that and nothing else. He admits that he proposed inquiry. There are I believe but two modes of inquiry known to the law as starting, one a court of inquiry, and the other a court martial, which is always resorted to when the facts upon which the government is called upon to decide are not well ascertained; a court of inquiry is proper, and the duty of the court is simply to ascertain the facts, and report them to the government for its decision.

2d. A court martial for the trial of military offenders, when the facts are sufficiently ascertained, for the government to decide that the officer ought, or ought not to be put on his trial. In the case of Gen. Jackson, the facts were all distinctly known. They consisted of the orders of the war department, and the reports and dispatches of the general under those orders. There was here no necessity for a court of inquiry. Mr. Calhoun then, in proposing an inquiry, did in fact, though not in words, propose a court martial, which pre-supposes an arrest. The president, son who has travelled in the stage, knows that it is generally ready to start before the passengers have finished their meals. My visit to Mr. Simpkins, must therefore have been but a few minutes, yet Mr. McDuffie has furnished his friend with materials for an hour's conversation at least. †Extract of a letter from William H. Crawford to John Q. Adams, dated 5th July, 1836.

"I think it is probable that the letter I did not make a strong impression upon your mind, for I have no recollection that you made any use of it, in your effort to induce the president to support Gen. Jackson's conduct throughout."

†Extract of a letter from Thomas W. Cobb, dated Washington, May, 1824.

"You do justice both to Mr. Crawford and myself in saying that Mr. Crawford disapproved of the course which I felt it my duty to the constitution to pursue on the Mexican war. He did persuade me not to move any thing on the subject, and endeavored to convince me that there was no necessity. A part of our conversation occurred in the presence of John Holmes, of Maine, who no doubt will remember it. At another interview between ourselves Mr. Crawford again persuaded me not to be the leading mover on the subject, urging not only his former reason, but stating expressly his fears that from the friendship existing between us, my conduct would be charged to have been dictated by him. I replied, that I should be sorry if my conduct should do him any injury, but that I must be permitted to pursue that course which my conscience prescribed; especially as I firmly believed that the constitution had been violated in the most flagrant manner. Accordingly, I did move the resolutions on the subject to be passed in the journal of the house of representatives."

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant, who is acquainted with martial law, no doubt understood Mr. Calhoun's proposition as one subjecting him to arrest and court martial.

All the other of Mr. Calhoun's notes to my letter admit of a satisfactory explanation, or are too insignificant in their nature to require attention, and would well be review to an inconvenience. I therefore take my leave of them, reserving to myself the right of explaining, or refuting them, if it should hereafter become necessary.

In the publication of James A. Hamilton, esq. it appears, that after an interview with the vice president, after his return to New York, he wrote to the vice president, stating the facts which the vice president had communicated to him that were not of a confidential nature, and requested him to correct the statement if he had misunderstood him. The vice president replies and does not correct the statement, and does not even intimate that the statement was incorrect in any particular. Now, however, in his supplementary address he asserts that Mr. Hamilton's statement is incorrect. By the rules of reason and logic, the vice president is estopped from denying the truth of that statement, for when called upon for that purpose, he did not pretend that the statement was incorrect in any particular. But now he says it is inaccurate, and he could not have corrected it without exposing cabinet secrets that would have been improper. Who ever heard of such an excuse! All that he was required by Mr. Hamilton, was to say whether his statement was correct or not. No development of cabinet secrets or reasonings were necessary. He had only to reply that Mr. Hamilton's statement was incorrect, and if he pleased, to correct the statement. Mr. Hamilton did not even request him to do that. But the fact of principal importance disclosed is that the vice president did disclose the confidential secrets of the cabinet to Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton expressly says in his address, "the conversation was extended and on his part (the vice president's) embraced much that I never felt myself at liberty to disclose. The vice president then, in February, 1828, did disclose much of the confidential proceedings of the cabinet which Mr. Hamilton has never felt himself at liberty to disclose. It is only when the vice president understands the information given is likely to be published that his qualms of conscience are excited, and that he feels the sacred nature of cabinet secrets, although the facts intended for publication had not been communicated in confidence. He seems at that time to have had an instinctive horror of publication. I expect at this time he deeply regrets, that instinctive horror slumbered when he committed his first address to the press. This disclosure of Mr. Hamilton's will, I hope, shut the mouth of the vice president as to the secrets of the cabinet. Mr. Adams and Mr. Wirt, may continue to descend upon the sacred nature of cabinet secrets. They will find few admirers and still fewer advocates. The principles for which they and the vice president contend, not only dishonest counsellors. For my own part I never said a word or did an act in the cabinet, that so far as I was concerned, I should have been unwilling to be publicly known the same day. But the counsellor who would give advice in the cabinet, or do acts there, which he would be ashamed to own publicly, would place a great value upon the sacredness of cabinet secrets. Mr. Monroe and Mr. Crownshield have acted like honest men upon this business. They have said nothing about the sacred nature of cabinet secrets. Mr. Calhoun endeavors most zealously to make it manifest that he is acting in self defence, and that he is called upon by the president, to justify certain proceedings of his while in the cabinet; to account for his opinions and acts as secretary of the war department. The vice president well knew at the time that he was endeavoring to impose this charge upon the public, that it was untrue. The president, distinctly states his causes of complaint against the vice president. It is simply this, that while he had pursued one course in the cabinet, he had contrived to make him believe that he pursued a different and directly opposite course, and I have no doubt that he might have added with strict truth that he had contrived to make him believe that, I had acted in the cabinet, the part which he himself had pursued. Notwithstanding my conviction that the vice president had pursued this course, I have made no advance towards the president to ascertain the fact. Duplicity is the only charge which the president has urged against the vice president. If he is innocent of the charge, why does he not publish his correspondence with the general, and show that he disclosed to him frankly, the course he had pursued towards him; until he does this he must remain subject to the charge of duplicity, urged against him by the president. Duplicity out of the cabinet and not for his conduct in the cabinet, is what the president charges against the vice president.

The vice president in his address, complains of plots and conspiracies directed against him. The Telegraph charges these plots and conspiracies upon Mr. Van Buren, and the Telegraph no doubt speaks by the authority of the vice president. Hark! my enemies have affected to consider me the principal whenever I have been charged with any agency. But now the vice president and his editor, seem to consider me only as the instrument of Mr. Van Buren. Which that gentleman and Mr. Cambreleng visited me in April, 1827, I do not believe that the presidential question was the topic of conversation during the visit; what makes me more confident on this subject is, that I have a distinct recollection that Mr. Van Buren wrote to me from Augusta, to know my determination on that subject, if I had forced me. Before they left my house they informed me that they intended visiting a gentleman of my acquaintance in South Carolina, of great worth and respectability. I wrote to him, introducing them. After they had left his house, he answered my letter, expressing much satisfaction with the visitors, especially with Mr. Van Buren, except in one particular, and that was that he seemed disposed to let Mr. Calhoun remain where he was. Now, says he, I want to punish him for the mischief he has done. This satisfied me that Mr. Van Buren was at that time not unfriendly to the vice president. Mr. Van Buren is charged with conspiracy, because he is the only person supposed to have an immediate interest in the downfall of the vice president; and the conspiracy is supposed by the vice president and his editor, to have originated in the spring of 1827, when Mr. Van Buren paid me a friendly visit; by placing his origin so far back, the charge defeats itself. The vice president in his letter to the president of the 25th August, 1830, alluding to my letter to A. Balch, esq. of the 14th December, 1827, says, "a proposition of the kind at that particular period when the election was most doubtful and warmly contested, needs no comment as to its object. The presidential election was then on the 14th December, 1827, most doubtful and warmly contested. Yet to give plausibility to the charge of conspiracy against Mr. Van Buren, it must be supposed not only that he foresaw gen. Jackson's election certain, but that he foresaw that the general when elected, would appoint him (Mr. Van Buren) secretary of state. This is giving that gentleman more foresight than he claims or deserves, and the vice president rather less than he possesses. If the vice president seriously intends to apply the conspiracy of which he thinks or asserts that he is the victim to Mr. Van Buren, he must make it originate after he became secretary of state, for until then he could have had no interest, in prostrating this political colossus. The truth is, there never has existed a conspiracy against the vice president. The only conspiracy that has existed since 1818, except of the vice president and Ninian Edwards against me, has been one conducted by the vice president and his friends, to expose me to the resentment and vengeance of gen. Jackson. Now that is unveiled and can no longer be concealed, the plotter cries out plots and conspiracy. The recent conduct of the vice president, brings forcibly to mind that line of the Latin author who says, "Quem deus vult perdere prius dementat." Which being translated is, "He whom God intends to ruin, he first makes mad, or deprives him of his reason." If the vice president was not in this situation, he never would have published the correspondence. A title of the talents and tact, that he has generally been supposed to possess, would have prevented that publication.

But his want of reason did not stop with his determination to publish. The first want of reason and common sense, that I shall point out in the publication, is the disclosure of his pretended neutrality between Mr. Adams and the presidential canvass of gen. Jackson, in 1825 and '4. It seems he had managed to deceive his friends as well as gen. Jackson. There can be no doubt that Mr. Lumpkin believed him, a sincere, zealous, constant and uniform, "supporter of gen. Jackson." This opinion of Mr. Lumpkin, is communicated to him in January 1829. He never deceives Mr. Lumpkin until in Feb. 1831, he declares to the public that he had been neutral between Mr. Adams and the general. This declaration was wholly unnecessary. The principal thing he intended to do was to contradict me. That in his estimation was indispensable, but that imposed no obligation upon him to disclose his conduct upon that occasion. He might have saved Mr. Lumpkin's feelings and in all probability have preserved his friendship by silence. Again he affects great consideration for Mr. Monroe, yet in his letter of the 29th of May, so often referred to, he makes Mr. Monroe say, that the first time he had read gen. Jackson's private letter was in December, 1818, when he had before him Mr. Monroe's letter of the 21st December, 1818, in which he informs gen. Jackson he had read it in the July preceding, and on Mr. Calhoun's suggestion. Now although I have no high opinion of the accuracy or tenacity of Mr. Monroe's memory, it cannot be more defective than the vice president's if he is to be believed.

But there are circumstances connected with the question, that must be conclusive against the vice president. Mr. Monroe appears to have had the subject constantly in his mind. The vice president publishes with the correspondence, three letters from the president to the general, dated in July, October and December, in the last of which, he states when and how the confidential letter was read. In May 1830, nearly twelve years afterwards, with Mr. Monroe's account of the matter in writing before him, it makes Mr. Monroe say that he had never read the letter until December, 1818. However defective Mr. Monroe's memory may be, the vice president's is worse. In my letter to him of the 2d October, 1830, I state that some time in the year 1821, he informed me that his memory could not be relied upon as to facts even after a short lapse of time. In October of that year, I stated that fact to him in a letter, which he answered next day, and takes no exception to that statement. I do not make this statement from memory. I have now before me, a letter written by me, the next day in which that fact is recorded. The same fact is contained in my letter last cited. To the statement thus presented, Mr. Calhoun attaches no note, thereby twice admitting the correctness of the statement of the frailty of his memory. Yet in his letter of the 29th May, 1830, he asserts that his recollection is distinct, that the confidential letter was not produced and read. If the tables of his memory retained impressions as durable as brass, he could not have made this assertion, if he had had one principle of honor, or honesty in his heart. Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams, have said as much as honest men could say, viz: that they had no recollection that it was produced and read. There is but one case in which it is possible for an honest man to make such a declaration. And that is when he has a distinct recollection of a fact which renders it impossible that the alleged fact should have occurred. But Mr. Calhoun does not allege any thing of this kind upon which to found his distinct recollection. It is his naked assertion of his distinct recollection that he palms upon the president and afterwards upon the good people of the United States by his publication. Now I repeat, that no honest man, could, or would have made such a declaration, let his memory be ever so good. How then could the vice president, whose memory he has twice directly admitted could not be relied upon as to facts, after the lapse of nearly twelve years pretend to recollect not a fact, but that a fact did not happen at a particular time, without pretending that any peculiar circumstance had riveted it in his memory.

At an interview, between Mr. Calhoun, and myself in October, 1821, without being called upon by any thing I had said, he stated, at the presidential election, for a successor to Mr. Monroe, there would be but two candidates; one from the north, the other from the south. That he was young enough to wait. This declaration was repeated with emphasis; and he added, if my friends did not act an unfriendly part towards him, it was easy to foresee what part he would take in the contest. In less than six weeks he was an avowed candidate for the presidency, and the only avowed one. He never made any explanation of this change of opinion, nor did I ever intimate a wish to be informed. His declaration, above stated, does not depend on my memory, for I have in my possession, a letter written by me, the day after the declaration was made. And since the publication of the correspondence, I met with a gentleman who was then friendly to us both, and for aught I know, is still, to whom in a letter, about the date of the declaration, I had communicated it. He reminded me of it, and urged me if I took any notice of the correspondence, to present this fact to the public. In compliance with his opinion, and advice, I have presented it.

I have been somewhat surprised, at the regrets that have been expressed by many of the newspapers, at the misunderstanding which has occurred between the president and vice president. It is certainly a misnomer to call it a misunderstanding, it is in fact a correct understanding between the parties between whom there has been a misunderstanding since the summer of 1818. Some doubts have even been expressed, whether the rupture would not produce a bad effect upon the ensuing presidential election: such doubts are entirely visionary. Let Mr. Calhoun go over to the opposition tomorrow, he cannot in my opinion control one electoral vote, not even in South Carolina, for I am credibly informed that the president of the United States, can get more votes in Abbeville district than Mr. Calhoun, although it is his native district. The truth is, I believe, Mr. Calhoun never was a republican in principle. He became a man after the federal party had been overthrown, and he had sagacity enough to be convinced that it would not rise to power in a short time. His ambition therefore prompted him to join the republican party. During the war the excitement which existed, and the pressure which the enemy made on the country, required all the vigilance and all the energy of those charged with the public interest. But after the war a new scene opened, and then it was discovered that many who had entered the republican ranks, were not republicans in fact. The tariff for the protection of domestic labor, and internal improvements, became prominent and leading measures, in both of which Mr. Calhoun took a leading and active part. He is now at the head of the nullifiers in South Carolina, to nullify the tariff of 1828, because it does protect domestic labor. I have no doubt many honorable respectable and well informed citizens believe in the doctrine of nullification. Mr. Calhoun is probably the only nullifier in South Carolina, who cannot be honestly so. If there be another, it is his friend George McDuffie, who at least is only second to him in inconsistency as a politician.

The vice president's past conduct, and present situation reminds me strongly of one of Æsop's fables, in which he relates that an ass having obtained a lion's skin, put it on him, and went into the forest where his appearance spread alfright and dismay among the tenants of the woods, who fled to their most secret covets and hiding places. Shortly after the ass began to bray. The spell was dissolved; the alfrighted beasts returned from their coverts, and collecting around, they stripped him of the lion skin, and exposed him to the scorn and ridicule of the assembled beasts. For about twenty years the vice president had assumed the part, and mien, and exterior of a patriot, and a man of strict honor. Through the agency of a parcel of young officers whom he had the address to attach to him, while he was secretary of war, he has managed to impose the belief upon the majority of the citizens of this republic, that he was what he seemed to be. Unfortunately in the month of February last, he came out with his address to the people of the United States. This address has had the same effect upon him, that the braying had upon the jacksass. That publication has produced inquiry and criticism. And inquiry and criticism cannot fail to expose the vice president to the scorn and ridicule, not of the assembled beasts, but of the citizens of the United States. I now take my leave of the vice president, by saying that if any of his quondam friends shall, after reading this review, wish to make him the object of adoration, they shall not be interrupted in their devotions by

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

MAJOR EATON'S REPLY.

To Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien,
ON THE DISSOLUTION OF THE LATE CABINET.

City of Washington, September, 1831.
TO THE PUBLIC.

It is with extreme reluctance that I appear before the public, upon a subject purely of personal character. To me, nothing could be more painful than the necessity of bringing into discussion, in the newspapers, any thing which concerns my private and domestic relations. In civilized society, a man's house is his castle, and the circle of his family a sanctuary never to be violated. He who drags before the public its helpless inmates, and subjects them to rude assaults, deserves to be considered worse than a barbarian. Against those who commit such sacrilege, and shun an honorable accountability, the public will justify an appeal, which, under other circumstances, might not be considered admissible. I expect not by this effort to silence those who have been assailing all that is dear to me. It may open afresh the fountains of their abuse. It is probable, that the very remorse and shame which an accurately drawn picture may produce, will excite my persecutors to raise clouds of fresh calumnies to break upon me with redoubled fury. Let it all come! my head is uncovered and my bosom bare.

There is another consideration which would seem to impose silence. These are times of angry political contest, unsuited to dispassionate inquiry. Already have the enemies of the president made use of my private relations to injure and harass him. In attempting to represent him as devoting his thoughts and his power to further my views and wishes, they seek to blind the people to the principles and acts of his administration. They will doubtless seize even upon my humble efforts at self-vindication as a means of promoting that design, seriously calculating by their machinations, that the people of the United States may be wrought into a "tempest of passion," and thus induced to forget the signal success of his foreign negotiations, and the unparalleled prosperity and happiness which, under his administration, our country enjoys.

But to all these consequences I submit myself with entire resignation. A portion of the community will at least do me justice. They will perceive that the president is in no need of any developments from me to give proofs of his integrity, and that it is not for his sake that I present myself before the public. It is a paramount duty which I owe to myself and to my family, and which shall be performed. Others may conceive, but I cannot describe the pain those attacks have inflicted. It was indeed enough that I was assailed in private circles, while I was in office; but retiring from its labors, with a view to sit down at my home, in Tennessee, it was but a reasonable expectation to indulge, that I might escape a repetition of these assaults, and be permitted to enjoy my fire-side and friends in peace. But instead of putting an end to this unfeeling war, my resignation served to make my enemies more bold. What before was whispered in dark corners, now glared in the columns of the newspapers. Men who had been my friends—who had received favors at my hands—who had partaken of the hospitalities of my house, and given pledges of friendship at my own board, became my deadliest enemies, while I still confided in them.

I sought that redress which wrongs so wanton and deeply provoked, and which public opinion, under such circumstances, has always justified. It was refused in a way which added insult to injury; and I was then accused, by one of the malignant calumniators, as having sought revenge at the head of a band of assassins. Not satisfied with privately injuring me in my own, and the honor of my house—hold, and shrinking from an honorable and just accountability, these persons have, one after another, come before the public to give countenance and sanction to the calumnies of a reckless press. Mr. Ingham, Mr. Branch and Mr. Berrien, with evident concert, and deliberate design, by filling the country with erroneous and discolored statements, and substituting falsehood for truth, have sought to consummate the ruin which their conduct in office so insidiously began.

What can I do? What course adopt? There are persons committed to my charge who are dear to me. I am their only protector. Shall I see them worse than murdered, by men who claim the polish and the culture of civilized life, and not lift my hand and my voice for their rescue? These gentlemen express a desire to preserve their characters, as a precious inheritance for their children. Is the good name of a mother, of less value to her orphan daughters? Did they forget, that she whom so relentlessly they pursue, and who in nothing ever wronged them, has two innocent little children, whose father lies buried on a foreign shore? Has these little ones ever injured them? Were they and their mother so much in the way of these gentlemen, that in their malignity they should consent to sap the foundation of their future prospects in life? Had they no remorse, in conspiring and seeking to rob them of all that villany and fraud had left them—the inheritance of a mother's good name? And if they could be stimulated in their addresses to the public, by the desire of transmitting to their children a spotless honor and unsullied name, what might not be expected of me, in defence of the slandered wife of my bosom, and her helpless unprotected children? Attacks on myself, I disregard. A man's character is in his own hands: in his bosom he knows how to protect it. It is by his own acts only, that he can be degraded. Not so with a female. The innocent and the guilty alike, the envomed tongue of slander may reach and destroy. It is a withering blast, which can blight the sweetest rose, as well as the most noisome weed.

Although I expect nothing at the hands of those who can violate the laws of social life, and, all the precepts of "holy charity," yet by an exposure of their motives and designs, I may be able to render their future malignity powerless. This induces me to make this appeal to my countrymen, and to their award to trust it. There is in the public mind intuitive honor—a native sense of justice, which revolts at wanton attacks on female character, and in the end will visit the unfeeling assailants with terrible retribution. To these I appeal, and on these rely; not in the hope to silence the malignant and the vindictive but to make their attacks to recoil upon themselves.

A place in gen. Jackson's cabinet, by me, was never desired. My ambition was satisfied with a seat in the senate which thrice had been kindly bestowed upon me by my fellow-citizens of Tennessee. Distrust in my competency to discharge the duties of one of the departments, and a reluctance to encounter its labors, induced me to prefer my situation in the senate. About to enter upon untried scenes, with a limited knowledge of the characters and feelings of those by whom he was to be surrounded, the president felt anxious to have near him some of his long tried personal friends, in whom he had entire confidence. He desired that judge White, my colleague in the senate, or myself should accept one of the departments. I urged it upon judge White, because I considered him better qualified, and better adapted to the station, than myself. He declined it. I then felt it to be my duty to accept the offer of the president. He had just lost the partner of his bosom, and was solitary and disconsolate. As in his kindness he seemed to think I could be serviceable to him, it did not seem consistent with the friendly relations which had long subsisted between us, to leave him at such a moment.

Mr. Van Buren was appointed, because the president had confidence in his talents and integrity, and because he appeared to be the expectation of the country. Mr. Ingham was selected, for the reason that the president was induced to believe that the democracy of Pennsylvania desired it. Mr. Barry, from a confidence reposed in him by the president, derived from his personal knowledge of his worth and merits. Between the first and last named gentlemen and myself, the most cordial friendship has always subsisted: nothing has ever arisen to interrupt in the least our friendly relations.

Mr. Branch and myself were born and reared in the same county of North Carolina, educated at the same college, and had been associates and friends, in early, and in more advanced life. I solicited his appointment as a member of the cabinet, and at the president's request informed him of the selection. He made no objection—not the least, save on the score of a modest distrust of his competency, and expressed at the time much gratitude towards the president, and exhibited much good feeling towards myself.

With Mr. Berrien I had been on terms of intimacy, and supposing him to be a man of talents and honor, was pleased that he was selected. The president requested me to confer with him in relation to his acceptance. At that time we were in habits of the kindest intercourse. He seemed highly flattered by this manifestation of the president's confidence, and offered no objection to an acceptance, except intimating a possible interference with his private business. The next day he informed me that he would accept, which reply I communicated to the president.

I met all the members of the cabinet as friends, personal and political, to whom was assigned the highest destiny, by harmony of feeling among themselves, of giving unity of design and vigor of action to the administration of general Jackson. In the same light I am sure, did he consider us. In the singleness of his heart and the ardour of his patriotism, he suspected not that there was amongst us, any other object, than by our cordial support, to enable him in the cabinet, as he had done in the field, "to fill the measure of his country's glory." Far otherwise were the feelings and purposes of Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien, as in the course of this exposition, will, I believe, satisfactorily and fully appear.

Mr. Berrien in a late address to the public says:

"The announcement of the names of the intended cabinet seemed to me, however, to present an insuperable bar to my acceptance of the office which was tendered to me. I thought I foresaw clearly the evils which have too obviously resulted from the selection. A gentleman 'high in the confidence of the president'—whom he consulted, 'expressed his decided conviction, founded on a long and intimate knowledge of the president's character, that he would himself speedily see, and correct the evil.' I yielded to those suggestions, and took my seat in the cabinet."

A writer in the Telegraph, of the 14th July last, believed to be Mr. Berrien, speaking in behalf of Mr. Ingham, makes the following remarks:

"Pending the organization of the cabinet, the president was informed by several persons of high standing, and those his strong party supporters, that there were objections to major Eaton, which would lead to difficulties not likely to be removed." "It was not necessary for Mr. Ingham to take any part in the affair. Every one knew that public sentiment would, in due time concentrate on what was amiss, and correct it."

In the Telegraph of the 29th July, probably by the same writer, it is asked:

"By whose advice was it, that Judge McLean was arranged to the war department, before the cabinet was announced, in order to remove the 'malign influence,' which even then threatened the dissolution of the party. It was by the personal, political and long tried friends of the president, that this advice was given; and it was by the same advice that these gentlemen retained their seats in the cabinet in the confident hope that the president would sooner or later see his error and correct it."

These extracts carry on their face evidence of a common origin. If not penned by the same hand, they must have sprung from the same councils—were all written with the same views and the same object, and disclose with sufficient clearness to whom I am indebted for the long covert, and at last, open attacks upon me and my household, as well as their purpose. Certain gentlemen who styled themselves the "personal, political and long tried friends of the president," undertook, it seems, without his knowledge or consent, to arrange and fix his cabinet. I, who had been his particular friend and associate for twenty years; who had adhered to him "through good report and through evil report," during two bitter contests for the presidency, and who, against my wishes, was selected as a member of his cabinet, was to be set aside as unworthy, in the estimation of these gentlemen, to associate with him, or to participate in his councils. This secret cabal of exclusive friends advised Mr. Berrien to accept a seat in the cabinet, under the secret expectation that I would be driven from it. By the same persons, Judge McLean was arranged to the war department, their object being expressly to get rid of me. They advised Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien, to cleave fast to their hold, which they did, even under alleged "indignity and insult" too, in the "confident hope that the president would speedily see and correct the evil." Without the president's knowledge, and without mine, this cabal of "personal, political and long tried friends," were thus endeavoring to control all the cabinet arrangements, and secretly to place around the president men of their selection and stamp. It was not for him to select his own counsellors, or decide who were his "personal, political and long tried friends"—men who had supported him only when they had lost all hope of Mr. Calhoun—who had joined his standard only when their favorite candidate had disappeared from the contest, and who had supported him as a secondary choice—your Inghams, Berriens, and others, were now arrogating to become his exclusive counsellors, and to thrust from his presence as unworthy of his trust and confidence, those who had supported him for his own sake—whose attachment was cemented by years of confidential intercourse—whose faith and energies were pledged to his support, and whose hopes were all concentrated in the success and prosperity of his administration.

Mr. Branch was made the instrument of abler heads, and attempted to become a manager in this business. In his recent letter, he mentions a call which he made on the president previous to my nomination to the senate, at which he arrogantly represented that my selection would be improper and unfortunate, and gave his reasons, which appeared to have related solely to my family. He also states he then came to advise me against accepting a place in the cabinet, admitting that the charges made against my family were false, but representing "what use the opposition would make of it," and that "the enemies of the president would not fail to make a handle of it." He says that he placed Mrs. Jackson and Mrs. Eaton on the same footing, and desired to save the president "from recollections which would be painful and distressing." Mr. Branch has a treacherous recollection. He kept no note book, or, like his co-partner, Mr. Latham, he has accommodated his notes to emergencies. I can put him right in this affair, not doubting his admission of the truth of the narration I offer, if honor be left him, although he may deny the motive which I feel persuaded influenced him at the time.

Failing in the attempt to prevent my appointment, and to dissuade or rather to deter me from accepting, Mr. Branch was next made the instrument of a piece of secret management, having in view the same result.

It was suggested to the president after the first arrangement of the cabinet was made, that Mr. McLean entertained objections against remaining in the post office department. It was known that the president was disposed to gratify him, by placing him in another department, if he could do so with a proper regard to others previously selected. This it seems, taken in connexion with my known repugnance, under any circumstances, to undertake the labors of that department, furnished a hint to those who wished my exclusion from the cabinet of which they hastened to avail themselves. Mr. Branch declared that the president might place him where he pleased; he should be satisfied; and proposed to me, that we should, if the president approved it, assent to the placing of Mr. McLean in either of the departments assigned to us, as he might choose, to which I assented. The war, navy and post office departments, were then considered open to re-assignment, according to the will of the president. The result was, Mr. McLean was arranged to the war department, Mr. Branch to the post office, and myself to the navy department. This did not meet the object. Mr. Branch made unexpected difficulties, and at the desire of those who proposed the change, the original arrangement was restored.

I suspected no other than a fair and honest motive in all this; but we are now informed, through the exposures recently made in the Telegraph, that all Mr. Branch's movements originated in the "advice" of certain "personal, political and long tried friends of the president," given with a view, as is now expressly stated, "to remove" me from the cabinet.

At length the cabinet was formed. Mr. Berrien expressly says, that he entered it, only because he expected "the president himself would speedily see and correct the evil" of my appointment; and that he clearly "foresaw the evils which have resulted from the selection." His declaration is no doubt true. No prophets foresee future events, so precisely and so certainly, as those having the means in their own control, are determined to bring them to pass. Foreseeing the evils, he must have foreseen the means through which their correction was to be brought about. He must have foreseen, that he and his associate friends intended to use his influence and consequence which office gave, to accomplish their expectations—the persecution of my family—the attempt to degrade me, and all the arts which subsequently have been employed to procure my removal.

How could so much be foreseen, if it had not been predetermined? No prophecy could have been so confidently relied on, if it had not then been resolved, by a cabal of the president's pretended "friends," with a view to concentrate public opinion, that I and my family should be proscribed from intercourse, with that portion of society over which they and their families had, or could have influence. Not a doubt is left on my mind, that before the nomination of the cabinet to the senate, the means of operating on public opinion, and forcing the president to exclude me, were devised, arranged and fixed upon, by and with the knowledge and approbation of Messrs. Latham and Berrien, if not of Mr. Branch; and the means to be employed under their boasted sense of honor—an honor which in their bosoms inspired an earnest desire to transmit to their children, "an unsullied, good name" were the abuse and slander of a mother, with two innocent daughters, whose good name was blended with hers, and in attacks upon my integrity and honor. Did they reason themselves into the belief, that the inheritance of a parent's good name, was of no value, only as it regarded their children; and that whether others lived or perished, was not material, if they and theirs were safe.

Did I merit such course of treatment from Mr. Berrien? We had served together for several years in the senate of the United States. He was invited to, and was present at my marriage, six or eight weeks before. We were in habits of daily friendly intercourse; on my part, free and unrestrained, and, as I supposed, equally so on his. He professed to be my friend, and such I thought him. Was it honorable, then, and was it just, to hide from me all the "evils" which he "foresaw," and suffer me to run blindly upon inextricable difficulties? Should he not have warned me, that not "the opposition"—not "the enemies of the president" merely, as Mr. Branch states, but his friends—"his personal, political, and long tried friends"—aye, even those whom he had selected as members of his cabinet, viewed my selection as an evil, and intended to use it to distract his councils, embarrass his administration, and provide for a successor? Had Mr. Berrien frankly informed me, that he and his associates considered my appointment "an insuperable bar" to their acceptance, an issue would at once have been tendered. I should have desired the president to excuse me, and given my reasons and then, for the sake of harmony, he would have discharged either me or them. But all was concealed from me, and only against the probable course of the opposition,—the enemies of the president, was I advised and warned. I was not taught to expect, that in Latham, Branch and Berrien, I should find these very enemies, who were smiling upon him, and me, with unequalled professions of devotion and friendship. Against their assaults, it was hence impossible to guard. Again, I ask, was it just or honorable in Mr. Berrien, entertaining the views which he has recently avowed, to conceal them from me, and thus lead me blindly forward, upon a mine which he knew was prepared for my destruction?

However he may excuse himself for his practised concealment towards me, yet was he bound in duty to the president and to the country to communicate his views frankly and fully to him. He knew the importance, nay absolute necessity, of entire harmony in the cabinet, and that the views of the president, in relation to the reformation of the government, and home interests of the country, could not be accomplished without it. Mr. Berrien knew, that the president had a right to expect unity of feeling and action amongst those whom he had selected as his counsellors; and that in justice to himself, and to the people who had elected him, he would not knowingly constitute a cabinet of discordant materials. Yet "clearly foreseeing all the evils which have resulted," he concealed his feelings and his views, and suffered a cabinet to be formed, between whose friendly association and cordial co-operation, there was an "insuperable bar," which he clearly saw; but which the president did not. By this concealment, and want of candor, he suffered his friend and benefactor to be led into error, in the very first step of his administration, and which, in common with other enemies, he is, now attempting to wield to his destruction. On whom ought the responsibility of organizing such a cabinet to rest? On the confiding friend who, judging of men by their professions, selected those as its members whom he believed to be friendly to each other, and devoted to the success of his administration; or to those deceitful individuals, who, foreseeing all the evils which have resulted, kept them concealed from the president, and entered his cabinet only because they expected such discord and division to arise that "public sentiment would concentrate" upon one of their colleagues and force his removal?

The question so gravely raised and discussed in the public newspapers about visiting—leaving a card, and invitations to "large parties" or small ones, in this city, cannot but appear matters of derision to the American people. Who calls upon his neighbor, or invites him to eat and drink with him, and who does not, is a matter of no concern to the people; and to them it must appear ridiculous, that statesmen and cabinet counsellors, have thought it necessary to disturb them with matters so trifling. But even these have been rendered of some importance, as developing the motives of men, and accounting for events of higher importance. And in this view is it, that I am about to introduce such a topic, and beg to be pardoned for doing so.

After my marriage in January 1829, my wife and myself visited Philadelphia, and were absent from Washington two weeks. Amongst those who had called in our absence to visit and pay us the customary congratulations, were Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun—their cards had been left. In cities, leaving at a neighbor's house, a card—a small piece of pasteboard with the name upon it, is called a visit. Not long afterwards, we called at Mr. Calhoun's lodging to return the civility. After sending in our names, we were invited up to the vice president's parlor, where Mrs. Calhoun was alone, and received us with much politeness. We spent a short time, quite agreeably, and took our leave. Afterwards, these calls were not repeated on either side. This was a short time before it was understood who would compose the cabinet of general Jackson.

Another trifling incident is worthy of note. When it was ascertained certainly that I would be secretary of war, Mr. Calhoun requested the appointment of one of his friends as my chief clerk. To another gentleman who made the same request, I made a promise to comply with Mr. Calhoun's wishes. Considerations not thought of at the time, induced me to change my determination; in consequence of which, I declined to make the appointment, and sent an explanation to the gentleman, to whom I had given the promise. None was offered to Mr. Calhoun, for none was asked, and to him no promise had been made. From that time he broke off all intercourse with me, official as well as private.

Soon after the cabinet was organized, indications of those secret views, which Mr. Berrien now openly avows, began to manifest themselves. The motive was not apparent, yet was it sufficiently evident, that there was a settled design to put a ban on my family, and render my position at Washington disagreeable to me. This was to be promoted by all the influence and importance which high station conferred on some of my colleagues. Confederacies were formed, and efforts made to awaken prejudicial. To give countenance to the confederates, and to aid their efforts, old slanders were revived, and new ones circulated. Families coming to the city, were beset on the way, and on their arrival. No means which ingenuity could invent, or malice make use of, were left untried to give tone to public sentiment—"to make it concentrate" and force the president to separate me from his councils. Hope gave the assurance that in a little while he would see public opinion concentrated and would "speedily correct the evil."

Let me not be misunderstood. I never complained of any one, for not associating with me or my family. It is the right of every man, and of every woman, to visit whom they please. To see my house filled with unwilling or reluctant visitors, constrained to call by the command of power, could never be desired by me. Happily, I was never dependent on such authority for friends, associates and visitors. Always, when my doors were open, at "large parties," and at social calls, I met friends, with cordial hearts and happy faces, who evinced by their frank and open demeanor, that they came of their own volition, and not through hope of reward, or fear of punishment. It is true I did not meet some of my colleagues, or their families, nor some of their associates of the same political stamp: but I met ladies and gentlemen quite as respectable, and equally as agreeable. If, as is true, I and my family were not invited to the houses of Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien, so neither were they invited to mine, and in this we were equal; and neither, as I conceive, had a right to complain.

Mr. Berrien's family never did refuse to visit with mine, for they never had the opportunity. Custom required, when they came to the city, being lest in their arrival, that we should first call on them, if we desired their acquaintance; but we never did call.

How ridiculous does this single fact render Mr. Berrien's publication, which he has set forth with such grave formality. He had ascertained the sense of society here, he says, and conformed to it in this matter, when in fact he never had an opportunity to conform to, or depart from it. He maintains that the president threatened to dismiss him, because he would not compel his family to visit where he did not choose they should, when in fact they never had an opportunity to visit there. Throughout, he presents me and my family as craving the society of his, which he haughtily refused, when, in fact the first, the natural and the usual advance, on our part, had never been made.

It will be seen, then, that had the president set out to regulate the intercourse of society, and to direct its social relations, he ought to have begun with me, not Mr. Berrien. He must have threatened to dismiss me, if I did not compel my family first to call on his and leave a card. What! force Mr. Berrien, under such circumstances, to force his family upon us! The president certainly ought first to have forced us to give them an opportunity to decline our acquaintance. To force together unwilling people, and particularly to begin with the wrong persons, would indeed appear an odd and strange procedure.

In the autumn of 1829, new attacks began to be made, in whispers, on my integrity. It was said I had conspired with my wife's first husband, Mr. Timberlake, to defraud the government of large sums of money. Other attempts to get rid of me, having failed, I was now to be presented as being in default to the government, through fraud practised on it. Mr. Timberlake had been a purser in the navy, and this charge was based upon a reported deficiency in his accounts with the public; and on a private letter of mine, detained in the 4th auditor's office, showing that on my suggestion, he had remitted money to me. Copies of my private confidential letters to him, had been taken from the office, that I might not escape through apprehended indulgence and favor, on the part of Mr. Kendall. Matters were considered well arranged, and the proof complete to show, that this delinquency was wholly occasioned by remittances of money to me, and which was yet in my possession. Such were the whispers circulated through the society of this place. But a close investigation, which occupied some time, showed that Mr. Timberlake's account had been deprived, through a series of shocking frauds, of credits to the amount of from 12 to $20,000, and that justly he was largely a creditor, not a debtor, to the government. But with mutilated books—abstracts of accounts missing, and the inventory gone from the department, his family can only appeal, under all the circumstances, to the justice and honor of the country, for redress. While slander held its open day, and midnight round of whisper on this subject, I received from some malignant being, who subscribed himself Iago, the following note:

"Sir—I have written a letter to Mr. Kendall about the money that paid for O'Neal's houses. You know what I mean. Revenge is sweet, and I have you in my power, and I will roast you, and boil you, and bake you; and I hope you may long live to prolong my pleasure. Lay not the flattering unction to your soul, that you can escape me. I would not that death, or any evil thing, should take you from my grasp for half the world."

Who the writer of this fiendish note is, I have never ascertained. I cannot turn my thoughts on an enemy so implacable, that he would be unwilling the man he hated should find repose in death. Yet it is in character with the acts of those whose forecast pointed to the means, by which the evil of my selection, as a member of the cabinet, was to be made apparent, and the president forced "speedily to see and correct the evil." If I could have been driven from all respectable society, or had fixed upon me collusion and fraud, in obtaining the funds of the government, then would the cabinet have been relieved of my presence, and the prophecy of Mr. Berrien completely fulfilled.

Congress had now commenced its first session after the inauguration of the president. The recommendations in his message had been received with uncommon applause. But it was soon perceived, that little, in furtherance of his views, was to be expected from some of the political gentlemen who were professing regard to the administration. Movements amongst some of my colleagues, with others in the same political interest, indicated a disposition again to wage against me, a war of exclusion. Rumors of a combination to force me from the cabinet, attracted the president's attention. He suspected that a portion of his cabinet had entered it, in disguise, and had fomented some of the mischief he had encountered; and accordingly determined, if it should appear that they were guilty of such duplicity, and had combined to harass and drive out one of their colleagues, they should share the fate they were preparing for another. While reflecting on the course proper to be adopted, col. Richard M. Johnson called on a visit; and to him he disclosed his difficulties and intentions. Colonel Johnson entertained a better opinion of these gentlemen than to believe they harbored hostile views towards me, or had entered into a combination to expel me from the cabinet. Accordingly he solicited the consent of the president to converse with them as a friend, that by ascertaining the suspicions entertained to be incorrect, he might relieve them from the imputation. He had no other authority or permission than this: the mission was of his own seeking; he was actuated solely by a desire to maintain harmony; and if he could, to be of service to these gentlemen. Whether he spoke upon politics—religion—philosophy—ladies' cards, invitations to large parties or small—social or political intercourse—all, all was upon his own responsibility and upon his own authority. Through him the president made no proposition, no requisition, and no threat. For myself I knew nothing of it.

It is a little remarkable, that neither of the three gentlemen, in their published statements, speak of any proposition as coming directly from the president, which was considered at all insulting or improper. Though they insist, that col. Johnson was authorized to threaten, and did threaten them; yet not one pretends, that directly the president insinuated any thing of the kind to either. "It is strange, passing strange," that col. Johnson, a man of known integrity and honor, should deny this—strange, that when they met the president, he breathed to them nothing like it—and yet stranger still, that in defiance of these proofs, and these circumstances, they still insist, that they were insulted! Who now will wonder that the cabinet was changed, or who maintain that it ought to have been longer continued? No sooner had Mr. Branch stated, that col. Johnson had threatened their dismissal, than it was promptly denied by the president, who said he would forthwith send for col. Johnson; and for that purpose called a servant. Why did the messenger not go? Mr. Branch explains! "It is unnecessary to send for col. Johnson; for your word is sufficient." And why is that word now sufficient? Then, Mr. Branch received it as true—told it, no doubt, to his colleagues—and yet do they come before the public boldly to assert as true, what then was given up as a mistake—an entire misconception on their part. Content with the explanation offered at the time, convinced of the incorrectness of their impressions these gentlemen now assert their displeasure and discontent, and at the end of fifteen months, come out and maintain that to be true, which before had been given up as a false and incorrect impression. As for myself, I can say, and do truly say, that I never uttered, or brought to the consideration of the president, any complaint in reference to myself. I was always content to keep the redress of my own wrongs and injuries in my own hands, and to ask the aid and assistance of no one, in or out of power. No intimation was ever had by me that col. Johnson intended to make such inquiry, nor did I know that he had made it. The lofty sense of honor entertained by general Jackson would never permit him to compromise the honor of his friends. He has not compromised mine; and yet he would have done it, had he used his authority to extort courtesy in my behalf from Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien. But why reason about it? If the disavowal of the president, established even by his accusers, who so lately were his professing friends—if to confront Mr. Branch with colonel Johnson, and which alone was prevented by a declaration that he (Mr. Branch) was entirely satisfied—if the assertion of colonel Johnson, that he had no authority to communicate any such thing—did not communicate it, and so informed the parties at the time—if all this be not sufficient to prove the falsity of the statements which these gentlemen, in their malignity, have so recklessly hazarded before the public, then would it not be believed, "though one arose from the dead."

By their conduct at the time, my colleagues manifested that nothing had been required of them, which, as is now asserted, they considered dishonorable. If they had believed so—if, after conversing with the president, they thought he had exacted of them that to which, as honorable men, they could not conform, they should have immediately tendered their resignations. To suppose they could do otherwise, is to presume that for the sake of office they were willing tamely to submit to the "indignity and outrage" of which they now complain. Though the concealments by which they imposed themselves on the president, their conduct towards me, and especially Mr. Ingham's note book, in which, being a confidential adviser and in one sense a part of his family, he noted down, if he is to be believed, the free, the private and familiar conversations of the president for future use, presents spectacles of human degradation at which honorable minds would revolt; yet, I cannot suppose that they would remain in the cabinet, under a consciousness that hourly they might be exposed to the same indignity, involving their personal honor, and the honor of their families. It is utterly impossible that gentlemen now apparently so sensitive, could have submitted themselves to such a state of things, without complaint, for fifteen months. By their remaining in the cabinet so long after the "indignity and outrage" of which they now complain, I must conclude that the president had not insulted them by any dishonorable and improper requisition, or else that they loved their offices better than their honor, and that their present violence is caused only by the loss of them.

But in relation to Mr. Branch, I have something even better than Mr. Ingham's note book, to prove what actually were his feelings towards the president at and about the very time when this pretended indignity of col. Johnson was offered. It is a letter* addressed by Mr. Branch to the president, in his own hand writing, on the 29th January, 1830, and which on the same day was inclosed to me, in the hope that a reconciliation might take place between us. Agreeably to Mr. Ingham's note book, it was "on Wednesday the 27th day of January, 1830," that this alleged "indignity and outrage" was offered. Of course this letter was written but two days after, and on the identical day when Mr. Branch, feeling himself deeply afflicted at the communication made to him by colonel Johnson, called, as he states, to see the president; and when, as he says, "the president's feelings were too much enlisted to weigh any reasons which might be offered." And were Mr. Branch's feelings too much enlisted "to weigh any reasons?" Was he, as we are told was the case with all three of the gentlemen, indignant at the outrage? Let the letter speak for itself, and show how deeply, and how like an insulted and wounded man he could write at this instant of excitement, when honor and feeling, through the instrumentality of col. Johnson, had been rudely trodden under foot.

"Navy department, January 29, 1830.

"Dear sir—I have received your note of yesterday's date, and do most cheerfully accept your friendly mediation; more, however, from a desire to give you an additional evidence of the friendly feelings which have actuated my bosom towards yourself, than from a consciousness of having given to major Eaton just cause for the withdrawal of his friendship. As a further manifestation of the frankness which I trust will ever characterise my conduct, I agree to meet him this day at two o'clock, in the presence of major Barry, at Mr. Van Buren's, and in his presence also.

"Yours, truly, JOHN BRANCH.

"To the president of the United States."

This letter written directly after the indignity complained of was offered, bears no impress of insulted feeling; on the contrary, it breathes a spirit of kindness and friendship towards the president, whom he recognizes as a "mediator," seeking with almost parental solicitude, to heal the division amongst the members of the cabinet, and anxious for the restoration of harmony. Surely in writing that letter, which he by signing himself, "yours truly," he could not have supposed, that the president had just offered him an indignity; or if so, it only proves how great a hypocrite he is. At that time, we did not speak. As much parade as he makes of his friendly feelings entertained towards me, he was the very reverse of all that the name of friend conveys; and knowing it as I did, I would not permit him to seem to be what he was not. I had refused to return his salutations, and declined all intercourse, except when we met at the president's. I never complained of Mr. Branch, as he asserts in his letter to the public. It was he who complained, if at all complaint were made. His letter to the president, thanks him for his offer to act as a mediator in our difference, speaks of his good feeling towards me, and willingness to meet me at two o'clock that day. I have no doubt it was his professions of friendship and kindness towards me, made to the president, which induced him to become Mr. Branch's mediator in this business. On receiving the letter, he inclosed it to me, and expressed a wish that good feelings could be restored between us. An interview took place, at the room of the attorney general, at which major Barry and Mr. Berrien were present.

It was here that Mr. Branch, in the presence of these gentlemen, expressed friendship for me, and in the strongest terms declared, that he did not entertain an unkind feeling towards me, and wished he had a glass in his bosom through which his every thought could be read. He spoke of the non-intercourse between our families, and said that he had not the slightest objection to a free association; but that he could not control his. I promptly answered, that I did not desire his or any other family to visit mine, except with their own free consent; and that it was my desire our families should, in that respect, pursue such course as they thought fit and proper. We shook hands and parted as friends. Mr. Berrien affected much satisfaction at this reconciliation, and pretended to hail it as the harbinger of future harmony and good will. I say pretended, because, under all the circumstances of recent disclosure, he felt not what he said he did. It was only adding another and another fold, to that cloak of hypocrisy in which he had wrapped himself, from the first formation of the cabinet.

Such were the incidents of Friday the 29th of Jan. 1830, the moment when, as their communications to the public disclose, they were writhing under a sense of deep and lasting "indignity and outrage," at the threats of col. Johnson, borne to them from the president. Where then was the lofty dignity of Mr. Berrien and Mr. Branch, that the one could declare how pleased he was at the reconciliation made, and the other protest the good feelings which he entertained for me?

Let us see how the facts stand, if these men speak truth. On Wednesday, the 27th of January, 1830, the president, through col. Johnson, threatened to dismiss them, if they did not compel their families to associate with mine, which they considered such an "indignity and outrage," that they seriously thought of resigning. On Thursday, the 28th, the "indignity and outrage" being unatoned and even unexplained, the president wrote a note to Mr. Branch, offering his "friendly mediation," to bring about—what? Not social intercourse between our families—but a restoration of friendly intercourse between ourselves. In the morning of Friday, the 29th, (for he says he will meet me at two o'clock), he accepted the friendly offer, thus acknowledging that he considered the president an impartial umpire, an unprejudiced, unexcited and just man, in whose hands he could trust his character and his honor; and yet strange to tell, on the same day, having called on the president for some explanation about col. Johnson's insulting message, he found "the president's feelings were too much enlisted to weigh any reasons which might be offered!" Who can believe all this? "Most cheerfully," says he, I "accept your friendly mediation." What! Accept the mediation of a man, who two days before, had required him to humble himself to me like the meanest slave, and had not atoned for it? Accept the mediation of a man whose feelings were so much enlisted in my favor, that he would not listen to reason? Impossible! Had Mr. Branch felt that an indignity had been offered him, he would have replied to the president: "Sir your insulting message through col. Johnson, must be first explained, before I can avail myself of 'your friendly mediation.'" By his whole conduct, he showed that he entertained no such feeling, and that the whole story about "indignity and outrage," is a sheer invention, got up now to injure the president.

*I accidentally found this letter, a few days since, amongst some old papers, not intentionally preserved, for until now I never conceived it to be of any consequence.

This letter of Mr. Branch shows, that in addition to col. Johnson's friendly mediation, the president was willing to exert his own as a friend, to heal the breach, in anticipation of the meeting to which he invited the secretaries, on Friday the 29th, to declare the basis on which he had resolved to fix the harmony of his cabinet. Mr. Branch and myself, the principal difficulty having arisen between us, met, as has been stated, at Mr. Berrien's, and adjusted our relations amicably; and yet this reconciliation, produced, as is seen from Mr. Branch's note, by the kind and friendly interposition of the president, is represented to have been immediately preceded by "indignity and outrage," and to have been succeeded by a state of feeling too much excited "to weigh any reasons which might be offered."!!!! How thoroughly is all this contradicted by Mr. Branch's contemporaneous note.

Private difficulties were now at an end, and, as was well understood, families were to visit or not, according to their inclinations. In two days the "indignity and outrage" which had been offered to these gentlemen was forgotten, so much so that for fifteen months matters glided on in tolerable harmony. Nothing more was said or heard of this subject, until the president, as he had an unquestioned right to do, thought proper to request their resignations. Then were old notes and memoranda burnished up, and that over which they had slept so long, immediately became a subject of deep and "awakening interest to the American people." The truth is, this farce, which is now brought out on the public stage, was designed for a different occasion. It was in January or February, 1830, that they expected to exhibit before the public, and to unfold the tale of threats from the president, dismissal, and family association, and all that. Not being dismissed, then, as they expected, they laid aside their prepared tale; but having at length lost their offices, they bring it forth upon an occasion which it does not fit, and vainly attempt to attribute the dissolution of the cabinet to a false ground. That event they knew sprung from an entirely different cause—a cause which will satisfy every impartial man when he comes to understand it. To account for their removal, they offer any but the true reason, and hence run into all sorts of absurdity.

Shortly after this, about the 20th of March, a preparatory meeting of a few members of congress was held, with a view to request the president to remove me from the cabinet. Being apprised of their design, he made a remark which satisfied the leaders in this movement, that to persist in their course would serve to expose them to public reprobation, and result in fruitless endeavor. Accordingly, the project was abandoned, or at least suspended.

I do not impute to all who participated in this preliminary step, a design to unite ultimately in a measure of such high dictation to the president. Some were at first misled by false representations, and induced to believe that his peace and comfort, as well as the success of his administration, depended upon it; others attended the meeting to point out the impropriety of the course, and to dissuade their friends from persisting in their design.

Now, what was the motive for all this relentless persecution? Could it be that my wife was indeed the cause? Was it merely to exclude a female from their "good society"? Was one woman so dangerous to public morals, and so formidable in influence and power, as to require all this strong array of cabinet counselors—combination of members of congress—confederacy of fashionable ladies? Was it for that, attacks were made upon the integrity of her husband; and honor, truth and candor sacrificed? The idea is truly ridiculous! She was lone and powerless. Those who liked her society, sought it; and those who did not, kept away. Neither she nor her husband, entered into cabals and intrigues, to the prejudice and injury of others. Their own multiplied wrongs, they bore with as much patience as could be expected, from mortals endowed with human passions and sensibilities. A common understanding prevailed, express in relation to one family, and which was also understood in relation to others, that each should seek their own associates, according to their own will, uninfluenced and unrestrained. The motive, therefore, was not to exclude us from society. It is a matter altogether too small to account for the acts and the untiring zeal of so many great men.

Was the motive merely to exclude me from the cabinet? Was my presence there, dangerous to the interest of the country, or to its institutions? Had I the power or disposition to injure the one, or overthrow the other? Was it pretended that I wanted the ability, intelligence or integrity, necessary to the management of the department of war? Of its management, there has been no complaint, while it was in my hands! I left it at least as prosperous as I found it! Was it suspected that I was not true to the president, and would prove false and faithless to his administration? A confidential intercourse of more than fifteen years, the highest admiration of his character, and the deep personal interest felt in the success of his administration, were surely sufficient to guard me against that. Nothing of this sort entered into the minds of my traducers. They had no desire for my exclusion on account of any suspicions entertained, that I would willingly do injury to the interests of the country, its institutions, or to the president! To what then shall we look for this motive? An ardent friend to the vice president, in 1829, in one short sentence disclosed it:

"Major Eaton is not the friend of Mr. Calhoun,"

It was this which rendered me unfit for the cabinet, and for the respectable society of Messrs. Ingham, Branch, and Berrien. I could not, perhaps, be used to promote the views of Mr. Calhoun, and might exert an influence to induce general Jackson to stand a second election. It was not thought that in my hands the influence and patronage of the war department, could be used in favor of a successor. In that they did me justice. It was not so used, nor ever would have been. It was a subject about which I spoke not, and felt not. Not even was I solicitous for general Jackson again to be selected, except on the ground that his principles and the course of his administration, when fairly tested, should be found in accord with the general sense of the people and the country. At a proper time they would determine this matter, and there I was willing to rest it, undisturbed by any private or official interference of mine.

But "Major Eaton was not the friend of Mr. Calhoun," and this was a sufficient reason, why he should not be permitted to enter the cabinet, if to be prevented; or for forcing him out when there. The ineffectual attempts to exclude me, have already been alluded to. It has been shown that Berrien and Ingham, concealing deep in their own bosoms their feelings, entered the cabinet, under a full conviction that I presently would be excluded—that Mr. Calhoun's family and mine, before my appointment, interchanged civilities, and that he sought of me the appointment of a friend as chief clerk—and that thereafter all private and official intercourse between us, ceased. Let it be borne in mind, that the principals—those who have been actively employed against me, are the friends of Mr. Calhoun—his devoted, active partizans. It is readily to be inferred, then, that this "high wrought tempest," has proceeded from political designs, connected with the future hopes and expectations of Mr. Calhoun; and this inference I have it in my power to confirm, by the most unquestionable facts.

Duff Green, editor of the United States Telegraph, has been from the first the instrument of Mr. Calhoun, by whose movements he has sought to bring his plans into operation. To him the feelings and plans of his party have been known. He has been their chief manager; first their private, and now their public organ. Him they chose to carry on their private correspondence—him they selected to make their debut against me, they standing behind the scene with their notes, memoranda, and concerted statements, to back and sustain him. As he is their witness and their friend, their agent and associate, they will not impeach the testimony borne by his acts. His word would not be introduced by me as evidence against any whom he was desirous to injure. Before I knew him, I rendered substantial services to this man; but his ingratitude is a warning to the friends who now confide in him, of what they may expect if interest or policy shall hereafter make it necessary. Before he left Missouri, he was poor and penniless, too much so, as he informed me and others, to be able to remove his wife and children to this place, where he had then lately established a press. Upon his application to me, and stating his necessities, I borrowed for him fourteen hundred dollars; part of which he repaid in about fifteen months, and the balance only recently, when he found the sense of the community shocked by the baseness of employing the means furnished by my unreturned advances to destroy my reputation.

In difficulty here, and pressed for money, he again in 1826 applied to me, when through a friend of mine in Baltimore, I obtained for him $2,500. For the very press from which, probably, he daily circulates his abuse of me, I have a note which was protested and paid by me, on which I was not an endorser, and which has been in my possession several years, the whole, or a part of which still remains unpaid. To my exertions and zeal in his behalf, as most of the senate of the United States can testify, is he indebted for his first success as public printer, the annual receipts of which appointment at this time are not less than from thirty to fifty thousand dollars. These things might have been omitted, for charity and friendship are secret in their operation, and should not be proclaimed to the world; but surely I may be permitted to mention them, not in the spirit of an ostentatious liberality, but that the public may be able to appreciate the characters of my persecutors.

In 1829-'30, Mr. Green was a frequent visitor at my house to "large parties," and to small, with his wife and daughters, and invited my wife and myself to his. He, on several occasions, tendered his services and his paper in vindication of us, against the slanders and abuse which at that time were whispered about; and as it regards one of his compurgators, on whom now he would rely as a good and sufficient witness, but in whom then, he had no confidence, he placed in my hand a statement of his own brother, tending to impeach him. What now, has brought them so closely together, I know not. I only know that he hates me beyond even the power to extend common justice; and wherefore is it so? Because bad men are apt to dislike those from whom they have received favors. But that he should descend so far as to become the traducer of a female, because she is the wife of one to whom he is under obligations, never to be repaid, is indeed strange! Mark his present course! His obligations of friendship certainly are not cancelled; at least to the extent that gratitude should be concerned. Without provocation on my part, and without change in the character and deportment of myself and family, he is daily dragging before the world those, into whose society he introduced his wife and daughters, and whom voluntarily he proffered to defend! He does not pretend that now, he knows more, than when, with and without his family, he called—talked—smiled, and treated us as friends, wronged and persecuted. Was he sincere then, or now? If then sincere, how unutterable must be his depravity, in becoming the very leader of the band of traducers, who at present occupy the public attention! He then performed the duty of a friend, and acted up to the principles of an honest man; but yielding to the political intrigues of his great leader, he has sacrificed justice and decency, his own reputation, and the feelings of his family, to subserve the cause of that friend, who never was his friend. This man is a fit associate of Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien. He has united with them on a nefarious purpose, in the accomplishment of which, all that is "holy in charity," exalted in honor, and sacred in truth, have been rudely outraged and trodden under foot. What object has he to attain? What purpose to answer? Surely, he cannot think that in the choice of a chief magistrate of this country, the American people are so debased, that female character and feeling, are to be made the test of elections.

This man, to different persons and in various directions, early disclose the designs which actuated him, and others who were associated with him in feeling and interest in their conduct towards me. I have a statement from S. P. Webster of this city, detailing the substance of Mr. Green's remarks to him in the fall of 1829; at the very time when he was professing before me high consideration and great respect and regard.

Mr. Webster, in presenting the remarks made to him in November, 1829, says—repeating Mr. Green's language:

"That major Eaton, remaining in the cabinet, was of great injury to the party—that he was used by the secretary of state to forward his interested views; and if he remained in the cabinet, the secretary of state, who held complete influence over him, would be able to manage the president as he pleased, and direct the acts of the government to promote his, (Van Buren's), future prospects. That major Eaton ought to be sent minister to Russia, or at any rate, should not remain in the cabinet; and that if some decisive step were not taken soon, he did not know what might be the consequence. And further, that the president ought not to be run a second time. That Mr. Van Buren was using all his influence to prevail on him to run again, and in that event, would have obtained such an influence over him and his friends, as to be able to command their influence at a subsequent election—that gen. Jackson ought to go home."

I have a statement of another and similar conversation, held by Mr. Green, in December 1829, with Gideon Welles, editor of the Hartford Times—He says:

"On the subject of the next presidential election, Mr. Green adverted to the embarrassed situation of Mr. Calhoun at the expiration of his present term, when he would have served eight years, equal to that of any of his predecessors; and that Mr. Van Buren, taking advantage of his situation wished to ruin him by driving him into retirement. It was the policy of Mr. Van Buren, he said, to persuade gen. Jackson to consent to a re-election, because that would lead to the postponement of Mr. Calhoun's claims, and occasion him in a great degree to be forgotten. It would put Mr. Van Buren in advance of him, and this was the reason he was desirous that gen. Jackson should consent to a re-election."

Again he remarks to Mr. Welles, on this subject, about which it seems, he felt such deep interest and concern:

"That Mr. Calhoun had no influence with the president, and could have none, while major Eaton was there; nor could any of his friends receive appointments, so long as he was in the cabinet. He endeavored to excite my jealousy by representing, that Mr. Van Buren, through Eaton, was endeavoring to confer all appointments on the old Crawford party. It was indispensable, therefore, for the prosperity of the administration, and the harmony of its members, that major Eaton should leave the cabinet, and leave Washington. There was one way in which he could retire honorably and ~~without~~. If he would accept the mission to Russia, he would be making an honorable exchange for the war department; and all were willing that Mr. Branch should be dismissed, which would furnish Eaton a triumph."—[For the statements at large, see appendix A. and B.]

Thus through this chosen organ of Mr. Calhoun, we are possessed of the true motive which actuated my kind assailants. Their plan was that general Jackson should be president but for four years, and that Mr. Calhoun should succeed him. The Telegraph was considered by its editor so omnipotent, that its dictation was not to be, and could not be, resisted; and that it rested exclusively and alone with him to declare who should, and who should not "rule over us." Effect is often mistaken for cause, and in this case it seemed quite to be overlooked, that the former consequence of this journal, arose from the circumstance, that heretofore it went with the people—not the people with it. The moment, however, that Mr. Van Buren was appointed secretary of state, jealousy and fear arose, and then the desire was to place around the president as many of Mr. Calhoun's friends as possible, to counteract the apprehended and dreaded influence; a part of which I most gratuitously was supposed to be. Devoted, as I was said to be, to gen. Jackson, and the success of his administration, my appointment was calculated rather to thwart than to promote their ulterior designs. It was deemed necessary to prevent it; but if that could not be effected, then adequate means were to be resorted to, to get me out of the way. All this Mr. Ingham and Mr. Berrien foresaw. Two of my colleagues, if not the third, were in the secret, and used the influence and importance which office gave them and their families, to promote and further their grand design.

Months had rolled away, and as yet the president had never seen and corrected the evil as was expected. Mr. Van Buren, it was feared, had gained, and was gaining so fast upon my esteem, that serious apprehensions were entertained that I would fall within the vortex of his influence. In addition, it was imagined, or rather feared, that general Jackson might consent to a re-election, and reasons were discerned why Van Buren would desire it as a matter of interest to him, and how, through my influence, the matter might succeed, and the claims of Mr. Calhoun be deferred, his prospects injured, and he driven into retirement. Fear and apprehension, and an impatience of longer delay arose. "Some decisive step," says Mr. Green, "must be taken, or else I do not know what will be the consequence." This "malign influence," which was operated upon by the crafty subtlety of Mr. Van Buren, must be removed, ed, or the effect will be to postpone Mr. Calhoun's claims, and drive him into retirement. It must be removed from the president, and to accomplish it, I was to retire, not only from the cabinet, but from Washington, that I might be as far distant as possible from the scene of their fruitless operations. The secretary of war was not qualified for the duties of the war department, yet he might be sent to represent his country at one of the most important courts of Europe. He and his family were not fit and good society for the families of such pure honorables as Ingham, Branch and Berrien, and yet they were to be considered quite "good society" enough for one of the first and most powerful monarchs of Europe.

But more! They were even willing to afford me a triumph. For the sake of getting me away from the president, they were ready and disposed, that Mr. Branch, one of the friends of whom they had made a dupe and instrument, might be dismissed. Amidst all this trade of abuse and insult, previously offered, merely to get rid of my supposed influence, they were yet willing to bestow on me office and emolument, to mount me on a triumphal car, and tie their friend, Mr. Branch, to its wheels. Now, can any man in his senses fail to wonder, that I should decline all these liberal offers, and finally retire from the cabinet for no better reason than is asserted by these gentlemen, that the families of Ingham, Branch and Berrien would not visit me and my family? Truly, they make me out a greater patriot than I am willing to be considered, while they afford to Mr. Branch no great cause for thanks given to them. Their proffer shows how little he knew of those persons, who, for all his zeal, and ardor, and malignity to serve them and their cause, were yet willing to sacrifice him to their ambition, and to their thirst for office. As a part of the consideration in getting rid of me, they were willing to dispose of him in any way, and at any sacrifice. Thus you perceive, my countrymen, the real objection to me, as a member of the cabinet, and why it was that Messrs. Ingham and Berrien entered it with concealed purposes, and with hypocritical professions. You can perceive the reasons why I and my family have been so relentlessly pursued by the friends of Mr. Calhoun; and you perceive the origin of the progressive and concerted attacks, first upon me, next upon Mr. Van Buren, and lastly, upon the president, that the one might be sent to Russia, the other to Albany, and the third to the solitude of the Hermitage. All has originated in the restless spirit of Mr. Calhoun and his partisans, and in a determination that general Jackson should be president but for four years, and that Mr. Calhoun must and should be his successor.

In the winter and spring of 1829-30, Mr. Green's paper gave confirmation of the feelings and plans developed in his conversations with Messrs. Webster and Welles. In December, the New York Enquirer intimated that the re-election of gen. Jackson was desirable, and ventured to suggest, that Mr. Van Buren might be a candidate, provided he declined. Mr. Green sharply rebuked the editor for meddling with the subject, and especially for introducing the name of the proposed successor. In March, 1830, Mr. Webb again introduced the subject, though in a different shape. He says: "We repeat, that general Jackson, and he only, will be the candidate of the republican party for the next presidency." In reply, the Telegraph again took exception; and although not so frank and full, as in the previous conversations had with Mr. Webster and Mr. Welles, yet the article dimly discloses the same designs. General Jackson must not again be a candidate, lest "his acts should be subjected to the imputation of selfish ends, and electioneering purposes." He might not think it his duty "to sacrifice his private comforts;" or, in the more, distinct language held to Mr. Webster, "he ought to go home" to the Hermitage. There is in this article, nothing of Mr. Van Buren's designs and intrigues, or Mr. Calhoun's claims. These could be better managed, and to happier effect, through private arrangements, which were then in progress, though not completed. It was not yet time to appeal to the public for the correction of "evils," which the president could not be made to see; but that time was considered to be near at hand, and was evidently foreboded by the tone of the Telegraph.

Most of the president's nominations had been before the senate during the whole winter, and the public were at a loss to know why they were not disposed of. The friends of Mr. Calhoun were constantly pouring into the ears of those who were depending on the senate for confirmation, exaggerated accounts of his strength in that body; and the political preferences of those in nomination, were secretly and artfully sought after. They pretended to have polled both houses of congress, and to have ascertained that a majority in each, were his friends. Mr. Hill was rejected from the office of second comptroller of the treasury, and Mr. Green paid him a visit of condolence, during which he sought to persuade him, that he had been sacrificed to "the Eaton and Van Buren influence." Others were privately warned, that they were in danger from the same quarter. It certainly would have been a masterly stroke of policy, if Mr. Hill could have been sent to New-Hampshire, Mr. Kendall to Kentucky, Mr. Noah to New-York, and other former editors back to their homes, to resume their professional duties, impressed with the belief, that they had been made the victims, not of an Ingham, Berven and Branch, but of "the Eaton and Van Buren influence." It was a good idea, if it could have succeeded; but being rather far-fetched, it failed. Thus it is apparent, that it was not the secretary of war alone, that they desired to get rid of, but the secretary of state also. One of the members of congress, who attended the preparatory meeting about the 20th of March, for the purpose of regulating the president's cabinet, being enquired of, if any removal would satisfy them, answered emphatically: "No, we will be satisfied with nothing short of the removal of Van Buren."

But the removal of these two unrepresented secretaries at this meeting, was not the only subject probably discussed before it, and which failed of success. The premier, general Jackson himself, a more important personage than all, he too was to be disposed of; and the better to effect it, conversations were to be held with strangers visiting the city; and private letters were to be written, to prepare the minds of leading politicians at a distance, to support the decisive movement. It was not proper, nor the proper time, openly to take ground in the newspapers;—sapping and mining were preferable. An anti-Van Buren party was to be gotten up, and under that banner, without seeming to be in opposition to the president, it was thought the disaffected and dissatisfied of all parties could rally, until the scheme being fully matured, the mine was to be exploded, when Mr. Calhoun and the Telegraph were "to rule on the whirlwind and direct the storm." On the 19th of March, but a day before this preparatory meeting of members to reorganize the cabinet, at least in part, Mr. Green wrote a letter to Andrew Dunlap, United States district attorney, at Boston. In that letter he says:

"The political horizon is from day to day, more clearly indicating the point where storm clouds. The article from the Massachusetts Journal and the last letter to the United States Gazette, leave no doubt that Webster has resolved to push forward boldly, and on Clay alone. If Clay succeeds, Webster's fortune is made. If Clay fails, the lieutenant becomes the commander of the defeated force. He comes into the market at the head of an organized and powerful party, and associated as he intends to be, with New York [Mr. Van Buren] he will have a powerful influence at his command.

"Mr. — who was so much with Webb, gave me, as a piece of advice intended for my own benefit and guidance, the information that Mr. Webb had, while here, been advised not to attack Mr. Webster. Will it not be well to keep an eye on the Courier, and also on —? Clay and Webster rely on the bank of the United States and the federal party. — is their organ in —. Let them succeed, or let them make any compromise, and the democracy of New England, and particularly of Massachusetts, are the victims which must be offered up to Webster's vengeance. Is this not obvious? Unless the divisions and disunion of our party can be healed, defeat is certain. BOLD AND DECISIVE MEANS ENSURE US TRIUMPH. There are some now in power, who seem to themselves to think lightly of the New England democracy. My own opinion is, that that democracy may yet hold the fate of the union in their hands."

Thus were the democracy of New England addressed. They were warned against the New York Enquirer, and notified of an ultimate collision, first with Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster, and if that failed, then with Mr. Van Buren. Webster would "come into the market" in great force, and sell out to Mr. Clay, if he could purchase, or to Mr. Van Buren if he could not. The jealousy of the New England democracy was thus to be aroused; and they excited to action by being told "they were to be offered up as the victims of vengeance;" and that "bold and decisive means would ensure us triumph." This was it hoped for and expected, that the democracy of New England would be aroused, and prepared to support "the bold and decisive means," then in contemplation, to expel "the Eaton and Van Buren influence" from the councils of the president,—prevent him from consenting to a re-election, and have every thing arranged, and prepared to destroy him if he did consent.

In a few days after, a letter was sent to Mr. M. M. Noah, of New-York. See M. M. Noah's letter.

"I have no doubt that the last article in the Courier, as well as that of the 12th, was prepared here, and are part of the intrigue intended to separate the president from his earliest and best friends.

"As to Mr. Calhoun, the object of the Courier is to drive me to the alternative of abandoning him or general Jackson. The sacrifice is too shallow for success. It will recoil upon its author. Those who desire to monopolize general Jackson's popularity for the use of Mr. Van Buren, are interested in circulating such a report, which Mr. Webb took with him from here; but the intelligent friends of the president, who associated with the vice-president, know it to be false."

The report here alluded to, and declared to be false, was that Mr. Calhoun intended to oppose the re-election of general Jackson. How false it was, the reader, under all the circumstances presented, is prepared to decide. But it was not wise policy, then, to permit such an impression to go abroad. At that time general Jackson was not a candidate for re-election, nor was it known that he would be. The true policy of the cabal was to maintain towards him the appearance of friendship, at least until that point should be settled. It was only the "malign influence" of those who might endeavor to persuade the president to consent to a re-election, and who sought to monopolize his popularity for the benefit of Mr. Van Buren, who rebid to thwart the plans and projects of Mr. Calhoun, that were to be assailed.

He also wrote on the 30th of March to Mr. Ritchie, editor of the Richmond Enquirer, and employs the following language:

"If there ever was a time which demanded that the friends of the constitution should be firm, wise, and united, the moment has arrived. The payment of the national debt will present a new crisis in the history of nations, and create the necessity of new legislation, based upon the state of our treasury, thereby produced. This question will then be directly presented to the American people—Will you increase the expenditure to meet the existing revenue, or will you diminish the revenue to the existing expenditure?"

"If gen. Jackson is now declared a candidate, I foresee that a new race for popularity commences. He occupies the position of patronage, and Mr. Clay that of the American System. Do not both these tend to the same termination? Can the administration contend with Mr. Clay and profess to be the friends of internal improvement and of the tariff, without throwing its influence in favor of the vast projects of public expenditure which it is the business of Mr. Clay and his friends to set on foot? Is it not the duty of all those who desire to bring back the constitution to its original purposes, to postpone the presidential election until the discussion upon the great questions, connected with the approaching state of our finances, shall have brought them home to every man's door? Until the people shall know that Mr. Clay's project is to take ten millions annually out of the pockets of one portion of our citizens, for the purpose of buying up another."

Mr. Green well knowing Mr. Ritchie's devotion to principle, did not venture to approach him on any other ground than that of principle. Appealing then to his principles, he endeavored to alarm him with apprehensions, that the policy of general Jackson would be substantially the policy of Mr. Clay—that "patronage and the American System tended to the same termination." The object was a little more time for private action, and hence was Mr. Ritchie to be prevailed upon not to commit himself in favor of the re-election of the president, or at least to remain neutral in relation "to the bold and decisive means," which were then thought necessary to "insure us triumph."

"These evidences of political management, preparatory to some contemplated grand movement, all of which bear date about the time of the preliminary meeting of certain members of congress, to compel the cabinet to be re-organized, are from the Telegraph, and were voluntarily disclosed by the editor himself. I have another letter, which has not before appeared, written by Mr. Green at the same time, 25th of March. I am authorized to use it. The body of the letter, I am informed, is not in the hand writing of Mr. Green, although the signature is. It doubtless was a circular carefully prepared, and suggested, and forwarded in various directions, and to different persons.

"The intrigues of some individuals near the president are daily developing themselves, and must soon end in the disappointment of those concerned in them. The article in the New York Courier, stating the press [The Telegraph] and the article of the 23d, assuming the senate, have their origin in those intrigues, the object of which is to make the president and others believe that Mr. Calhoun is resolved to oppose them, and thus transfer the president's popularity to Mr. Van Buren. I shall wait a few days for further developments. In the mean time I shall take the liberty of asking you to suspend your opinion until you shall have seen the whole of the matter in issue, and then act on the side of patriotism. I have never deceived my friends. I have never sounded false alarms. I now say to you, that the remarks, so far as Mr. Calhoun is concerned, are false, and time will show the true object of his enemies. Mr. Calhoun is known to be the true friend of the president."

At this time, Mr. Calhoun was at Washington. Who can believe, that during all this while, of "measured step and slow," he was not counselled and advised with; and that this circular was written by his advice, or passed under his revision and inspection? It can hardly be believed, that without his approval, Mr. Green would take a course so important to his future political interests. It cannot be doubted, that these letters to Danlap, Noah, Ritchie, and especially this circular, were written by and with Mr. Calhoun's advice, or passed his revision. The object and purpose of the last, was to show, that Mr. Calhoun "is the true friend of the president," next, how management and intrigue were going on near the president; and lastly, that in a FEW DAYS a full exposure would be made.

Wherefore all this secret, private, political arrangement? Why all these conversations, this wide spread correspondence, these intrigues in congress, these preparatory movements "in open day and secret night?" Why this restless jealousy, and fearful foreboding of Mr. Van Buren—this fear that he would induce the president to consent to a re-election—this apprehension that I had lent myself and my influence, to bring about results, which were to thwart Mr. Calhoun, and postpone his claims? Why the attempt to alarm, and to arouse the democracy of New England? Wherefore disturb Mr. Noah's tranquillity, with fancied tales of plots and intrigues, and Mr. Ritchie with grave and oracular warning? Wherefore, in the circular of the 25th of March, in language so impressive and foreboding, and of such solemn and prophetic import, employed? What awful event or dread design was a "FEW DAYS" about to disclose, that friends, on the ground that they had NEVER BEEN DECEIVED, nor false alarms been sounded, should be implored to suspend their opinions? Was all this note of preparation—this bustle—this management—this toil by day, and profound meditation by night—these solemn warnings and doleful cautions, to be the mere announcement, that Mrs. L.—B.—H. and E. did not interchange views, or invade each other to LARGE PARTIES at Washington, and that the president, in martial pomp and spirit, had sent the gallant hero of the Thames, the harbinger of a dread threat, if it were not otherwise?

Oh, no! It was an such unimportant matter, which in a "FEW DAYS," with astounding effect, was to be brought before the American people. It was a general attack upon all who would not acknowledge Mr. Calhoun's legit. right of immediate succession; a plot was to be discovered, and then we were to have an expose of those intrigues near the president, which were to evince to the world that a transfer of his popularity to another was designed. Mr. Van Buren was to be stigmatized as the author; and I was to be marked as his humble instrument in the business. It was intended next to denounce all the president's personal friends, who were near him, as a "malign influence"—to represent him as the victim of their machinations, that one by one, they might be driven from him; or if he would not part with them, and should prove refractory, to open the phials of their wrath against him, until sickened and disgusted with the turmoil, he might retire to the solitude of the hermitage, and yield the strife of politics to the vice president and his rivals. All the vixenish carers that were ever painted and circulated in this city, were as nothing, compared to this grand—this important design, which was to be brought out subsequently as an afterpiece to the new plot that was built upon the letter of Mr. Crawford, and the published correspondence.

The question arises, why were not these plans carried out at the intended time? Why not executed? Why were these designs suspended, and all the labor of preparation brought to a pause? Passing events furnish the answer. On the 31st of March, the day after the letter to Mr. Ritchie was written, and before the "FEW DAYS" of waiting had expired, a voice from Pennsylvania was hurrying through the land. The democratic members of the legislature of that great state, which first had presented general Jackson, and through two contests sustained him, were now again the first to express their confidence in his administration, and to nominate him for a re-election. Awed by the independent and uncorrupted voice of this state, the managers at Washington paused in their career, to listen for the distant echoes of this denouncing sound,—this unexpected annunciation. Mark how it was announced in the Telegraph.

"The position of this press, located at the seat of government—its presumed relation to the president, the high respect and delicate regard, which he has, at all times maintained for public opinion, impose restraints upon it, in relation to the discussion at this time, of the propriety of his continuance in office for another term."

Again, a voice from New York, responding to the recommendation from Pennsylvania in terms of approbation, equally strong, was also heard, and these two large states, thus moving and acting together, gave answers, that whoever chose to go into retirement could do so, but that the claims of Mr. Calhoun to the presidency would, certainly, for the present, have to be postponed. Before a recovery could be effected from these decisive movements, the veto of the president upon the Maysville road bill was announced and filled the south with joy and hope. It falsified the predictions which had been made to Mr. Ritchie, and swept away that, whence a successful opposition was expected to arise. It was perceived that the president's moral, was no less than his physical courage, and the people of the south already exhibited a general feeling in his favor. All hope of arraying the south against the north, was seemingly impracticable, and for a time abandoned. Evidences of better feeling began to appear, and in June, the Telegraph undertook to show, that it had always been in favor of the re-election of general Jackson. In the mean time, the president and the vice president had differed in relation to some incident connected with the Seminole (Indian) war, which had occasioned a coolness and separation.

Congress again assembled, and it was rumored that Mr. Calhoun intended to write a book, and give to the public his correspondence with the president. The papers were shown privately to his friends, who biased themselves in representing the affair, in conversation and in their letters, as an intrigue which had been gotten up on the part of Van Buren to destroy Mr. Calhoun. In preparing and bringing forward this address, much policy was necessary, and it was employed. I was requested to examine the manuscript, that if there was any thing in it, that could have a tendency to induce the president to reply to it, a modification might take place. The request I obeyed; but afterwards, that incident was used to prove, that the friends of the president had read and sanctioned the address, before it obtained publication. The statement, as it related to me, was illiberal and untrue.

The publication of this work again aroused party animosity, and partisans were perceived to take sides, according to their personal predilections, and to bring up the question of the succession, prematurely, as the means of creating division among the original supporters of the administration. The discussions in congress were evidently marked by such lines of separation; and while Messrs. Latham, Branch and Burien, could there find apostles and advocates, the other three members of the cabinet, were struck at, as the points of attack, by the new opposition. The one was a "malign influence," which was bending every thing to selfish purpose, while our colleagues were receiving honor, and commendation. Abuse from the papers on one side, and a disposition to retaliate from the other, were now clearly manifest. We thus had a prospect of open war between partisans of different portions of the cabinet, the evils of which, as was plainly to be perceived, could not but penetrate into our deliberations, interrupt business, affect the progress of public affairs, and disturb the quiet and repose of the country. While a party to contest the succession was thus organized in congress and in the cabinet, one of the prominent friends of Mr. Calhoun introduced a resolution, which contemplated, by a retrospective provision, to amend the constitution, so as to exclude gen. Jackson from being eligible to a re-election. If those who urged this measure in the house of representatives, did not hope absolutely to disfranchise the president by obtaining such an amendment, they moved it as a means of bringing a general principle to operate on him alone, and by obtaining a vote on the abstract proposition, to urge it as the sense of the representatives of the people against his re-election. In this mode was the war waged against the fame and influence of the man who was elevated by the voice of the people, and who was again summoned by them to become a candidate, because he had realized all their hopes, as the reformer of abuses in the government, and was securing the rights of our citizens and adjusting the difficulties of the country.

The situation of the president, was now easily to be perceived. With a cabinet politically divided, and personally, as may be presumed, not very friendly, it was impossible for him to move along in the arduous duties of his station, with satisfaction to himself, or advantage to the country. It was apparent, that in justice to himself, he must soon be under the necessity of re-organizing his cabinet, and if it could not otherwise be accomplished, to dismiss the disaffected portion of it. Having, accepted, reluctantly, a place in the cabinet, I concluded no longer to sacrifice my private comfort, or be the occasion of embarrassment to the president. Early in April, I communicated to him, (what in the previous month I had written to a friend in Philadelphia), my wish and intention to resign, which I shortly after executed. In my letter of resignation, it was not necessary or proper that I should go into a history of events, such as are now present. I confined my remarks solely to that which concerned myself, without adverting to, or touching on, the conduct of others. I felt not that any defence, or vindication, for voluntarily yielding my office, was necessary; and feeling no disposition to injure or assail others, I forebore to enter into details. The same determination would have been persevered in, had not the illiberal conduct of my colleagues made a different course necessary.

Mr. Van Buren taking a similar view of the condition of the cabinet, and the situation of the president, connected with the peculiar circumstances in which he had been placed by his opponents, thought proper also to resign. Without going into a full explanation in his letter of resignation, or naming any of his colleagues, he presented briefly the result of the political intrigues, which were dividing the cabinet, distracting the party, and which pointed to a change in the councils of the president as necessary and indispensable.

The secret feelings and designs with which my colleagues entered the cabinet, and which while there, they continued to cherish—their "notes" of private conversations, treasured up for future and concerted use—the advice of a certain cabal, and an acquiescence in the counsel given, to enter the cabinet, and continue there for special purposes, notwithstanding "the insuperable bar" which conscience suggested, and the "indignity and outrage" which had been offered and borne for fifteen months, were all unknown to me. These were secrets worth preserving, and they were kept closely. Yet, entire confidence was reposed, that on being informed that Mr. Van Buren and myself had retired, the others would appreciate the motives which had occasioned it, and place their offices again at the disposition of the president, that he might organize a new cabinet of homogeneous materials, which would not be obnoxious to the attacks of any of his professing friends, and would suffice the affairs of the country quietly to be transacted. But these gentlemen, although now they pretend that they had been grievously "insulted," and were constantly liable to a repetition of the "outrage," could see no cause why they should resign, either as it regarded their own honor, the quiet of the president, or the harmony of his administration. Having gone into the cabinet to produce discord, they could perceive no reason why they should retire from it, to restore harmony. What they had so long and so ardently desired, being attained, [the exclusion of Mr. Van Buren and myself], they were more than ever disposed to continue. Besides, they could not see how the government could well move on without them, and they were solicitous to procure some justification, which they could plead to the people, for the injury which was about to result to the country at being deprived of their important services! Their honor, and the harmony of the administration, was quite insufficient! They must needs place their resignations solely on the will and the request of the president, that on his shoulders might rest the undivided responsibility of the awful deprivation which the government and the country were to suffer from their retirement. Their wishes were gratified, and a desire communicated that they should resign. Thus was the cabinet dissolved; and thus far the country, evidently, has sustained no injury, save in the disturbances and interruptions to the public which the complaints and murmurs of this dismissed and disbanded corps have occasioned. If, as has been stated, the president offered to two of them, Mr. Latham and Mr. Branch, after their removal, places of trust and honor, let it be set down to his kindness, not to their merits. He did not then know these men. He did not know how incapable they were of properly appreciating acts of kindness. He was ignorant that they had entered his cabinet, all smiles and fair professions, with daggers concealed in their bosoms. He little knew that these persons, who were admitted to his familiar intercourse, had been taking note of his private conversations and free expressions, which had been conned over between them, and prepared and carefully laid away for future use. He did not in fact know, they had been spies upon him from the beginning of his administration; and that, finding themselves deprived of the means of longer stealing into his bosom, to hunt out, and note down his thoughts, they were now ready for open, implacable and exterminating war. These things he did not then know. Recent events have disclosed them.

Nor did I comprehend the depth of the designs of these three gentlemen. Having resigned my seat in the cabinet, and being about to retire to my residence in Tennessee, I did not calculate that I should be detained here from my home and business, to defend myself against their unprovoked attacks. In this I was mistaken. My pursuers were resolved that I should not escape the sweet revenge, which their deep mortification at the loss of office had aroused. I could not bear it longer. Messrs. Ingham and Berrien, who were here, were in habits of daily intercourse with the editor of the Telegraph, and their names being used in connection with the abuse which was propagated through that print against me, I conceived I had a right to enquire, whether their names had been used, and references to them made, with their sanction.

I readily admit, that no imperative obligation rests upon a man to engage in private combat, merely because he is invited to do so. Public opinion sanctions such appeals, only when the injured party has right and justice on his side, without other remedy. But a man who asserts a claim to the character of a gentleman, is bound to act like one. Mr. Ingham did not thus act, when to a plain and proper question, he returned an insulting reply, and sought "to strut the hero, and to ape the warrior," without the capacity to go through with that which so inopportunely and rashly he had begun. I never asked him to admit or deny, that my family and his did or did not associate. He never so understood me. It was for the publication only, and his supposed participation in it, that I held him responsible. My correspondence with Mr. Ingham, his degrading apprehensions, false charges, and ignoble retreat, have already, through himself, been made known to the public. He is suffering merited punishment, in the contempt of the brave, the abhorrence of the honorable, and the detestation of the community.

I addressed Mr. Berrien on the same subject. The correspondence which took place, he has laid before the public in his recent address. When it terminated, I had hoped our difference was ended. His late address, however, was of a character to induce with me a belief, that my forbearance on the former occasion, had a tendency to embolden him to further malignant assaults; and accordingly, without seeking explanation, I made a direct call upon him for personal redress.

His answer was never communicated to me. The friend who acted in my behalf, finding it an argumentative, labored reply, to a plain and simple demand, returned it as a paper not of a character to be presented or received. [See appendix C.] A second call was made, which resulted in a refusal on the part of Mr. Berrien, to grant the satisfaction which had been asked. He has proved that, with malice and hatred in his heart, he could wear the garb of a friend. Pretending to have claims to honor and character, he could become the traducer of a woman, seek the ruin of a family which had never harmed him, and shrink from responsibility. It must be ever so! Base men are not brave. A guilty conscience is a bad panoply on the field of honorable combat. The conscious wrong-doer anticipates the worst, and calculates to suffer, from a knowledge that he deserves it. It is not surprising, therefore, that Mr. Berrien's conscience did not permit him to trust himself with one, whom, so wantonly and so pertinaciously, he had wronged and sought to injure. These two men, Ingham and Berrien, will stand together in after time, and with honorable men, monuments of duplicity, ingratitude and baseness—traitors to their friend, and destroyers of themselves—a memorable illustration of the melancholy truth, that "a man may smile, and smile, and be a villain."

For Mr. Branch, I feel but pity and contempt. He has been the dupe of his own littleness of mind, and the victim of his more wily associates. Though he has entered into their feelings, and aided them in their designs—has asserted untruths, and offered injurious imputations, I cannot find in my heart to entertain a feeling of revenge towards so humble an accomplice.

The restless, troubled spirit, that, through such secret agencies, moved and controlled all this intrigue and management, became visible last winter in his proper person. His influence and address have associated in his schemes many partizans, besides those who embarrassed the late cabinet with difficulties. They have made themselves victims to his ambition. If he can now find pleasure in the course he has adopted for the promotion of his views, in the afflictions with which he has visited my dwelling, or in the sacrifice of the willing instruments who, as friends, were employed to do this service, he must owe his satisfaction to the delusions of ambition. The time will come when the victims of his policy shall rise before him, like the shades which appalled the insidious and heartless usurper Richard, to disturb his slumbers, and to drive peace from him.

Detraction has struck at every thing around me. And, although it has been uniformly pretended that the persecution against me originated in great regard and delicacy for public feeling and morals, yet what are the proofs to authorize the rumors, about which Mr. Ingham and Mr. Berrien would not trouble themselves to enquire, but which, notwithstanding, they could slyly and secretly whisper into circulation? They have produced none! If this be legitimate warfare, there are few who may not be subjected to the ordeal from which the most innocent cannot always escape with a name unblighted. It is a well known fact, that in this city, there are hired writers for papers at a distance; and if some incident does not, from week to week, occur to fill their page, fancy must suggest some gossip tale to be told, and printed, and circulated. The motive with the writer, is his pay—with the publisher, the gratification of the appetite for slander, reckless of the wound it may inflict. Under such a state of things, which party excitement now tolerates, of what concern is probity of character—or what the value of a good name? It is upon this sort of anonymous rumor, propagated by the vicious and malicious, that political contrivers seized, to accomplish their purposes. Malignant as these gentlemen have shown themselves, all I ask of them is, to waive all concealments, allege specific charges, and adduce their proof. A conscience "void of offence," can meet them and defy their malice, let them but strike their blows openly and in the face of day.

But it is time to close this narrative. I am admonished, that already I have trespassed too long, and laid claims to an indulgence beyond any that I had a right to ask. I could not confine myself within narrower limits; and if I have said too much, be my apology found in this, that it is through no culpability of mine, that the public have been disturbed with private matters, and with private griefs. Patient and forbearing, I was disposed to keep to myself the adjustment of my own wrongs, nor solicit the public to become an umpire in matters which, being private, could in nothing concern and interest them. But I am not permitted to enjoy even this humble privilege. I have been arraigned before them by men, writing under malice, mortification, and disappointment. Idly surmising me to be the moving cause why the sun of their political glory was so suddenly shorn of its beams, they are restless, persecuting and unforgiving, and appeal to the country to redress those private griefs to which they have subjected themselves, by seeking to accomplish selfish aims at the expense of truth, honor and humanity. I throw myself upon the pardon and forgiveness of a liberal and just community for all I have said, and for any thing that may appear to be improperly said. Your fellow citizen,
JOHN H. EATON.

P. S. Gen. Robert Desha in a letter published in the Telegraph of the 9th August, volunteers a statement to vindicate the course of Mr. Calhoun, towards me. He says: "Maj. Eaton informed me in Tennessee, that as soon as he heard of the death of Timberlake, he determined to go on to Washington and marry his widow, and communicated his intention to gen. Jackson, who advised him to do so." In the same letter, he says: "This is the time for the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; for it is what the people are in search of."

More than a month after this letter was written, gen. Desha again writes a corrective letter contradictory of the material statements of the original; and for the mistakes of the first, excuses himself by saying, that he "did not read RAID LETTER after writing it." Strange indeed, that a man should prepare a letter, intended for the press, and to affect other persons, and afterwards admit it to be incorrect, and offer as matter of excuse, that he did not read it after writing it. In this corrective letter, which was written after his friends at Washington had informed him, that I had it in my power to correct it, by most indisputable testimony, he says: "I never held a conversation with major Eaton, in Tennessee, upon that subject; but it was in the conversation had in Washington, the major informed me, that when he was in Tennessee, and heard of the death of Mr. Timberlake, he had communicated his intentions of marrying the widow to gen. Jackson, who was also in Tennessee, who approved of it, and advised him to do so." The general has not gotten his story right yet. He still adheres to the point, that I was in Tennessee when I heard of the death of Mr. T., and that gen. Jackson advised me to marry, &c.

The purpose of this statement is evident. It is that the public should infer that I could, in Tennessee, immediately on hearing of the death of Mr. T., determine "to come on to Washington," not to address, but of my own will to marry his widow; leaving it to be inferred, that I was not only conscious of a state of circumstances, which made it unnecessary to consult her upon the subject, but that general Jackson was also aware that such was the case.

In the spring of 1828, while in the city of Washington, information was received at the navy department of the death of Mr. Timberlake. I heard of it here, not in Tennessee; and when gen. Desha's letter appeared, there were persons in this city who knew, and said, that his statement was incorrect. Doubtless some friend here afforded him the information, which imposed the necessity of writing his second note, which like the first, requires to be corrected. I went home to Tennessee in 1828—remained there during the summer, and in November returned to Washington. From this place I wrote a letter to gen. Jackson upon the subject, and in that letter stated to him my views, intentions, wishes, and expectations, and from him received an answer approving of the course I had pursued—the determination I had taken. Being possessed of this letter, I can be under no mistake as to dates or facts.

In conclusion permit me to remark, that gen. Desha has thrust himself into this controversy quite unnecessarily. His appearance as one of my assailants was not called for, or required. He has appeared a mere volunteer to sustain Mr. Calhoun. I know not what other object he had to answer—what other purpose to serve.

In support of what I have said, I place here a statement of Mr. Mechlin of the treasury department. Were it necessary, others could be obtained, to show that gen. Desha is under a mistake in what he has said to affect me, and to affect gen. Jackson. The character and standing of Mr. M. renders any thing further unnecessary. Mr. Mechlin says:

"In the spring of 1828, news were received at the navy department, of the death of J. B. Timberlake, purser on board the United States frigate Constitution, I set out to inform Mr. O'Neale and the family; but meeting with major Eaton on the avenue, who then boarded there, I requested him to communicate the information."
J. MECHLIN."

Gen. Desha also says, there was no meeting at the last session of congress, with a view to obtain my removal from the cabinet. It has not been so averred. He will not say through, that this was not the case at the session of 1829—'30.

With these explanations, which must satisfy gen. Desha of the mistake he has made, I take my leave of the subject.

APPENDIX.

A.

Statement of Mr. S. P. Webster.

Previous to the presidential election, I was in the habit of frequent intercourse with Duff Green, at his house, and more commonly at his office. In the fall of 1829, October or November, I met with general Green, and he commenced talking about col. —, who was then in the war department, and whom he wished turned out. I thought he seemed rather in an angry humor, and extended his conversation to major Eaton generally. He remarked, that his remaining in the cabinet was of great injury to the party generally—that his situation made him the support of the weak persons of both parties; and that such persons leaned upon him for support—that he was used by the secretary of state to forward his interested and selfish views, and that Mr. Van Buren, through him, was seeking to secure the confidence and personal friendship of gen. Jackson—that if Eaton continued in the cabinet, the secretary of state, who had influence over him, would be able to manage the president as he pleased, and direct the acts of the government to his (Mr. Van Buren's) future prospects. That general Jackson ought to send major Eaton to Russia, or at any rate it was necessary that he should not longer remain in the cabinet—that some of general Jackson's best friends had spoken to him freely on this subject, and if some decisive step was not taken soon, he did not know what might be the consequences.

In the course of the conversation, he observed that the president ought not to be run a second time; that he was sure he did not wish it, and would prefer retiring to the hermitage at the end of the year; and that in effect he had promised to do so, and the people would be dissatisfied if he did not—that Mr. Van Buren was using all his art and intrigue to induce him to suffer himself to be run again; but that if he was again elected, Mr. Van Buren would have obtained such an influence over him and his friends as to be able to command their interest at a subsequent election—that we (the Jackson party), had been fighting for the last five years against cabinet succession, and were now quietly sitting down and permitting the secretary of state to use gen. Jackson and the whole interest of the government, to ensure his future success—that, if this was permitted, we had gained nothing by the change—that the great republican party would fix upon a candidate who would get the votes of the party in 1832; and that general Jackson ought to go home. This was the last conversation or intercourse I ever had with Green, beyond a mere salutation. I plainly perceived he was no friend to gen. Jackson, and I determined to have no further political intercourse with him.

B.

Statement of Gideon Welles, editor of the Hartford Times

Whilst in Hartford, Connecticut, general Green several times spoke of major Eaton as wanting energy and independence—said that the contest which brought general Jackson into power, had been with him merely personal not one of principle—that he exercised his influence in behalf of opposition office holders, and opposed to removals. In conversation with him at Washington, the latter part of December, 1829, he said it was necessary for him to leave Washington if the administration would prosper. Although they were personal friends, and he wished him well, truth required him to state, that his remaining at Washington was injurious to the administration—that, through him, Mr. Van Buren had already attained great influence over general Jackson, and wished him to consent to a re-election, in order to postpone Mr. Calhoun's claims, and drive him, if possible, into retirement. It is unnecessary to repeat the political views of general Green and his associates, his eulogies on Mr. Calhoun, his talents, his services, his political strength, the devotedness of his friends, particularly of judge —, who, though a mason, could bring in anti-masonic, federal, and religious parties. Nor need I state, how willing the faction was to sacrifice their friend, the judge, with all his popularity, if Mr. Van Buren would cease pressing a re-election on the president, and consent to be placed on a ticket as vice president. Had that arrangement been made, or any other that would have secured Mr. Calhoun the presidency, nothing probably would have been heard of cabinet and family difficulties at Washington, nor Mr. Ingham have assailed me. As I learned by that conversation, gen. Green's object was to bring forward Mr. Calhoun for president; and he and his advisers considered major Eaton and Mr. Van Buren as obstacles. He seemed to suppose, however, that if Eaton was removed, all would be peace and harmony, and removed he must be.

Mr. Calhoun, he said, had no influence with the president, and could have none while major Eaton remained there, nor could any of his friends receive appointments, so long as he remained in the cabinet.

Knowing that I had been an advocate for gen. Jackson since 1824, he endeavored to enlist jealousy by representing that Mr. Van Buren, through major Eaton was endeavoring to confer all appointments on the old Crawford party. It was indispensable to the prosperity of the administration, therefore, and the harmony of the members, that he should leave Washington.

He admitted that Branch and Berrien had treated major Eaton unkindly. That they had courted his society the previous winter; were frequently riding with him and Mrs. Eaton, and that each were under greater personal obligations to him than any other individual except the president. Mr. Branch, he seemed to think most culpable, as through maj. Eaton, principally, he said he had intruded into it into an office, to the surprise of all; and when the whole country had their eyes on another. It was that, he said, which had defeated his and my wishes, and of most of our friends. But that between these gentlemen, there was now particular animosity.

There was one way in which maj. Eaton could retire honorably and victoriously. By accepting the mission to Russia, it would be making an honorable exchange for the war department, and all were willing Mr. Branch should be dismissed, which would furnish a triumph to Eaton. This arrangement of leaving both leave the cabinet, would satisfy all parties. It was desirable major Eaton should leave the cabinet and leave Washington. The mission to Russia was an honorable post and he and Baron Kruedener were friends, and on intimate terms. This arrangement he spoke of as having been for some time under consideration and he assured me, there would be a change of the cabinet before congress closed its session. He mentioned the individual who would probably succeed Mr. Branch. He alluded to an "insuperable bar" to this arrangement, provided maj. Eaton was refractory, and determined to remain, and that was in overcoming the friendly feelings of the president. He seemed to despair when he spoke of the shining affliction, which formed so prominent a trait in his character, and which never would permit him to forsake a friend.

C.

Correspondence between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Berrien. Washington City, Monday morning, July 25, 1831.

Sir: In your letter to me of the 18th June, in reply to mine of the preceding day, you in effect say, (although denying my right to interrogate you), that the attacks made upon me, in a paper in this city, were "without your agency." You volunteered the declaration, that you did not "think it necessary to decide upon the truth or falshood of the statements which were made," in relation to my family; leaving me to understand, that as you had formed no opinion, so neither had you expressed one, in any wise derogatory of me. After these explicit disavowals as to yourself, I did not deem it proper to take exception, or to hold you personally accountable, for conforming to rumors which you may have heard, or "to the general sense of the community," which you so falsely assume as a pretext to injure me, and to disparage hundreds of the most respectable persons in our country, who have maintained friendly relations with me and my family—persons in all respects, equal in standing with you, and those who hold intercourse with you.

Upon this proof of my forbearance, a forbearance which I ever hope to exercise, except in cases of high emergency, you have grown bold, and in a labored article recently addressed to the public over your signature, giving countenance and sanction to the base slanders which have been propagated against me in my domestic relations, you speak of them "as evils which presented an insuperable bar to your entering the cabinet;" and that your assent was finally given, under the persuasions that the president would specify his error, and by removing me, correct the evil. This is what you intend to say, omitting at the same time a material fact, which was known to you that I was the identical person through whom was communicated to you the desire of the president, that you should enter his cabinet; and that through the same person you returned an answer, offering at the time private business only as a reason why you could not, and did not, at the instant of the application, make a prompt acceptance or refusal.

Sir, the open attempt now made, unprovoked—and altogether uncalled for by any course of mine towards you—is obvious to every eye. The whole nation must perceive that your object and purpose is to mark me with dishonorable imputation. These efforts of yours, so persevered in, will, I confidently believe and hope, justify me to the American people, and to all honorable men, in requiring of you the reparation due to one who so wantonly has been abused, insulted, and injured; and accordingly I do require it. With due respect,

J. H. EATON.

To John McPherson Berrien, esq.

P. S. This letter was prepared to be delivered to you on Monday, but the absence of the friend, who was expected to be the bearer, the daily expectation of his return, and the difficulty of procuring one unconnected with the government, has occasioned the delay.

J. H. E.

To this letter a long argumentative reply was returned. I never saw it. My friend refused to receive it, as not being a proper and definite answer to the call. Gen. Hunter's letter explains what afterwards took place. It is as follows:

Washington, Tuesday evening, 2nd Aug. 1831.

DEAR SIR: I enclose to you the correspondence which has taken place between gen. JONES and myself to whom I was referred as the friend of Mr. BERRIEN.

You will perceive, from the character the transaction had assumed in my absence, I had only one course to pursue on my return to this city, which was to explain the reason of that absence, and require of Mr. BERRIEN, to an explicit demand, an answer equally so. I was informed, verbally, by the general, that his friend had taken his ground, in the rejected communication, from which he would not depart; and that if the case of maj. EATON was pressed further at this time, it was to be understood as declined. I, however, thought it best to deliver my note, and await a written reply. Gen. JONES' letter of the 2nd of August, in answer to mine of the first—nothing other than a confirmation of what had been verbally declared to me the previous evening—and I accordingly assumed upon myself to say, as your friend, I could hold no further correspondence with him on the subject. Deeming it unnecessary and improper to proceed further, as I considered the matter finally closed, I remit it back to your hands. In conducting this business, I take occasion to say, that I was at the place of conference during Thursday and the next day from 10 to 3 o'clock, leaving a note saying, I should again be in attendance on Saturday.

I am, sir, with great respect, your friend and obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HUNTER.

—Maj John H. Eaton.

Copy of a letter, addressed by gen. Hunter to Mr. Berrien, which he was directed to deliver to gen. Jones, as the friend of Mr. Berrien, dated Washington City 1st Aug. 1831.

Sir: Severe indisposition since Friday evening last, confined me to my bed, and prevented me from conferring with you on the subject of major Eaton's call of Thursday. I was consequently not in place when your answer of Saturday, (as I understand), was presented. Hence, from necessity, it was read by another friend, who, deeming it inadmissible, returned it.

I now await your answer. The call of major Eaton is explicit, it is expected the answer will be equally so.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient,

ALEXANDER HUNTER.

John McPherson Berrien, esq.

Copy of so much of gen. Jones' letter to me, in answer to mine of the 1st of August, addressed to Mr. Berrien, as relates to the subject matter, received 12 o'clock, 2d August, 1831.

DEAR GENERAL: In answer to the note which you put into my hands at parting this evening, for Mr. Berrien, I can only recapitulate, in few words, what, for your private satisfaction as a gentleman and man of honor, I have already communicated to you verbally.

According to Mr. Berrien's appointment with you on Thursday, he sent by a member of his family, (wholly unapprised at the time, of the nature and tendency of the correspondence), a sealed letter to yourself, enclosing a written answer to the note delivered by you from major

Eaton. The bearer of this answer attended several times, both on Friday and Saturday, at the place of appointment, but without meeting you, in consequence, as I now understand, of your confinement at home from indisposition. On Saturday, he was met at the place of appointment by another friend of major Eaton, with authority to receive the communication in your place; which, after being opened and read, was forthwith returned to Mr. Berrien, with a verbal intimation that maj. Eaton would not receive it.

This seems to close the door to all correspondence between the parties, and of course to any communication in reference to the original demand upon Mr. Berrien, between third persons, acting in their behalf. In Mr. Berrien's proffered answer to major Eaton, he has taken his ground, and upon that, under existing circumstances, he must stand as firm and immovable as he would upon any other that he might have elected. After the indignity of having the answer, which he had devised, thrown back upon his hands as unworthy of reply, without the slightest explanation how or why it was deemed inadmissible in time, he cannot submit to the task of graduating new answers by an imaginary scale, till he may chance to have descended to some supposed degree of admissible answer. I was myself wholly unapprised of this unhappy affair, till it was communicated to me this morning; when I engaged, in case you should take any further agency in the matter, to explain to you individually as a gentleman, what guarded respect to the original medium of communication between the parties, Mr. B. had observed in all that had been transacted during your absence, and how completely all direct and authorized intervention had been cut off, and the affair remitted to the discretion of mere parties. Such was the beginning, and such was the end of my present commission.

Copy of my answer to the foregoing letter, dated Washington, 2d August, 1831.

DEAR GENERAL: From your note of this morning, it appears that the matter, so far as you are concerned, as the friend of Mr. Berrien, is terminated—as the friend of major Eaton, I can, therefore, hold no further correspondence with you. I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

ALEXANDER HUNTER.

From the National Intelligencer.

Washington, Sept. 15, 1831.

GENTLEMEN: The misrepresentations contained in the article under the signature of John H. Eaton, published in the Globe of this morning, will require correction. For the purpose of doing this, so far as I am concerned, I will, with your permission, shortly avail myself of the use of your columns. You will oblige me, in the mean time, by giving publicity to this note. I am, very respectfully, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

JOHN McPHERSON BERRIEN.

To Messrs. Gales & Seaton.

A LETTER FROM MR. LUMPKIN.

From the "Federal Union," (Georgia.)

Those editors who have published Mr. Crawford's address to the citizens of the United States are requested to publish the following strictures on that address and its author.

Messrs. Editors: In the Georgia Journal of the 25th instant, I have read an address "To the citizens of the United States," signed "Wm. H. Crawford," in which the author has used my name in rather an unfriendly and uncourteous manner, more so, I presume, than he would have done at a calm and lucid moment.

Were the publication limited in its circulation to the people of Georgia, where Mr. Crawford and myself are both fully known, I should not deem it necessary to pay the slightest attention to his denunciations. But the standing which Mr. Crawford once had in the United States may mislead some portion of the reading public.

To the whole of his disparaging charges, I give the most unqualified denial. He knows them to be false. He knows that I have been an undeviating republican, throughout my whole life. He knows that I am no "turn coat." He knows my firmness and independence, from mortified experience. He knows that, although in my youth I supported him for various minor offices, I abandoned him against my own popular interest, and contrary to the wishes of many of my personal friends—when I believed that the interest of my country required me to do so. He knows that my intimate knowledge of his political course convinced me that he was utterly unworthy of that public confidence to which he aspired.

Because in my youth I had supported Mr. Crawford for a seat in the legislature, and other offices, and when he aspired to the presidency of the United States I preferred Andrew Jackson, Mr. Crawford accuses me of a want of republicanism—of political apostasy, of snaking a source, &c. Time has been in Georgia, when Mr. Crawford had the combined means and art to make the majority of the people believe that republicanism consisted in supporting him in all his ambitious schemes of self-aggrandizement; but he has outlived his arts—his political juggling is at an end.

The people of Georgia are no longer under the dictation of Mr. Crawford. The passport to honor and distinction are real or supposed merit; intrinsic worth of character. The people of Georgia do not at present believe me to have been a federalist because I supported Andrew Jackson for the presidency in preference to William H. Crawford.

The copy of Crawford's letter to Mr. Balch, which passed through my hands, was unexpectedly received by me, without any previous knowledge of its existence. I transmitted it to Mr. Calhoun, with the feelings and opinions I then entertained; and if I labored under some misapprehension in regard to the opinions of others, I was not singular in that respect—nor do I feel that I have any cause of shame for my feelings then expressed; they will continue to be creditable to me in the estimation of every honorable man—although they were written without the slightest expectation of being laid before the public.

Mr. Crawford is entirely mistaken in regard to my humble pretensions. I make no pretensions to the spirit of prophecy or extraordinary sagacity. I stand amongst the number whom Mr. Crawford reproaches with the epithet of ignorance for having sustained and supported gen. John Clark against the oppressions and persecutions of Mr. Crawford and his co-workers. I have never submitted to the humiliation of setting up the political creed of any man—as the unerring standard of orthodoxy. I have a much higher standard, the constitution of my country, in arriving at a true interpretation of which, I avail myself of the lights of those patriots and statesmen who have sealed their fidelity to their country by the tenor of their whole lives.

If I had supported Mr. Crawford for the presidency, I have no doubt he would still have considered me a pure republican—but as I have some doubts upon the subject of his uniform republicanism, I will, in conclusion, propound a few interrogatories to Mr. Crawford, to wit:

Inst. 1st. Did you, or did you not, draft and sanction the Augusta address in the year 1798, expressing "the most unlimited confidence in the firmness, justice and wisdom" of the administration of John Adams, sen? If yes, what was your age at that time?

Inst. 2d. Was it not one of your first acts in the senate of the United States in the year 1807, to vote against the embargo, recommended by Mr. Jefferson, to save our immense mercantile capital from the desolating sweep of the French decrees and British orders in council? And was not that measure then considered the touchstone of republicanism? And was not your vote then and there recorded, with the federal minority, headed by Timothy Pickens?

Inst. 3d. When Mr. Jefferson and the republican party determined to abandon the embargo, and prepare for more decisive measures, were you not then opposed to its repeal? And do you not now think, that the embargo was expedient in its incipient stage, when you voted against it? And unwise in its continuance, when you voted for it?

Inst. 4th. Did you, or did you not, about this time, set your eye and affections upon the presidential chair; and commence your political courtship with the federalists?

Inst. 5th. Did you not treat Mr. Madison's messages proposing preparatory measures for war, encringly? and admonish the senate against measures preparatory to war? contending then that the embargo ought to have been adhered to? And did you not afterwards, when the war became inevitable, pronounce it worse than ridiculous, to think of supporting our commerce by a navy?

Int. 6th. When the question of the late war came direct before congress (though you finally voted for the measure), was not your support cold, silent, inefficient, and equivocal, during the long and arduous struggle in the senate of the United States? And did you once raise your voice in its support?

Int. 7th. Did you not soon after the war was declared, take refuge from responsibility and danger in a foreign court, and there remain in undistinguished and unprofitable security, until the storm of war, danger, and responsibility, had subsided?

Int. 8th. Although you shrank from the responsibility of sustaining the war, were you not found soon after the return of peace, ambitiously aspiring by the most censurable means, to that high office, which a grateful people had almost unanimously designated as the reward of the long devoted services of Mr. Monroe?

But I forbear pursuing this subject further, and ask Mr. Crawford and his friends, what benefits has Georgia ever derived from the services of Mr. Crawford? What justice is there, in denouncing every man, who has too much independence to yield obedience to the dictatorial mandates of an aristocratic few?

WILSON LUMPKIN.

Monroe, 29th August, 1831.

LETTER FROM GENERAL DESHA.

To the editor of the U. S. Telegraph.

Gallatin, (Tc.) Aug 25, 1831.

Gen. Green: My object in addressing you at this time, is to correct an error in my letter to you of the 20th of July last, and published in the Telegraph of the 9th of this month. I did not read said letter after writing it, or I certainly should have discovered the mistake, which is, that major Eaton informed me in Tennessee, that as soon as he heard of the death of Timberlake, he determined to marry his widow, and communicated his intentions to gen. Jackson, who advised him to do so. Now, I never had a conversation with major Eaton upon that subject in Tennessee, but it was in the conversation we had in Washington the major informed me that when he was in Tennessee and heard of the death of Timberlake, he had communicated his intention of marrying his widow, to gen. Jackson, who was also in Tennessee, who approved of and advised him to do so. This explanation you will please make in the Telegraph.

I have noticed in the Globe that the friends of Mr. Calhoun are charged with holding meetings during the last session of congress for the purpose of addressing the president to remove major Eaton, and says myself, with others named, will prove it. Now, sir, if the friends of Mr. Calhoun ever held meetings for that or any other purpose during the last session of congress, I am not aware of it. I acknowledge that I was during the last session in company with judge White, Mr. Grundy, and col. Polk, of Tennessee, judge Bibb, Mr. Wickliffe, and Mr. Daniel, of Kentucky, and general Overton, of Louisiana; all, as is well known, are warm, personal, and political friends of general Jackson. At this time I cannot recollect how or at whose instance we met, but I am satisfied you have correctly stated, in the Telegraph of the 9th of August, the object of the meeting. Very respectfully, ROBERT DESHA.

FASTING, HUMILIATION AND PRAYER!

From the Charleston Mercury of Sept. 3.

The following letter from his excellency the governor, in relation to the resolutions adopted by several public meetings, requesting him to appoint a day of general humiliation and prayer to Almighty God, has been handed us for publication. It will be seen that his excellency, whilst he cordially approves and complies with the wishes of his fellow citizens on this interesting subject, has postponed the period of this solemn religious observance to October next. The reasons assigned for the postponement reflect much credit upon the delicacy and high sense of propriety for which that officer is distinguished, and cannot fail to command the unqualified approbation of the people.

Charleston, Aug. 25, 1831.

SIR—I have had the honor to receive your communication as chairman of a public meeting of the state rights and free trade party of Beaufort district, enclosing the following resolution adopted by that meeting.

Resolved, That, impressed with a deep sense of our entire dependence upon God, and the necessity of his aid and guidance in all things, the governor be requested to appoint Friday, the 9th of September next, as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer to God, that he will direct us to the means most pleasing in his sight, of removing the national oppression under which we suffer, and of producing harmony and unanimity of sentiment in the state.

As this resolution has been adopted by those whom you represent, and whom I so highly respect, and by several other meetings of my fellow citizens, I will very cheerfully comply with their wishes. As, however, the 9th of September is too early a period to allow a sufficient dissemination of my proclamation through all parts of the state, I shall take the liberty of designating some convenient day in October next, for the proposed religious ceremony. There are, moreover, some objections to my naming so early a day as the 9th of September of a local character affecting this city, which induce me to postpone, for the present, the issuing my proclamation. This community is now engaged in an ardent and excited canvass for the corporate election, and if a direction of the public mind were now given to this topic, it might, (however unjustly), subject the proceedings to an imputation of being designed to party purposes. I trust moreover that a postponement of my proclamation for a few weeks, may enable me, at the close of the season, to add to our "fasting, humiliation and prayer," a thanksgiving for the health with which the Almighty has been pleased to bless our homes, and for the abundance which he has bestowed on our harvest.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, with great esteem, very respectfully, your ob't. serv't,

JAMES HAMILTON, jun.

Dr. Thos. F. Screven, chairman of the late meeting of the state rights and free trade party of Beaufort district.

☞ We think that hardly ever before had we so much matter waiting an insertion—a good deal of which has been prepared with much labor and care. We shall make liberal efforts to reduce its quantity and keep pace with events. We are threatened with several long articles on the already voluminous controversy, of all which we intend to preserve a full account. It will be curiously interesting to call-up these things hereafter, when "existing circumstances" and "malign influences," shall have ceased to operate on the judgments of men.

☞ With considerable labor, we have noticed the chief points in the great mass of foreign articles received by late arrivals. It seems that a general war in Europe may not be expected—at present, and we are glad of it; not only for the sake of Europe, but because of our own country—whose approaches to solid, substantial independence we do not wish retarded by artificial and temporary excitements, resting upon events over which we have no sort of control.

☞ The general convention of agriculturalists, mechanics and manufacturers of the United States, proposed to be held at New York on the second Wednesday of October next, has been postponed, (by order of the committee appointed to call it) until the twenty-sixth day of October next—when, it is hoped, that the friends of home trade, in every state, will be represented. In the mean time, perhaps, the Philadelphia convention will condescend to tell us what free trade is, and where it may be found; both which it is highly important should be discovered! Indeed, we think it obligatory on the "free trade" gentlemen to find out these secret things, which so many think are only "matters of moonshine."

☞ We propose the following as the first resolution to be offered at the Philadelphia convention—

Whereas it is clearly unconstitutional and certainly unjust and wicked, to protect the pursuit of any one class of persons in the United States, at the cost of all the other classes—

Resolved, that the squadrons of vessels of war stationed in the Mediterranean and West India seas, and in the South Atlantic and Pacific oceans, be instantly withdrawn—and that the whole navy, built and supported for the protection of commerce, at the cost of one or two hundred millions of dollars, be—TUHANAWKED, forthwith—that trade may "regulate itself!"

☞ The "New York American Advocate" gallantly battles on the side of the industry of the people of the United States, and will accomplish a great service in favor of the "American System;" which has covered our hill-tops with sheep, and caused the valleys to resound with the busy hum of prosperous industry—the producer and consumer being placed side by side, and uniting their voices in some new tune to render thanks for benefits conferred by the Author of all good, in consequence of new means of comfort afforded, and new inducements to a virtuous life, extended to the whole laboring population.

☞ The general report of the condition of the bank of the United States, shall have a place as soon as we can make room for it—being a paper of much importance to the government and people, in a just consideration of the state of the country.

☞ A curiosity has been placed in our hands. It is the envelope of twenty-four copies of major Eaton's reply—all which were thought to weigh about three pounds, forwarded to a gentleman of this city, and franked at Washington.

A "FREE TRADE" MEETING, to send delegates to the Philadelphia convention, was pompously called at New Orleans, and many people met—but no one appearing to "open the business"—the people returned to their homes—being indisposed to "nullification."

WOOL. The New York Advocate of the 12th inst. contained various advertisements offering for sale 131,000 lbs. and also about 500 bales of wool—chiefly American.

GRAIN OR FLOUR for the English market, we presume, will not be in demand. All accounts agree in stating that the harvest in England would be very abundant. The crops were chiefly secured, and the weather was uncommonly fine. Some of the new wheat had already been in market, and was sold for 8s. per bushel.

MOVEMENTS! Mr. Livingston, secretary of state, arrived at Washington from New York, on Thursday last—and Mr. Woodbury, secretary of the navy, has also returned, with his lady. Mrs. Livingston was expected. Mr. and Mrs. Doubson, (who reached Washington a few days since), left Baltimore on Tuesday morning, in company with Mrs. McLane, lady of the secretary of the treasury, for Philadelphia. Mr. and Mrs. Eaton have departed for Tennessee, as announced in the "Globe." The "Telegraph" of Tuesday says, that no civilities had been exchanged between Mrs. McLane and Mrs. Eaton, during the late stay of the former at Washington; and that the families of the other secretaries were not expected to arrive until the departure of Mrs. Eaton was finally settled; adding some remarks which we shall not copy. The same paper intimates that Mr. Eaton proceeds to Nashville, expecting a seat in the senate; but Mr. White's time will not expire until March 1833, nor Mr. Grundy's until 1835.

It is rarely that we have had a paragraph in which the names of ladies were so prominent—but it seemed useful to the public information that they should be mentioned.

*We learn that Mr. and Mrs. Eaton have proceeded no further than this city, (Baltimore), because of the indisposition of the latter.

ELECTIONS. The college recently elected in Maryland, to elect a senate of the state for the ensuing five years, met at Annapolis on Monday last, and, having appointed Joseph Kent, (late governor of the state) president, proceeded to business—and on Tuesday elected the following gentlemen—

From the Western shore—John G. Chapman, of Charles; Dennis Claude, of Annapolis; Benjamin S. Forrest, of Montgomery; Charles F. Mayer, of Baltimore; James Montgomery, of Harford; B. S. Pigman, of Allegheny; Thomas P. Sappington, of Frederick; Octavius C. Tabor, of Calvert; and Wm. F. Wooten, of Prince George's—and from the Eastern shore, Littleton P. Dennis, of Somerset; Thomas Emory, of Queen Ann's; William Huggitt, of Talbot; Samuel G. Osborne, of Kent; Henry Page, of Dorchester; and George Reel, of Caroline. Total 15. All "national republicans."

There were five candidates for the office of governor of Mississippi, and the following is given as the state of the votes, officially ascertained from all the counties but one, which will not materially affect the result, viz:—Scott 3,945, Runnels 3,711, Lynch 2,871, Harris 1,452, Gordon 493. Colonel Abraham M. Scott is therefore duly elected, by a small majority, over his most prominent competitor, H. G. Runnels.

For the Lieutenant governor, the votes were, in all the counties but three, Fountain Winston 6,427, John H. Norton 4,375. The former is certainly elected.

The elections for governor, &c. have just taken place in Vermont. The returns are not complete—but so far, Mr. Putner, (anti-masonic), had 12,168 votes for governor, Mr. Allen, (nat. rep.) 11,250, and Mr. Meech (Jackson), 5,528. "No choice" has been made of a member of congress in place of Mr. Mallary—but Mr. Slade, (anti-masonic) had a large plurality.

Mr. Smith, the Jackson candidate, has been re-elected governor of Maine. Particulars hereafter.

THE SOUTH. By storms and floods and murders—and many real or apprehended insurrectionary movements among the slaves, our fellow citizens of the south have greatly suffered, and claim our most earnest sympathy for what they have yet to endure. We heartily feel with them; and regret to learn that a paper called the "Liberator," published at Boston by Mr. Garrison, who had a temporary residence in Baltimore, has been widely spread among the people of color, for the seeming purpose of provoking insurrection and massacre.* We hold no communion with such proceedings,—though religiously opposed to slavery; and, while our first consideration would naturally be the preservation of the whites—the second, the welfare of the blacks themselves, is almost equally a matter of imperative importance. A sudden emancipation, either by force or through principle, would be a calamity that must desolate the south, and cause a terrific destruction of both masters and slaves! No one of a sane mind, we suppose, can entertain such a project, unless reckless of misery and blood.

* There is, perhaps, no law which can reach such proceedings in any of the states north of the Susquehanna—but an exertion of public opinion may correct this publication in Boston; and it is certain that the inhabitants of that enlightened city have no participation in such outrageous doings. We understand that some (how many we know not), copies of the "Liberator" are transmitted "gratis." There is much safety in the intelligence of many of the free persons of color. They have their little properties—business and personal attachments, and many are honest and worthy people; and all such know the folly, or rather madness, of any attempt to advance themselves, by force; that momentary success would inevitably be followed by a general extermination or fearful addition to the privations and hardships now encountered by persons of color. Another affair like that at Southampton, we trust, will not take place—for, for each like murders committed, an hundred lives of, perhaps, generally innocent persons, will be offered a sacrifice to revenge. The power is with the whites, and that they will abuse it, under such circumstances, must be expected.

The storm, with its damages in Louisiana, has already been noticed—the loss was exceedingly heavy, though less than at first apprehended. The growing crops of corn, cane and cotton were much injured; and the “rot” of the latter, because of long continued rain, will be seriously felt in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, &c., and we now see that the caterpillar has commenced his depredations in South Carolina. The crops of some of the planters, it is said, will be wholly lost by the myriads of this insect which prey upon them.

The losses by the floods are enormous. It is supposed that the damages sustained by the rise of the Savannah river, only, will amount to two millions and an half of dollars! The desolation on other streams have been proportionally great; and, to the loss or damage of the cotton and corn crops, that of rice is to be added, by the overflows, and on account of mud and sand deposited.

But this is not all. A dreadful sickness prevails, in many places, probably because of the excessive wetness of the season, and extraordinary product of vegetable matter. The low country, in all parts of the United States, is now unhealthy.

SERVILE INSURRECTIONS, &c. We have great pleasure in saying that the report of the destruction of Wilmington, N. C. by the negroes, was altogether erroneous, though apprehended at Raleigh when the account came away. Excessive agitation prevailed in that city—the men were under arms, and the women and children half-distracted by their fears; and thus it was in several parts of North Carolina, and the people hastily prepared themselves to encounter reported armies of slaves! Certain suspicious movements took place in some of the counties—and terror exaggerated every thing. Martial law was proclaimed at Wilmington and other places—various conspiracies are supposed to have been discovered, and a considerable number of blacks have been arrested. Duplin, Sampson, Wayne, New Hanover, Jones and Lenoir counties, would seem to have been the seats of “organized” conspirators! Reports of murders were numerous—17 families, (it was positively said), being massacred in Jones county! The women were much agitated, and a fearful looking to events, with a greediness to hear tales of horror, (as is always the case under such circumstances), seized the men; but after all, it does not appear that the slaves committed any excesses—that any person was murdered; but the unhappy belief that a general rising of the blacks was planned, must long keep the people in a very embarrassing and distressed condition. Business was beginning to resume its wonted course, but the white people, every where, rested on their arms. Every free negro at Raleigh had been arrested and examined—and some were ordered to leave the city, because they could not give a good account of their mode of subsistence; but it has not yet been stated, we think, that any free negro, either in Virginia or North Carolina, has been found guilty of a participation in the outrages contemplated or committed. This, surely, is much to the credit of this class of persons. A company of U. S. troops from fortress Monroe had arrived at Newbern, to protect that place and its neighborhood.

The trials, because of the late insurrection in Virginia, were yet going on—12 or 15 have been executed, some sentenced to transportation, and a few recommended to mercy, and about 30 yet remained for examination. No appearance of concert among these had manifested itself. The negro confined in Baltimore jail, was not “gen. Nat.,” as reported—but charged with horse stealing and sent to Washington. The gov. of Virginia has offered a reward of $500 for Nat. The actual number of white persons slaughtered in Southampton is 35—chiefly women and children, and in the most feud-like manner. Much alarm had existed in several other counties of Virginia, and many negroes had been arrested. There were eight convictions in Sussex. The white people were very generally armed themselves, and many volunteer companies have been formed.

We earnestly sympathize with our fellow citizens in their agitations, as well as because of their actual sufferings. The general cry now is, “something must be done!” What can be done? Much might have been effected by the colonization society, and may be, if those most interested shall heartily take up the subject—released from their newly-formed constitutional scruples, and willing to make some personal sacrifices to the general safety and the public peace. Years, perhaps, must pass away before the people in the lower country of the south will feel that same confidence in the security of their wives and little ones, which they lately entertained; every idle rumor—every movement among the slaves, however harmless in itself, will embarrass and distress them,—and “something must be done.” Yet the brig Criterion, which lately sailed from Norfolk for Liberia, carried out only 46 emigrants. The lives of many very valuable and much esteemed persons of color have been sacrificed to the climate, or rather, present condition of the colony—so were thousands of lives sacrificed in the first settlements of the United States—and so it is in the budding up of almost every new colony—chiefly caused, perhaps, by the want of those means of subsistence and comfort which peculiar circumstances demand. The present inhabitants of Liberia enjoy good health, and are prosperous; and as better accommodations are provided for new-comers, the mortality among them will decline. A comparatively small sum of money appropriated to the improvement of the neighboring country, such as the draining or filling up of low places, might do for Monrovia what such things have done for Baltimore—once regarded as among the most unhealthy places in the union. Let the way be prepared, that humane owners of slaves shall not feel themselves checked in manumitting them, that they may have a country and a home,—and soon become men. Enough, under favorable circumstances, might be removed for a few successive years—if young females were encouraged to go,—to keep the whole colored population in check. The means of the government and people are surely equal to this, and the change would be so gradual that its effects would hardly be felt, consisting chiefly in the advance of the whites, and the greater spread and more liberal emancipation of the blacks; which latter has a strong tendency to diminish their number, or, at least, to prevent its increase. Some hard cases might grow out of this operation—but the present awful and severe domestic trade in slaves would be reduced in its amount, and the good far overbalance the evil attendant on the project. We cannot consent to any proceeding which shall inflict additional oppressions on the people of color—but late events will run into many new severities, unless some plan is devised to quiet the apprehensions of the whites. Regarding this subject as highly important, we intend to revive certain remarks that we made upon it twelve years ago, and discuss it at some length. We have reached a period when “something must be done,” as well to give security to the white population, as prevent the imposition of new hardships on colored persons.

HIGH-PRESSURE STATEMENT. The strange appearance of certain things presented in the article inserted below, induced me to examine the figures and investigate the facts set forth—and, though much used to such anti-tariff doings, there is a weakness and willingness of misrepresentation in them, that really surprised me—for the most powerful exertion of charity cannot admit these things to be mistakes. It is manifest that a deliberate intention existed to abuse the public mind. The statement is false even in its arithmetic, false in several other respects, and is any thing but an honest and fair exhibit of the operation of the tariff laws—and yet this paper has had a free and wide circulation through the English, or anti-tariff, press in the United States, being offered as “confirmation strong as proofs from holy writ,” of the rank injustice of our protecting laws; when, in truth, it is one of the best and most conclusive evidences of the benefit of the “American System” that we have lately met with, as we shall speedily shew. Well may we exclaim,

“O, that mine enemy had written a book!” But—like the “New York Courier” “Albany Argus” and “New Hampshire Patriot,” the anti-tariff press never stops to acknowledge or excuse a detected falsehood! The old saying of CORBETT is closely kept in mind—that “a lie, a ‘wholehog’ lie is just as good as a truth, if well told, and firmly persevered in.”

From the Charleston Commercial Advertiser.

The public have heard a good deal, in a variety of ways, touching a custom house bond, upon which payment had been refused, in order, by this means, to test the constitutionality of the tariff duties, by an appeal to the courts. A writer, who signs himself "Civis," has enlightened us somewhat upon the subject; and facts, so far as they go, have now taken the place of rumor. It appears that Messrs. E. Holmes, and Alexander Mazzyk, both members of the Charleston bar, and not merchants, as erroneously reported elsewhere, through the agency, however, of a local mercantile house, imported a bale of blue plains, by the invoice of which, it appears, according to Civis, that the duty on these plains is prohibitory, and consequently, that no revenue can be raised upon their import, the loss being such that they cannot be imported. It will also be seen, that, with a moderate duty of 15 per cent. they would have yielded a clear profit sufficient to induce merchants to import them.

The following detail of the subject, is afforded by the same writer:

Cost of one bale blue Yorkshire plains (29 in. wide) measuring 570½ yards at
2s. 6d.	611.	16s.	1d.
Charges in England, viz. commission, portage, shipping charges, &c.	3	5	2

Cost in Liverpool	651.	1s.	3d.	4-6-	$289	16
Exchange on England, 5 per cent. prem.					14	46
Interest on cost, $1 34, freight, $3,					4	34

Cost in Charleston exclusive of duty	$307	96
Duty, calculated on the cost at the port of exportation, viz. 50-2-3 cents per running yard, or 63 cents per square yard; but costing over 50 cents per square yard, it is reckoned, agreeably to the present tariff, to have cost
$1 per square yard, and pays a duty of 45 per cent. on this valuation—thus 570½ yards, 29 inches wide, equal to 459½ square yards, at $1 per yard, $459 50; 45 per cent.	206	78
thereon,

Total cost, equal to about 90 cts. per yard,	514	74
Cost of running yard, exclusive of duty, about 54 cents; duty per running yard, 36 per cent.
equal to 67 per cent. on the cost including all charges, or 71 per cent. on the cost at the port of exportation.

The foregoing was sold in Charleston at its market value, viz. 570½ yards at 68 cents	387	96
Loss sustained	126	80

$514 74

For the payment of these duties, three several bonds were given—suit has been brought upon them by the district attorney, and the case will be adjudicated in September next, when the federal court is in session. We shall then know all.

Now, in the first place, 570½ yards of cloth, at 2s. 6d. is £71 6s. 3d.—not £61 16s. 1d. and the exchange on England has long been eight per cent. (or more) premium, not five. [It is now ten.]

Then £71 6 3 cost of cloth
3 5 2 charges

74 11 5 is equal to	$331	10
Eight per cent. premium	26	48
Interest, as stated	4	34
	361	92

†The Charleston Mercury says—We learn that Mr. McDuffie has been heard from, and that he will attend at the next term of the district court of the United States to argue the case on the custom house bond. No answer has yet been received from Mr. Tazewell. [It since appears that Mr. T. having declined the practice of the law, declines an interest in this case.]

And the first cost is $361 92—not $307 96, as stated.

The stuff contained in the latter part of the grand calculation is of no manner of importance. The cloth, it seems, was sold at its "market value"—mind the "MARKET VALUE," or 68 cents per yard. Now, the real cost in Charleston, the statement being true in the quality and cost of the cloth, was at the rate of 65½ cents a yard, without duty, and would have yielded the importer only 4½ cents per yard profit, or no more than about seven per cent. advance, though the cloth had been smuggled, without risk or charge on account of such a proceeding! Isn't it a shame that such a statement should be laid before the public? But what is the result? Why—that the DOMESTIC MANUFACTURE of such goods has so reduced the "MARKET PRICE," that the foreign article cannot be imported, and yield a reasonable profit, FREE OF DUTY. For surely, 4½ cents advance, on 63½ cents vested in England, cannot be thought a fair profit on the importation.

Again—there is no merchant—no man of business, that would have made such an importation, the square yard duty forbidding it. These always import goods at a minimum, or a little below one. What American would be fool enough—long-eared enough, to export flour to England, when, though the price of wheat there is 50c. per quarter, equal to more than 125 cents for our bushel, (exchange included), the duty is 44s. 8d. per quarter, equal to $5 98 on a barrel of flour? Such is the British duty. It is far more severe than our duty on cloths, even in this case made-up to "astonish the natives." With wheat at 100 cents the bushel in the U. S. flour is worth, in our sea-ports, five dollars per barrel—but the British duty is 5 dollars and 98 cents—say 120 per cent. yet on these cloths it was only 71 per cent. on the cost, as presented to shew the enormity of our laws! What sort of eyes do such men see with?—what sort of ears have they?—what kind of hearts beat within their bosoms? They have no interest in the fact, that the British tax on the great staple of two-thirds of the free cultivators of the soil in the United States, may be equal to 120 per cent. on the cost—but a patriotic indignation is roused when such tax is repelled by one of even 71 per centum on cloths. But the latter statement is high-pressure and FALSE.

Let us present a plain and practical view of the operation of the duty on cloths, when imported by a business-man. He would direct the purchase so as to come in at the minimum—say 50 cents the square yard. The duty then on 289 dollars vested in England, in cloths, instead of being 206 dollars, as stated, would have amounted to only 103 dollars, or one half less, and even at that rate the cloths would have lost money to the importer, because of the lowness of the "market price."

[The preceding was laid off for insertion last week—since then we notice an exposure of some of the errors of "Civis," in the Charleston Courier—and the writer, who signs "Fair Play," well observes—"Reckless Niles will be very much obliged to Civis for his exposition." I am so far obliged, because Civis has shewn that such cloths cannot be profitably imported free of duty; but I am mortified that such presentations should be made to deceive a highly excited and much mistaken people.]

P. S. At the moment of making-up the last sheet for the press, we received a Charleston paper containing the correction of an error in the original statement by "Civis," and the whole, at some mechanical inconvenience, was promptly laid aside, that we might have time to examine into the matter. It appears that the price of the cloth should have been 2s. 2d. and not 2s. 6d. and it is said that "Civis" had already corrected the "typographical error" in the "Mercury," which never presented itself to us in that paper, nor in any of the twenty "free trade" journals that had so eagerly copied the "high pressure" article. Some of these knew that "Falsehood travelled from Maine to Georgia while Truth was pulling on his boots," and would not, perhaps, do anything that might set as a general impeachment of the accuracy and fairness of the statement. This error being admitted, shew,

†Not being able to bear a duty of even 15 per cent. as stated by the editor of the Advertiser!

that the amount of £61 16 1, as the cost of the cloth, is correct, &c. and the account will stand thus—Cloth and charges in England £65 1s. 3d.

equal to	$289 16
Exchange on England, eight per cent.	26 48
	315 64
Interest on this sum, 4 months	6 30
Freight, out and home	6 00
Commissions on remittance, and sales, at Charleston, 5 per cent. on $315	15 75
Insurance, out and home, on $15 dollars, at 3 per cent.	9 45
	353 14

So the real cost of the cloths, from the first investment of the money until its return into the pocket of its owner, was $353, or very nearly 62 cents a yard; and selling for 68 cents, the gross market price—the adventurer would make a profit of six cents a yard, the cloths were admitted FREE OF DUTY; supposing also that he sold for cash, only, losing no interest on sales! This, we take it, would be a very poor business.

But let us look further. A revenue duty of 20 per cent. would surely not be objected to.* It is one third less than the average of the revenue duties of "free trade" England. We shall add this:

Amount as before	$353 14
20 per cent. on $15 dollars	63 00
	416 14

And, while the market price of the cloth was only 68 cents—its actual cost would be 70½ cents, or a real loss on the importation of 570½ yards, of twelve dollars 84 cents, nearly.

With these facts before us, the rightfulness of which has been referred to intelligent merchants, and, we think, cannot be refuted, is not clearly manifest, that the domestic manufacture of such cloths, (or of cloths that supply the place of them) has materially diminished the cost to consumers? WE SEE THAT THEY WILL NOT BEAR A LOW REVENUE DUTY.

Again—as Charleston is one of the great ulterior markets for such cloths, it may be reasonably supposed that they sold higher there, by from one to three cents a yard, than they would have done at Boston. But we shall not make any addition to our calculation on this account.

These details have been entered into that the subject might be fairly presented. We have no idea that those most interested will examine this peaceful "nullification" of absurdities—they despise all readings, except stamped by the goldsmith of orthodoxy, as much as Jack Cade did, and would make them capital offences—but others will look at, and profit by these things.

The general remarks previously made—as to a fitting of the cost of the cloth to the minimum, so that it might shew the duty in its most offensive feature, still hold good. No generous mind would resort to such an extreme case to afford instruction to his fellow citizens—nor would any other than a fool import cloths at the rate given, with the hope of profit upon them. But we see that, with a revenue duty of only 20 per cent. the customary charges and allowances being made, these cloths would have brought the importers into debt. There is some reason for this. LET THE "FREE TRADE" FOLKS TELL US WHAT IT IS! WE PRAY THAT THEY WILL!

*A duty of twenty per cent. seems to be the lowest rate which has yet entered the mind of the "free trade" party. The proof is at hand. Coffee is an article of very general consumption—it is chiefly obtained in exchange for our bread-stuffs, exported to the Spanish, Danish and Swedish West Indies (not the British)—for which a foreign market is badly wanted; and, as we produce no coffee in the United States, the trade is mutually advantageous. And besides, while it is admitted that the revenue is overflowing, we have had loud and long flourishes of trumpets about relieving the burthens of the poor—and, as a conclusive evidence of this abundance of money and abundance of sympathy, the duty on coffee was reduced to two cents per lb. Whether a real reduction in its cost has followed the reduced duty, or how much of the reduction has rather passed into the profits of the West India planters than been saved to American consumers, we shall not just now examine; but, though there was not much, if any, objection to the project of reducing the duty on coffee, and we should have been willing to take it off all together—great praise has been claimed on account of such reduction; though the duty yet levied is, at least, twenty per cent.—perhaps, twenty-five per cent. on the general cost of the article.

MR. RANDOLPH, says the New York Evening Journal, "is visiting the south of France, and has no intention of resigning his commission." We thought he had resigned; and it is not easy to believe that he will receive pay from the time when he left St. Petersburg, except for such period as might be allowed for his return home. But Mr. R. may demand it—for his notions of right are correspondent with those of no other biped; but will his year's salary be paid?

The cost of the mission to Russia is thus stated and added up in the "Boston Courier," and we suppose that it is nearly correct—if the salary and in-fit be allowed: To ordering the Concord to St. Petersburg with Mr. Randolph	$75,000

To Mr. Middleton's return salary	2,500
Mr. Randolph's out-fit for his 10 days mission	9,000
One year's salary	9,000
Quarter's return salary	2,500
Mr. Buchanan's out-fit	9,000
	$107,000

ROADS, CANALS AND RAIL ROADS, in England and France:

England contains	10,600 leagues of roads.
"	" 1,500 leagues of canals.
"	" 1,200 leagues of rail roads.

France is twice as extensive & has only 1,500 leagues of roads.
600 leagues of canals.
40 leagues of rail roads.

Now all the savings on account of superior means of transportation in England, enter into the product, or capital, of the country, and have powerfully aided in rendering it, at once, the banking establishment and warehouse of the civilized world. Labor or time saved, is just the same, in effect, as new commodities produced. Such is internal improvement—and hence the mighty advances of England in population and wealth, notwithstanding her wasteful and profligate civil and religious government. No other than the people of England could pay the taxes and rates imposed on them—and it is by such savings that the burthens are borne.

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA. The 7th vol. of this work has just issued from the press. The new matter is very interesting; and every subsequent volume increases the good opinion which we had formed of this laborious and valuable publication. When complete, it will certainly be the best and most convenient manual for common reference extant, and with respect to a great variety of most important subjects—by which the unlearned may be instructed, and the learned, (without a waste of time), refresh their knowledge.

TWO STANDARDS FOR THE POLES have been prepared at Boston, and were exhibited to the public, with many interesting ceremonies. We have a full description of them, and of the standards. The latter are magnificent. One of them bears the inscription—"to the brave sons of Poland from the young men of Boston," with the portraits of Kosciuszko, Washington and Lafayette, &c.

KENTUCKY. Gov. Metcalf has issued his proclamation convoking the legislature on Monday, the 7th Nov.—(one month before the usual time of meeting), because that, at the last session, a senator of the United States was not appointed to fill the existing vacancy.

THE LATE STORMS. Aux Cayes is said to have contained 2,500 houses,—of which only 5 or 6 shattered ones remain! The whole site of the town was inundated—between 500 and 1,000 persons perished. The town of Jérémie has equally suffered—and no longer exists: "every thing was lost." The harvest in the neighboring parts totally destroyed—large trees having been rooted-up by the force of the wind. Port au Prince was not much injured.

The hurricane which has swept the Caribbean Sea and Gulf of Mexico with such disastrous effects, commenced at Barbadoes at 1 A. M. on the morning of the 11th; it reached St. Domingo and Cuba on the 13th, and New Orleans on the 16th and 17th, August.

Many millions of dollars, to say nothing of the loss of life, will not repair the damages sustained in the West India.

HIGH CRIME AND GREAT PENALTY. On the second Monday of this month the superior court of Gwinnett county, Ga. commenced its session, when ten white men were to be indicted for the crime of residing within the limits of the Georgia charter without taking the oath of allegiance. Penalty—not less than four years hard labor in the penitentiary. The following are their names: J. A. Thompson, F. Thompson, Thomas Gann, J. P. Wheeler, J. J. Trott, S. A. Worcester, E. Butler, S. Mayes, A. Copeland, and Edward Delosier.

EMIGRANTS. We are informed by a New York paper of the 12th inst. that 90 passengers left that city, in one vessel for Belfast—returning, we suppose, dissatisfied with the United States; but in a New York paper of the 19th—we observe, that, in one day, there arrived four vessels, which brought out more than 500 passengers from London and Liverpool.

ROBERT POTTER, one of the representatives in congress elect from N. Carolina, has been tried at Oxford, and found guilty of a wilful and cruel poisoning of "a youth of tender age," named Lewis K. Willie,—and sentenced to pay a fine of one thousand dollars, with the costs of prosecution, and to be also imprisoned six calendar months, and thereafter until such fine and costs be paid. Potter is yet to be tried for the like poisoning of the rev. Lewis Taylor, (an aged man, we believe), whom he also haltered and stabbed, as is charged, that he might accomplish his purpose. A jealousy of his wife caused these proceedings on the part of Potter; but nothing was shown on the trial to extenuate the outrage—of which Potter acknowledged himself guilty. The court expressed its doubt on a point of law, as to the measure of punishment,—else would have condemned Potter to two years imprisonment, the greatest extent that could possibly be allowed by the statute. The court house was crowded,—and the people under a great excitement against Potter.

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.—From the Richmond Whig.—We publish the letter of judge Marshall, declining to act on the central committee. It was an inadvertence on the part of the meeting to place him there; an inadvertence, however, which will find its apology in the reverence and affection of those who committed it. We may add also, that judge Marshall's opinions were no secret to his fellow-citizens.

Richmond, Sept. 8, 1831.

To the Editors of the Compiler.—Gentlemen: I observe with regret, in your paper of this morning, that my name is placed on the central anti-Jackson committee, appointed by the meeting held yesterday in this city.

I am at all times willing to perform any duty which my fellow-citizens may please to devolve on me, unless restrained by the opinion that propriety forbids me to undertake it. That is the fact in the present instance.

My age, my habits, which separate me from all party contests, but above all, the public office I hold, make it unfit in my opinion to enter on the duties assigned to me; and I must therefore decline it. I make this prompt declaration, because, being first named in the committee, it might be expected that I should take steps towards the commencement of its operations. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. MARSHALL.

NEW YORK CITY BANK. A part of the money which belonged to Messrs. S. and M. Allen, and stolen when this bank was robbed, was offered to them a few days since for exchange, and immediately recognized. The fellow who offered it—an Englishman named Parkinson, and a brother-in-law of Smith, (who is in the state prison for the robbery of the bank), was arrested, with Smith's wife, and another woman named Murray, all whom were fully committed—8,000 dollars were found about the persons or houses of these individuals; and a hope is indulged that the whole of the $63,000, that was yet missing, will be speedily recovered.

A POLISH GENERAL-ESS.—The Hamburg Correspondent contains the following, dated Warsaw, July 7:—An eye-witness gives the following sketch of the detached Lithuanian corps of countess Plater and count Cesar Plater:—The countess is about twenty years old. Her pale and beautiful features are indicative of a romantic melancholy. Her duenna (nanny's maid) supplies the place of ad-d-camp, and is younger than her mistress. The former is the chief of the staff, and at the same time intendant-general of the corps. No corps can be better managed. Both ladies are almost worshipped by the whole corps. They are dressed as men, and are constantly among the troops. The countess has assumed the name of M. Constantine. From him the soldiers receive orders, provisions, and ammunition. Count Plater is well known at Warsaw, where he spent all last winter. He is a young man of about 21 years, of feminine features, and middling stature. When he is not engaged in military duties, he devotes his time to prayer. Both in the fields and woods, altars are erected, where a chaplain performs service, which is attended by the whole corps. Being rich, he bestows all his wealth upon his corps, and even collects considerable supplies from his numerous relations. The corps consists of cavalry and infantry.

COUNT DE LEON and retinue, consisting of forty-five persons, from Germany, arrived last evening, in the North America, and took lodgings at Bradstreet's mansion house. The count, we understand, is emigrating to the west, and will remain a few days in this city.

[Albany Ev. Journal.]

The count is from Belgium. The Albany Daily Advertiser says, it is his intention to purchase a tract of land near Pittsburg, upon which he and his dependents will locate. After he has purchased a tract, about two thousand persons from Belgium will leave their homes, and come to this country to settle on the count's estate.

The count is said to be worth about five millions of dollars, and his arrival may be hailed as most interesting to the prosperity of our western land, which will benefit to a great degree from his enterprise.

CUSTOM HOUSE BOND. We are informed that Mr. Tazewell, who was invited to argue this cause, has repined in a very polite and kind letter regretting that he is unable to come, although his aid would cheerfully have been afforded to the cause if he could have come on at this time, and could have consented again to appear at the bar, after having for many years relinquished the practice of his profession. [Charleston Mercury.]

THE CHOLERA MORBUS.—The following terrific account of the progress of this disease at St. Petersburg, was believed at London to be far short of its actual operations:—

From the 28th to the 30th June there had been at Petersburg upwards of 50 cases, and 30 deaths—more than 15 deaths a day. From the 30th of June to the 6th of July there were 596 cases, and 279 deaths, averaging from the 30th of June to the 6th of July, 55 deaths a day. From the 6th to the 13th there had been 3,645 cases, and 1,518 deaths; average of deaths between those dates, 216 a day. From the 13th to the 15th of July, the last report of Sir Daniel Bailey, the Russian consul-general, there had been 4,916 cases, and 2,290 deaths, averaging, in those last two days, 1124 deaths a day. Such is the frightful mortality prevailing which, if it continues with the same virulence, and, to increase as it has done, must, with the immense population of St. Petersburg, carry off some tens of thousands.

"Letters from Memel of the 19th July, contain no news of importance. The cholera had not reached Memel, nor Königsberg, on the 22d. At Danzig there had been about 750 cases of the cholera, of which 560 had died, and the disease was spreading through the neighboring villages. The Prussian government, it appears, does not stop provisions destined for the Polish army."

The disease was prevailing pretty much in like manner at Archangel, Riga, &c. &c.

Subsequent accounts inform us that the cholera was declining at St. Petersburg. The cases were much less numerous, and of a milder character. Such appears to have been the progress of this disease. Its onset is awful—but its violence appears soon to be exhausted.

NUNS. Port Tobacco, Maryland, Sept. 17. The nuns of Mount Carmel, of this neighborhood, twenty-four in number, took their departure on the 13th inst. for Baltimore, after a residence among us of upwards of forty years. They are the oldest order, and of the oldest standing in the United States. Having established themselves here a few years after the American independence, and during the troubles on the continent of Europe.—Their old convent is situated about two miles from this place, and was under a different regulation and discipline from any similar institution in the country. They live entirely secluded from the world, and have many devotions and deprivations not in use in other nunneries. They are going to Baltimore to rid themselves of the charge of a large farm, a number of slaves, and to shelter themselves from the inclemency of the weather. Their present convent being built of wood, is now in a state of decay and dilapidation. They are of the order of "Mendicant Carmelites" of the reform of St. Teresa. The original founders of the institution came from the English convent at Antwerp, and have died here within the last two or three years.

[These nuns have taken up their residence in a new and large building prepared for them in Baltimore.]

SUBMARINE EXPLOSION. A very extraordinary phenomenon occurred in sight of the ship Crawford, capt. Goull, on the passage from Trieste to New York. The first officer of the ship states, that on the 9th of July, at 9 o'clock in the evening, he had charge of the vessel, with orders to keep a look out for the island of Meretto, and about daylight he saw something like a mountain on the larboard bow, ascending in the air to the height of 200 or 300 feet, perfectly black, and disappearing at intervals. Hauled upon the wind immediately to the northward, in order to get out of the range of the explosion; and two brigs astern, one the Asia, of London, immediately followed the Crawford. Reports as loud as thunder followed each other in quick succession; jets of the sea were thrown up to an immense height; the ship rolled as if in a storm, and the ocean was white with foam. At this time it was calculated they were in 3 or 400 fathoms of water, and about 16 miles from Sicily. In ten minutes more, had the ship kept on her course, she would have been swept into the vortex of the volcano, carried, probably, to an immense height, and then engulfed forever in the abyss below. The alarm on board the vessel is said to have been very great.

LIBERIA. The following further particulars respecting the colony of Liberia, are from a late number of the Paris Revue Encyclopedique:—The colony extends 150 miles on the sea coast and 20 or 30 miles into the interior. Its chief city, Monrovia, has 90 houses and stores, 3 churches and 700 inhabitants; it is built on Cape Mesurado, 70 feet higher than the sea. Its harbor is formed by the river of Montserrat; 7 miles north is the river St. Paul. On this is the colony of Caldwell, which is flourishing. Between Caldwell and Monrovia is a settlement of 30 families. On the bay of Stockton live 300 Africans taken from slave ships; 25 miles north east of of Monrovia is Millsburg, containing 200 inhabitants.

The form of their government is strictly republican. Three documents contain the civil and political legislation of Liberia. 1st. Grants rights as in the U. States—slavery is prohibited—and the common law of the U.

States established. The 2d regulates the civil forms of the government—censors are appointed to guard the public morals, to report the idle and all who would injure the prosperity of the colony. The third is a code of procedure and punishments, extracted from digests of the U. S. laws. The executive authority is the agent, who exercises the functions of governor, and two judges who assemble monthly; most trials are for theft; all judgments are by the voice of a jury with great formality. A public library is established at Monrovia.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

An arrival at Boston brought London papers to the 5th August. The leading things were these—

The "war party" having succeeded in obtaining a majority in the French chamber of deputies, Mr. Perrier, and the rest of the ministers, resigned—and the king charged count Mole with the formation of a new ministry. Paris remained tranquil, and the king was zealous in attention to business.

On the 1st of August, the prince of Orange announced himself at the head of his father's army, for offensive operations against Belgium. At the same time a Dutch fleet arrived in the Scheldt. Leopold, who was at Laege, hastened towards Antwerp, at which the people were in great alarm. Some fighting ensued, and it was reported that the Dutch had taken possession of Venloo. The belief was general that Prussia had agreed to support Holland, and hence a general war was expected, in England and France.

Very little intelligence had arrived from Poland. It is stated that the Russian grand army, 60,000 strong, had crossed the Vistula—that the Polish general Dembiski and his army had been made prisoners in Lithuania—that the Poles, at Warsaw, had made every preparation for a gallant stand. Next it is said, that the Russians had retired, re-crossing the Vistula, and would not risk the issue of a general battle!

Algers was said to be closely invested by the Arabs—collected in great numbers, and a great battle with them was immediately expected.

Accounts from Russia say that the emperor was in a dangerous state of health—and that his disease was looked for.

The British house of commons was proceeding slowly, but steadily, through the reform bill. Three of the four schedules has been passed on. The ministers maintained a large majority.

The annuity of the dutchess of Kent has been increased £10,000, say 45,000 dollars, because her daughter, the princess Victoria, is 12 months older than she was last year, though still a little girl. The young queen of Portugal is countenanced by the British and French courts.

The British stocks had fallen $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. because of war news from the continent, the change of the French ministry, &c.

Ireland was much disturbed. There was much movement among the troops of Spain—pushing to the French and Portuguese frontiers.

Very late news.

By several arrivals at New York, files of London and Paris papers to the 16th August have been received.

On the report that the Dutch had attacked the Belgians, a French army (amidst the cheers of the people), immediately marched towards Belgium—50,000 strong; and the British ordered the squadron at the Downs to be ready for instant action—the two powers having resolved to "command the peace." Some further fighting had taken place between the Dutch and Belgians. A French general had been directed to tell the Dutch commander, that all public and private property at Antwerp was under the protection of the French king! On these and other movements being made—the king of Holland consented to withdraw his troops from Belgium, and so the speck of war was dissolved—for the present. The French troops had reached Brussels, but would retire within their own limits. Leopold is said to have shown much energy and coolness of mind—but the Belgians are reported as behaving in a cowardly manner before the Dutch, who arrived within eight miles of Brussels. At this point of time the Belgic troops fled—and a detachment of the French army entered the capital, headed by the dukes of Orleans and Nemours. They were received with great enthusiasm. The Dutch were told that they must cease offensive operations. The Belgians complain much of the severe mode of warfare which the Dutch had so far pursued, in sacking and burning villages and farm houses, &c. The French army will be so located as to keep a close watch over the Dutch. Gen. Gerard, commands the French—the duke of Orleans a brigade, and the duke of Nemours a regiment of lancers.

From Poland we learn that a Russian detachment had been defeated by gen. Muhlborg—that Warsaw was deemed impregnable—being defended by a large army, and 270 pieces of cannon. An investigation into the conduct of Schryznecki had been had, and resulted to his honor—which gave increased strength to the Poles. The Lithuanians and Volhynians were actively carrying on the war against Russia. The Poles were filled with the best hopes. The Russians were inactive or retiring—for causes not assigned. They had suffered several small losses.

There was much agitation in the French chamber of deputies on the 15th August. It is called an "afflicting spectacle"—particulars not yet received.

The army of Holland is estimated at 100,000 men—of Belgium only 40,000. Hence Leopold's earnest call on France and England for their interference.

The French ministers who had resigned, on the emergency of the news from Belgium, still acted—and it was thought that the energy displayed by them in forwarding the troops, might afford that additional support in the chamber of deputies which they had desired.

The king of Holland has lost Batavia, the capital of the island of Java, in the East Indies, which was at all times considered a most important colony of Holland. It has declared for Belgium, and it was thought, would lead to the defection of the whole island. This is another enemy which his majesty may add to his already large list. He certainly has been singularly successful in provoking the hostility and exciting the contempt of mankind.

The following, under date of Brussels, Aug. 12, shews, that, except because of the arrival of the French, the capital of the new king of the Belgians would easily have fallen into the hands of the king of Holland.—"This city was in a most dreadful state of agitation this morning. The Dutch having advanced within eight miles of Brussels, the drums at an early hour beat to arms, and the inhabitants were flying in every direction. It appears that this morning about two o'clock, the Dutch formed themselves in line for battle, and at four o'clock attacked the Belgic army near Louvain. The Dutch opened upon them in three columns, and commenced firing in every direction; the Belgians instantly took to flight, and the greatest disorder reigned amongst them; they threw away their arms and caps, and tried to outdo each other in running; by six o'clock the field of battle was clear, and the Dutch masters of the whole of Belgium; the greater part of the Belgic army threw themselves into Louvain. I do not believe there has been many either killed or wounded! Their conduct is disgraceful, yet one is almost inclined to pity them; they have but few officers, and those they have were the first to fly. Had they not been in the habit of bragging most intolerably, and setting the whole of Europe at defiance, they would doubtless have received assistance; but they spurned the Dutch, and brow beat every other nation. I think the peace of Europe more likely to be preserved now than it would have been had the Belgians been victorious."

It seems Schryznecki kept his counsels so close, that the people became uneasy—on which some of the chiefs of the Poles were delegated to hold a confidential communication with him. To these he developed his plans, and they separated full of hope. There is danger in such proceedings—for among those most relied on, traitors may be found.

There are new disturbances in Italy. More than three persons are forbidden to appear together in the streets of Rome! Many new arrests had been made.

All accounts agree in stating, that the Belgians, when about to meet the Hollanders, behaved in the most shameful manner—running away, and leaving every thing behind them. The Dutch shewed much resolution and steadiness.

Berlin, Aug. 1. It is now ascertained to a certainty, that field marshal Paskewitch has instructions to negotiate with Poland. It would seem also as if the negotiations were to take place under the walls of Warsaw. It is said that the Poles will be required to repeal their decrees of exclusion against the house of Romanoff; and that they will be allowed to choose from their nation, a viceroy, Czar, Tzarisky, or Radzivil.

Brussels, Aug. 8. Sir: his majesty directs me to announce to you that he this instant has received intelligence by the way of England, that the troops stationed at the island of Java have revolted, the Belgians, being more numerous than the other Europeans, have possessed themselves of authority and established a government in the name of the Belgic nation, the whole island has submitted to this government. The king requests you to send an agent to Batavia immediately.

The minister of war, par interim,
CONSTANT D'HANE.

To M. Lebeau, minister at Louvain.

In China there has been an extensive rebellion—the chief seat of it was at Cashgar, in the north. The imperial troops had gained some important advantages, and the emperor had ordered 4,700 camels to transport materials over the desert of Cobi, that the war might be ended. Many pirates have lately been executed at Canton—but the cutting-off of heads there excites no attention.

Manilla. The imports at Manilla in 1830, amounted in value, to $1,562,522, besides $178,063 in specie. This was done by means of 57 Spanish vessels, and 73 foreign. Exports, $1,497,621, and $81,952 in specie, in 57 Spanish vessels, and 74 foreign. Of the foreign vessels, 29 were American, 22 English, 8 French, 4 Dutch, 3 Portuguese, 5 Chinese junks, &c. Revenue from the customs, $228,061.

LETTER FROM SCHRZYNECKI TO GEN. LA FAYETTE.

We translate from a Paris paper of July 22nd, the following letter from the Polish commander-in-chief to gen. Lafayette.

MY DEAR GENERAL:—With what pleasure should I have sooner replied to the flattering letter which you did me the honor to address me on the 21st of April.

I received it, however, after a long delay. I lose not a moment in returning my thanks and expressing the great gratification it affords me to be so happy as to receive in this manner the favorable regard of the veteran of liberty in two worlds—of a person so eminent, whose constancy has been superior to all vicissitudes, whose character has been preserved equally grand in the dungeon of Olmutz and at the head of armies;—the distinguished citizen, in fine, who has exhibited to the world so rare an example of undeviating fidelity of principle, and disinterested regard for his fellow men!

This, indeed, is one of the most grateful recompenses to which I could aspire!

You are already aware of the success that attended our efforts to throw some succors into Lithuania. On the return from that expedition, I was attacked in the neighborhood of Ostrolenka by the Russians, in great force. The combat was obstinate and at last degenerated into carnage. The Russian commander, however, in spite of every thing alleged to the contrary, was not able to prevent the object I had in view. Thus we have, up to the present date, been enabled successfully to maintain our anxious struggle against so great odds, and confident in the enthusiasm of our countrymen, and strong in the valor of our army, we will yet sustain the cause, being persuaded that the moment approaches when constitutional governments will shew less apathy concerning the outrages on public opinion, which have been committed. We think they will interpose for our noble Poland, on which, perhaps, yet depends the safety of Europe, itself. May the prayers, my dear general, that you and so many other friends of humanity put up in our behalf, be successful! And deign to receive with kindness, the respectful assurance of the profound esteem and attachment with which I am, &c.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 5—Vol. V.

BALTIMORE, OCT. 1, 1831.

[Vol. XLI. Whole No. 1,048.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY R. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The present number makes a sheet and a half—which, together with the free use of a close type, contains about as much matter as is commonly to be found in about eighty octavo pages—and besides, the articles are more than usually interesting. Still, our files are not much relieved—enough matter remaining prepared, or laid aside for a prompt insertion, to fill two sheets more! And besides, the general anti-masonic convention was held in Baltimore this week, with the general anti-tariff or “free trade” convention at Philadelphia—the proceedings of both which will occupy a large space; probably enough to fill not less than three sheets—yet further, other long statements pertaining to the great “controversy” between the late “dignitaries” of the nation, may be speedily expected,—and the extensive report on the condition of the bank of the United States, an important public paper, remains on hands and there are pretty nearly enough articles in manuscript to fill two sheets! Few persons can apprehend the difficulties that beset us, on such occasions,—or make rightful allowances, for insertions or omissions; but we do the best that we can to please all, whilst well-knowing that all cannot be pleased; and are resolved (as at present supported, and in the hope of yet increase) strength from new subscriptions) that the REGISTER shall have no parallel, at least, no superior, as a book of record, in this or any other country—† and render it, if possible, indispensably necessary to the library of every political economist or enlarged politician, in the quality and quantity of its contents, as well as useful to every class of the community by reason of its multitudinous facts, published and preserved. And we take the present occasion to say, that every article, so far as practicable, is copied from official or original publications, that errors may be avoided. No one, perhaps, has an idea of the amount of omissions which are thus prevented. As an example,—one of the most correct and faithful publishers in the United States, recently left out as much as made half a page of this work of Mr. Crawford’s address to the public—and so was the address published in many other papers, copying from the one just alluded to. We make many errors, though steadily on the watch to prevent them—and such are among the means used.

☞ A great meeting—(the large room in the Musical Fund Hall being full) was held at Philadelphia on the 26th Sept. Joseph Hemphill, chairman, and Matthew Carey and Robert Wain, secretaries, at which, (after the passage of some excellent resolutions) thirty-two gentlemen were appointed delegates to the general convention of agriculturists, mechanics and manufacturers to be held at New York on the 26th inst., to favor the protection of American industry, and suggest such measures as may be thought expedient to secure the home market for domestic producers.

☞ An adjourned meeting was called in Baltimore on Tuesday evening last, to which delegates to attend the convention at Philadelphia—but a very large majority of those present were not favorable to the object, and passed resolutions approbatory of a protecting tariff! The minority, however, 14 or 15 persons, all told, withdrew—and, in retirement, appointed 12 delegates to the “free trade” convention.†

* And also for its cheapness in price, the amount of reading matter being considerable.

† We learn that a public meeting will soon be held in Baltimore, for the appointment of delegates to the general convention to be held at New York, in support of the “American System.” The “free trade” gentlemen at their first meeting were six in number, at the adjourned meeting 15—total 21, including duplicates!

Vol. XLI.—No. 6.

The proceedings of an anti-tariff meeting at Wilmington, N. C. (at which two delegates were appointed to the Philadelphia convention), fill two columns of the “Cape Fear Recorder.” This meeting consisted of sixteen persons, reported to us as follows—3 probable “nullifiers,” 8 anti-tariff men, and 5 friends of the “American System.”

If we had room we should gladly give a full account of all the things above mentioned—but it must be, at least, deferred.

☞ The fourth annual fair of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE will be held at the Masonic Hall, in the city of New York, on the 11th, 12th and 13th October, when premiums of medals and honorary diplomas will be awarded for such articles exhibited, of a domestic growth, as shall be deemed, on account of their excellence, or superiority, entitled to the same.

Artists, manufacturers and others are invited to record the laudable object of the institute, by forwarding, in due season, specimens of their labor and skill in the various departments of their industry. It is believed that the exhibition will be a very large and splendid one.

☞ The letter from Mr. Monroe, concerning the bank of the United States, see page 82, claims a high consideration, for many reasons: and especially, for the active part that he took in the revolution—in discussing the constitution, and his long and faithful services to his country in the most lofty and important stations that the government or people could confer—embracing an entire period of almost fifty years! No man had more full or better opportunities to judge correctly of the principle and operation of the bank of the United States, than Mr. Monroe; and he was also of the original survey construction school—jealous of every approach towards consolidation, or an infringement of the “rights of the states.” Of nearly all men, he least required a hocus-focus operation to make him a republican, “dyed in the wool,” though he had successively encountered the opposition of the “Richmond junta” and the “Albany regency,” what was democracy with one sometimes being federation with the other—each declaring itself the real “Simon Pure.” From the position in which Mr. Monroe was placed during the war, and as president of the United States soon after the restoration of peace, his opinions derive much importance from experience. The difficulties that beset Mr. Madison’s administration in 1813-14 are matters of history, and cannot be effaced by any movement of transient parties. No one was better acquainted with the means and the wants of the government and people of the United States than he—not with the rights and duties which belonged to both. And hence his remarks, like the voice of a venerated father from the grave, appeal powerfully to the reason of the American family. Every part of his plain, but strong, communication is worthy of closest attention; but we like that part most wherein he takes a rock-based stand against what we have regarded as the most dangerous political project ever yet concocted in the laboratory of “malignant” magicians, to secure the subservency of the people of the United States. We mean a treasury-bank, that private interests may be meshed in the net of any “combination” of profligate demagogues, having command over it. With the “retiracy” of its reputed author, it is to be hoped that the project itself will be retired—that things will be allowed to take their regular and natural course in congress, without executive interference—and that the president will not again tender his veto in advance, concerning a subject, which, probably, will not be decided during the term of office for which he has been elected. We hope that the "Richmond Enquirer" will cease to "pity" Mr. Madison; that the "Albany Argus" will not inscribe "federalist" on the tomb of Mr. Monroe, by way of reproach—the latter gentleman having been, in the strict and veritable meaning of the term, an "anti-federalist" nor the "hon-est" and honorable New Hampshire Patriot denounce him as having been as the "great gun of the federal party" and rejoice in his death, as an enemy of the democratic party.

The editor seems to be slowly regaining his former firm health,—and, among other things, expects to make some free remarks on certain publications in the "Albany Argus," and other journals, relative to the present bank of the United States, and the wild substitute that was proposed for it. But in having given up his opposition to the bank on constitutional grounds, and for reasons assigned—it must not be presumed to follow that he thinks it expedient to renew the charter of the bank, just as at present established. In the discussion of that point, he intends to take a part when the season for it arrives—his present chief purpose being to resist and expose a TREASURY BANK, should the project still be entertained, as, for foul political purposes, it seems that it may be.

¶ We have prepared what may be regarded as something like a history of the late insurrectionary movements among the slaves in North Carolina, with some accounts of the effects of them,—but it must be postponed. And so must, also, the account of a succession of dreadful riots at Providence, R. I. originating in the attack of some sailors on the houses of certain persons of color of dissolute character, in which one of the sailors was killed and others wounded, by discharges of fire arms, from the negroes. For several successive days and nights the town was in a terrible tumult—a great multitude of persons being resolved to avenge the killing of the seaman, and destroy all the dwellings occupied by such negroes, which they effected to the pulling down of about 15 houses. The military was called out, and, loath to fire on the mob, was one night driven back, suffering much from stones and other missiles; but on the next night, they fired upon the crowd, and five were killed and four wounded—after which the mob dispersed. Among others, the high-sheriff received a severe blow on the breast from a large stone. The civil and military authorities appear to have acted with all possible moderation, consistent with a preservation of the majesty of the law. A full statement of the affair from the Providence "Journal" shall be presented.

¶ We have a copy of a very long and highly interesting article from the "London Spectator," entitled "an anatomy of taxation." It presents a magnificent commentary on British notions about "Free Trade" and must have a place.

THE ANTI-MASONIC CONVENTION, to nominate a president and vice president of the United States, met in this city on Monday last. A notice of its proceedings, so far as published, will be found in another part of this sheet, and we shall give the remainder at full length, with promptitude, when furnished.

We also insert a correspondence between a committee of the anti-masons in Massachusetts and gov. Lincoln; which will not fail to interest numerous readers.

On neither of these shall we make any remarks that can lead into a general discussion, or the free insertion of speculative articles relating to a subject about which so much has been, and will be, said—and for this great reason, that the field of the Register is already so large that we cannot manage it without great exertion and much extra expense. We did intend to have inserted Mr. Rush's first letter; but that would have begotten the necessity of giving Mr. Miner's reply; we also had off an exposition concerning the same subject by Mr.

Adams, late president of the United States, and had we inserted that, should have been compelled to give the late and severe replication of Mr. Sheppard, certain of whose statements Mr. A. had impeached, and go through with this new controversy; one thing begetting another without seeming end—utterly driving us from the ground we have so long occupied, and monopolizing the contents of our pages with matter of a new character and cast. We cannot attempt to enlarge the field that we occupy. It is one of the most severe and unpleasant of our duties to decide what may be excluded or postponed—and the record-articles must have their old established precedence. This statement, however, is not intended to shut our pages against all such articles of a masonic or anti-masonic aspect as appear necessary to the public intelligence, because of facts stated in them; and we are desirous that a brief history of events should be registered for future instruction.

INDIANA. As the political character of this state is surely not now to be influenced by any remark made by us—and, as we are altogether ignorant of the names of the gentlemen contemplated to fill the vacancy in the senate of the United States—it may not be thought obtrusive to express a wish that our old friend, Judge Test, may receive that important appointment. To the great interests of our property and commerce, and also "American System," there is not a more resolute friend than he is, and few that are better posted-up as to the facts which pertain to these interests—for he has one of those enquiring and persevering minds that will not be satisfied with any thing short of a clear understanding of any subject to which its force may be directed. Mr. Test is not a brilliant man, nor an elegant speaker; but he is better than either—a sound practical man, a real working-man—one of the most industrious that ever was in congress; and, by judicious friends or opponents, we know that he has been respected as one of the most regular and faithful of the members to the business and duties of a representative of the people. There are few of this class of persons in congress, and their example is precious. Their punctual attention to duty has a powerful effect on others, less disposed to labor; and the business of a member of congress is really laborious, if zealously performed. There are hardly thirty real working-men in congress; and the most of these make less "noise in the papers" than some whose not much better than machines to say aye and no—doing nothing but talk; making long speeches to "beggarly accounts of empty" benches. Those who never have had a near view of congress cannot easily believe that many of the loudest and biggest speakers hardly obtain one person to hear them, unless some half-sleeping stranger in the gallery, who know not how else to dispose of his time.

ELECTIONS. The returns of the elections in Vermont shew that Mr. Palmer, anti-masonic, received 12,168 votes for governor, Mr. Allen, nat. rep. 11,250, and Mr. Meech, Jackson, 5,328; and in the congressional district lately represented by Mr. Mallory, Mr. Slade anti-masonic, had 4,614 votes, Mr. Williams, nat. rep. 3,815, Mr. White, (Jackson) 838, and 144 scattering. A third trial to elect a member must be had.

The latest return from Maine, (not yet perfect) gives 27,414 votes for Smith, (Jackson) and 21,401 for Goodenow, (anti) as governor of the state. The same counties and towns last year gave 29,091 for Smith, and Mr. Huntoon, his opponent, 27,653—shewing a great falling off of votes, in respect to the latter party.

"NEGRO COLLEGE." The proceedings had at New Haven, in relation to a project to establish a college in that city for the education of colored persons, obtains uncommon interest because of recent events. The acts of the mayor and citizens of New Haven will speak for themselves; but a due regard to that impartiality for which we declare that our course may be distinguished, has induced us to give the remarks of S. E. Cornish, though altogether opposed to the institution which it is contemplated to establish.

From early life, the writer of this has been an ardent friend of emancipation, and truly zealous to improve the condition of the people of color. That certain might be rescued from unlawful bondage, he has expended much time and some money, and more than once encountered considerable degree of personal hazard—being generally inclined to take sides with the weaker party. He has also frequently contributed to assist in the education of free colored persons, and hundreds of times stood forward as the friend of such, in their emergencies—when a deed or a word in their favor was much needed; and he has the pleasure to bear testimony in behalf of the probity of many of those whom he has endeavored to serve—but yet is opposed to the projected college, not more because of the ground taken by the citizens of New Haven, than from a settled belief that any thing beyond a plain education—a knowledge of reading and writing, and of the elementary rules of arithmetic, must prove injurious to persons of color, in the present, and, (he fears), irremediable state of society in our country; even in those parts of the union most favorable to the subjects of this notice. For they are every where a separated and excluded class, and no merit in themselves, however exalted, can relieve them of their condition. The rudest and most ignorant white persons who come among us, in a short period of time, at farthest in a generation, may be reformed, as it were, from the lowest caste, by good conduct; but these, and simply because of the color of their skin, are shut out from those associations which chiefly embellish and adorn and advance human nature and life, by the force of their good conduct, leave their own grade, they stand like isolated beings, and their immediate descendants generally slide back to the class from whence they proceeded. Such is the effect of the prejudice, habits and feelings of the white population, composing so large a majority of the inhabitants of the United States, even in those sections wherein it would seem most likely that such associations might be allowed as would tend to a reduction of such prejudice and feeling, and permit those amalgamations which first soften, and then totally banish, those great distinctions which naturally exist between accomplished and highly civilized persons, and mere animals, (such as the slaves of Russia), which have the form of men, but without any natural or insuperable obstruction to their advancement—though the latter, because of their ignorance and former want of motive to acquire knowledge and practice virtue, may be ever so far behind the free blacks, generally, in a correct understanding of their rights and duties.

During the last summer, I fell-in with the family of a colored gentleman of a neighboring city, as much respected for his private worth and correct conduct as any other individual; and it so happened, that I had an opportunity to converse with these persons—two well dressed and intelligent young women and two young men. The manners and deportment of the whole were modest and entirely correct; and, except because of their complexion—(supported by the private reputation and personal independence of their father), might have entered a high grade of society with approbation; but it seemed to me—that, while their intellectual advancement, or genteel deportment, rendered them but small service out of their class, it unfitted them for ordinary associations with those among whom they were condemned to remain; and it was hard to determine whether pleasure or pain prevailed in my mind, while I contemplated this interesting family. But I certainly desired they might be so placed, that their improvement should not be in vain. It was evident—though I observed no personal disrespect shown to them (but cruelly alone could have extended it)—that they felt themselves restrained and unhappy, because, that in the steam boat or stage, they were cast into collisions with individuals, who, they feared, might be offended by their presence, however harmlessly they conducted themselves. And, on the whole, I came to the melancholy conclusion, that the happiness of these young people had been rather diminished, than increased, because of the particular advantages which they possessed. Perhaps, I formed a very erroneous judgment—but with these views of the subject, which forced themselves upon me, however unwilling I was to entertain them, it would appear that the establishment of a college, like that proposed at New Haven, would be inexpedient on several accounts—and especially, for the reason that it would unfit its inmates for association with persons of their own color, without doing any thing to relieve them of their caste, in the United States. These people have the same natural and unalienable right of residence, that any of us can claim for ourselves—there is no power that can justly expel them because of their complexion; the law might as well define the color of men's eyes as that of their skins, for preference or proscription but so it is, that such discriminatory laws, on the plea, if not ground of necessity, prevail in all places where negro slavery exists; and it has a moral power, nearly equal to the force of statute law, in every part of our country—though slavery never has existed, or has long been abolished, in several of the states. However beautiful may be the theory—we cannot exclude the facts from consideration, that a barrier is placed between the white and colored population which NEITHER CAN PASS. We may easily agree that this should not be so. BUT IT IS SO. The wildest declaimer in favor of the rights of the blacks, will not give his daughter in marriage to one of them, that she may raise up colored grand children for him. These things should give another direction to the good will that we have towards colored persons, and teach the latter to forward it. We disclaim all idea of force, as applicable to a removal of the free blacks—but surely, much may be done, if suggested and prosecuted in a mild and sufficient spirit, to induce them to seek a new home—where virtue and talent may command and receive that degree of respect which belongs to them. As a preparatory step, let a liberal appropriation be made by congress to improve and defend the present colony in Africa—or, if that be unhealthy, to provide a new and better location, elsewhere—that those willing to emigrate may do so under favorable circumstances. If safety should attend the establishment for a few years—it would do its own work, without much aid or interference from either the government or people of the United States, except by way of encouragement and occasional support—and gather strength as it proceeded. The success of a few worthy people of color would draw thousands to them—and these attract others, until, through the increased facilities of navigation and commerce, (the fruit of a prosperous industry), a new nation of intelligent freemen might be established, willing and capable of regarding the rights of others and defending their own. While these things were in progress, we should heartily rejoice in the liberal education of young persons of color—for then they would have an opportunity to obtain rank unimpeded by prejudice, and confer the benefits of their knowledge on others, for the common good of mankind. But at present—the public funds or private means of benevolent persons, should, in our opinion, be directed to the single object of providing or preparing an asylum for free persons of color; and we hope that, in the emergency of the occasion, our southern fellow citizens may review their constitutional scruples, and take hold with the people of the north to relieve the United States of a class of its population which is, at once, the disgrace and regret of every enlightened freeman. It will require many years of success to accomplish the great work, and the right of property, as acknowledged in slaves, cannot be disturbed—but it will be pleasant, indeed, and glorious, to look forward to the time when this fair republic shall be inhabited by a homogeneous people, having no adverse interests or disputed rights, to agitate and convulse the public mind or endanger the public safety. The general decrease of white persons, and increase of blacks, in the lower country of the southern states, has a fearful aspect—and “something must be done,” to prevent a calamity to which it is manifest we are rapidly approaching. It is of no use that we shut our eyes—the sun shines whether we observe it or not, and time flies though we take no note of its passage; and the event, which all men believe will come, must come, unless prevented by an energy suited to a crisis so important.

MAJOR BIDDLE. It is mournful to reflect, that this gentleman, who, as well as Mr. Pettis, was lately killed in the terrible duel which they fought at St. Louis, was one of the most gallant and accomplished officers in the army of the United States during the late war—a great favorite with the generals commanding on the Canada frontier—always among the first to commence and the last to retire from battle. The despatches of generals Lewis, Scott, &c. made frequent, and always honorable, mention of him.

MR. THOMAS RITCHIE. In March 1830, the Richmond Enquirer, in referring to the dissolved unit, whose recreant members are now denounced in no measured terms in its columns, enthusiastically exclaimed:

"Never has a president, since Jefferson, been surrounded by such able counsellors, as our present venerable chief magistrate."

The same paper, in August, 1831, (last month only) referring to the present cabinet, can find no other measure of its excellence, than that applied to its immediate predecessors. Look here—

"The present cabinet is the ablest that has been formed since the administration of Mr. Jefferson."

The preceding is copied from the New York American—we add what follows:

A day or two before Mr. Ingham resigned—(as the "eagle of Bagdad" went into "retirement," but obtaining a certificate of good conduct in office), Mr. Thomas Ritchie trusted that Mr. Ingham would "neither be removed nor retire, without good cause, independently of any considerations." [See last volume, page 213]. And on the very day of Mr. Ingham's resignation, Mr. Thomas Ritchie pronounced (see page 165) the story about the president's intending to remove Mr. Ingham to be utterly false."

In his paper of the 3rd May, Mr. Thomas Ritchie, speaking of the dissolution of the cabinet, (see last vol. page 178), said—

"No pains too, are spared—no insidious insinuation is wanting, to rouse the suspicions and resentments of Messrs. Branch and Ingham—and eventually, should the opposition succeed in this design, appeals will be made to the state pride of North Carolina and Pennsylvania!—But it is not possible, that this insidious (again!) plan can succeed. Mr. Branch and Mr. Ingham will see through it, and will despise it."†

And what has he not said since, to disparage the character and services of Messrs. Ingham and Branch!

Another instance of Mr. Thomas Ritchie's consistency. In the "Enquirer" of the 3rd of May, he said—"Their [the opposition] great plan of sowing the seeds of strife between the friends of Calhoun and Van Buren is broken up [!].—Van Buren has withdrawn to retirement; perhaps is going across the Atlantic! (That is, a "retirement" from the office of secretary of state to that of minister to England!) And a few days after, between the 3rd and 16th May, Mr. Thomas Ritchie speaking of Mr. Van Buren, said—"we hope he is now going into private life," &c. What has he said of the disappointment of his "hope"—how reconciled that with his announcement that Mr. Van Buren would "perhaps cross the Atlantic?"

But friend Thomas will always be on what seems the strongest side—if it permitted; and, by his adroitness, renders curses into blessings, or blessings into curses, or remove and create misadventures by newly-nibbling his pen. Had Mr. Adams extended his hand to friend Thomas—he would have kissed it respectfully, and never thought of "light-houses in the skies!"

COUNT DE LEON, mentioned in our last, it is said, in the "Albany Advertiser," has brought with him from five to seven millions of dollars—"a sum sufficient to turn the balance of exchange with Europe in favor of the United States;" and yet exchange has just had a sudden rise, and is now at from 10½ to 11 per cent. advance, or about two per cent. above the true par;—our value, placed on silver, being measured by the British standard which is gold. This has caused a brisk and very injurious demand for dollars—to be shipped off. "We shall see."

THE CUSTOM HOUSE BOND AT CHARLESTON. The attempt to avoid the payment of a certain bond due at the Charleston custom house, because of the unconstitutionality of the tariff laws, has, of course, failed before the court and jury. Particulars hereafter.

* Denied by Mr. R.

‡ That is, they will see through the insidious insinuations of insinulators!

"A FLOURISH OF TRUMPETS." From the Charleston Mercury Sept. 19th. Our distinguished fellow citizen, the hon. Geo. McDuffie, arrived in this city on Saturday evening last. He attends as counsel for Messrs. Maszyk and Holmes, in the case of the custom house bond, which those gentlemen refused to pay for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the existing tariff. As a tribute of respect to Mr. McDuffie, he was met at the new bridge ferry by a large and respectable mounted escort of the state rights and free trade party, who conducted him to the residence of governor Hamilton, where his excellency received the party. The attendance of Mr. McDuffie, at this insubstantial season of the year, not only involves a great sacrifice of his personal convenience, but also some hazard to his health; and the enthusiasm of our citizens in welcoming him as they did, was therefore but a just return for his generosity and public spirit, independently of his other and very eminent claims upon public gratitude and esteem. The case, it is understood, will be commenced this day in the district court, which will doubtless be crowded. The anxiety and interest of our people are highly excited on the subject, and fully correspond to the vital importance of the principles involved. Mr. McDuffie's deserved celebrity as a statesman and a jurist, would, at any time, and under the most ordinary circumstances, command popular attention and respect, but never perhaps has there been greater anxiety, in any place, or upon any occasion, to hear an orator or lawyer, than there now is, in this city, to witness the effort which this able and patriotic man is about to make, to arrest, if possible, even in the federal courts, the usurpations and oppressions of the federal government. It is hazardous but little therefore to repeat, that the court will probably be crowded beyond all precedent.

NEW PARTY NAME. We observe an address from the "Democratic anti-masonic convention" of York county, Pennsylvania.

THE MINISTER FOR RUSSIA. It has been stated that Mr. Buchanan received the appointment of minister to Russia, some considerable time ago—but the question is started, has Mr. Randolph resigned?

THE REV. DR. IVES was consecrated bishop of the Protestant episcopal church in North Carolina, at Philadelphia, on the 22d ult. in Trinity church—bishop White presiding and the bishops Underdonk assisting, with many other clergy attending, and a large concourse of spectators.

CITY BANK OF NEW YORK. We noticed in our last the arrest of Parkinson, an Englishman, and two women, as being connected with the robbery of this bank. The fellow has made disclosures which led to the recovery of money and securities to the amount of thirty three thousand dollars, in the hope that, as he could not escape punishment, he might thereby mitigate it.—Among the property regained was 500 doubloons. The whole was curiously concealed. A considerable part of the balance yet unaccounted for, has, probably, been dissipated.

PIRACY. The English brig Maria, of Liverpool, was captured in May last, off the coast of Africa by a pirate, and all of her crew, except two or three Kroomen, murdered, at once. The Kroomen finally escaped. The pirate vessel is a brig, with a company of about 100 men, made up of many nations. This set of the pirates seems to have been in retaliation for a partner-vessel which was attacked from the British ship Primrose, the greater part of whose crew was killed in the fight.

"HONORABLE ACCOUNTABILITY."—The following article from the Washington "Globe" of the 22d ult. is in close-keeping with some of the matters stated by Mr. Berrien.—The object of the editor was to account for Mr. Eaton's departure before Mr. B's replication appeared:

"Does Mr. Berrien suppose that an injured man, after calling his assailants to an honorable accountability under which they cowered—after having invited them to make proof in support of the charges which they propagated by insinuations and artifices—after having given at large his own views of the questions which they brought before the people by their publications, is bound still to stay at Washington city, neglecting his private business, to be baited by the noise and fury of those who will meet no fair or honorable issue? The public does not expect this of major Eaton. Mr. Berrien therefore, is now given to understand, that major Eaton has done with him and the paper war. He will not notice again his public appeals.

"If there be any thing, however in the publication of major Eaton, which Mr. Berrien may think wrongs his honor, we feel at liberty to assure him that major Eaton, although he has left Washington, will not hesitate to return to make all proper amends."

From the same of Sept. 27, as extracted from a letter from Baltimore, dated the 25th—the authorship of which some have ascribed—we know not how justly, to major E. himself

"Major Eaton is still detained here by the severe indisposition of his lady. Although not yet able to be up, she is convalescent, and the major expects, in a few days, to resume his journey."

"It is a little surprising that Mr. Berrien, who was so very willing, at a proper time, to grant the expiation demanded by major Eaton, has not given him notice that the accepted time has arrived. It is presumed that those 'higher duties' which restrained his chivalrous and willing spirit, are now performed. A few hours would bring him to this place, and a few lines would show whether major Eaton was in earnest or whether his calls were mere bravado."

EMIGRANTS. The Pennsylvania Register states, that in one vessel lately arrived at Philadelphia from Havre, came 26 German or Swiss families—consisting of the parents, and 103 children of various ages—of whom 28, or 14 pairs, are TWINS; and of these twins six pairs are the production of three families. The following are their ages:—1 pair 4 years—1 pair 10 years (same family)—1 pair 2½—1 pair 4½ (another family),—1 pair 1 year—1 pair 4 years, (3d family),—1st pair, 1 male, 1 female—3d pair, both females—3d pair, both males—4th, 1 male, 1 female—5th and 6th pairs, all females. Of the 14 pairs, 5 pairs were all male—5 pairs were female, and 4 pairs were male and female.

Three other vessels from the same place had each two pairs, and one other vessel four pairs on board.

REFORM IN GREAT BRITAIN. We have many papers on hand which express an opinion, that a reform of parliament will speedily be followed by other reforms yet more important, in the church and state, and a belief is freely given out, that the nobility will be swept away! The fact is, that as other nations fall into the habit of supplying themselves with manufactured goods, and so reduce the monopoly which England has enjoyed, the ability of her people to pay the present heavy rates and duties is diminished, and the time must come when such impositions cannot be paid. THEN THERE WILL BE REVOLUTION. The looms of the United States are doing more to break down the power of Great Britain, than an hundred ships of the line could accomplish. There must be an end to all things, and surely is a limit to oppression.

FRANCE. The military availability of France may be, in some degree, appreciated by the late fact, that an army of 500,000 men was put in motion for Belgium in twenty four hours. Two of the king's sons, as colonels, marched with it. The males of the royal family there, will not be respected unless they possess military habits, and take every opportunity to evince them and make a display of personal courage. It is a general saying that "a good heart excuses many errors." In France it may also be said, military grace and prowess will excuse many faults. Not that the king's sons have faults.

The king of France was called from his bed by the express from Belgium with the news of the Dutch war. He arose and immediately commenced giving orders for the maintenance of the independence of the new nation.

MEXICO. From Vera Cruz letters have been received dated 16th of August, by a respectable house of this city, stating that a conducta was on the way from the city of Mexico to Vera Cruz with $1,280,000, escorted only by fifty horsemen,—a circumstance which proves the perfect tranquility enjoyed in the republic. [Phil. Gaz.]

FROM BUENOS AYRES we have an account of the defeat of general Hierrosilla—of the death of general Vilafane—of the success of general Quiroga—of the capture and death of colonel Echagui—of the surrender of colonel Huelo, the father of general Paz—of the resignation of general Echagui—of the correspondence of general Alvarado, general La Madrid, general D. J. Lopez, and general E. Lopez, and of the federal party and of the unitarian party—and many other things, shewing the blessings conferred by military rule. We wish to both parties the success of the "Kilkenny cats," that the people may have peace.

CUSTOM HOUSE SEIZURE IN MONTREAL. A Montreal paper informs us, that a system of fraud which is supposed to have been practised for a considerable time, in bringing goods into Canada from the United States, has lately been discovered. The practice has been to enter goods, paying an enormous duty at prices much lower than their intrinsic worth, and by this means evade the payment of the greater portion of the duties. A large quantity of clocks, &c. were lately seized and condemned to public sale, on account of their having been entered at less than one fifth of their value; the proprietor, however, compromised the matter, paid duties on the full value, and cost of seizure, and on these terms was permitted to take possession of his goods.

[The important fact is disclosed in the preceding, that manufactures of the United States are sent to the Canadian market, to contend with British manufactures.]

APPEARANCE OF A NEW ISLAND IN THE MEDITERRANEAN. The Messenger des Chambres, contains an interesting article, of which the following is a translation:—Toward 11 o'clock of the 10th of July, 1831, captain John Corrao, commander of the brig Theresine, going from Trapani to Girgenti, in Sicily, at the distance of about 20 miles from Cape St. Mark, perceived, at the distance of a gun shot, a mass of water which arose 60 feet above the level of the sea, and presented a circumference of nearly 400 fathoms—a smoke proceeded from it, exhaling an odour of sulphur.—The preceding day, in the Gulf of Trois Fontaines, he had seen a great quantity of dead fish and black matter floating on the water, and he heard a noise like that of thunder, which the captain attributes to a volcanic eruption. He continued his voyage to Girgenti; and all the time that he was occupied in lading his ship, he saw a thick smoke rise incessantly from the same point, before which he arrived on the 16th, on his return from Girgenti. A new spectacle was then presented to him—namely, a tract of land, of the same circumference as that of the mass of water which he had remarked in his first passage. This island (which we shall call Corrao, from the name of him who saw it formed) is elevated about 12 feet above the surface of the sea; it has in the middle a kind of plain, and the crater of a volcano, whence a burning lava is seen to proceed during the night. The island is bordered by a girdle of smoke. The sounding all around the island gives a depth of 106 fathoms; the meridian of Paris. Such is the relation of capt. Corrao himself, who entered the port of Marseilles the 30th of last July. The volcano has also been seen by several captains going from Malta and Targanrock to Genoa, and the pilots have learnt from a fisherman, that, on the day of the eruption of this volcano, he had seen a brig perish, and also a fishing boat, his companion; and that he considered his own escape miraculous.

[This island must be the same as noticed from the ship Crawford—some account of which was given in our last, page 71.]

we are glad to perceive that the contributions of philanthropic institutions are in no wise lessened. receipts during the month of August amount to $537, including a magnificent donation of $2,000 from a gentleman in the state of New York.

In announcing this extraordinary liberality, the editor of the Repository very justly remarks—"What might not be effected for Africa and mankind, were all our wealthy men to imitate so honorable, so christian, and so splendid an example."

Another name is also added to the list of subscribers on the plan of Gerrit Smith, who deserves, and we hope will receive, the lasting gratitude, both of the African and the philanthropist, for being the first to set so noble an example of generosity.

We learn from the Repository, that at a meeting of the board of managers of the American Colonization society, August 19, 1831, on motion of R. Smith, esq. the following preamble and resolution were adopted:

"Whereas, information has been communicated to the board that collections to a large amount have been made in the western country, and whereas, it appears from the statements of the secretary that the funds of the society will justify an expedition being forthwith made, there-

Resolved, That the sum of $5,000 be appropriated for an expedition from the western states, and that Mr. Finley be authorized to draw on the treasurer for the purpose of fitting out and paying the expenses of such expedition."

SMEETING OF IRON. Heated air for blast furnaces has been used for some time at the Clyde iron works, and with great success. Experiments have proved that iron is smelted by heated air, with three-fourths of the quantity of coal required when cold air, that is, air not artificially heated, is employed for that purpose. It is supposed that this improvement will accomplish a saving in the cost of the iron in great Britain, to the amount of 200,000*l*. [London paper.]

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The troops of Donna Maria, of Portugal, at Tereira, lately made a descent upon and subdued the island of St. Michael, after some pretty smart fighting. The Miguelist soldiers had been sent to Fayal.

The London Globe says—Accounts have been received from Warsaw, which state that the Polish government have received, for the first time, an official communication from the French government, in which they advise and recommend to the Polish commander-in-chief not to risk a general battle with the Russians, and at the same time the French government will make every endeavor to mediate for the settlement of the affairs of Poland. The above account states that 270 pieces of cannon are placed on the fortifications of Warsaw, which is now rendered almost impregnable.

English papers to the 21st August inclusive, have been received at New York. No important events had occurred since our last advices—the following is a brief notice of the chief things mentioned: The Dutch troops had left Belgium, but the French yet remained, because Leopold was fearful of a second invasion. The "Perrier ministry," as was expected, because of the assistance afforded to Belgium, would remain in office—now having a large majority in the French chamber of deputies. The wheat harvest in England had been a fine one. The reform bill was not yet passed through—the details are difficult and contested. The question of slavery in the West Indies had been touched in parliament—nothing decided. Certain movements of Prussia had caused lord Palmerston to address a sharp note to the Pr. cabinet. A very good understanding prevailed between France and England. The debates in the French chambers had been very warm—but the excitement appeared to have subsided. The movements of the Russians in Poland betrayed a conscious weakness or much indecision—no important event had happened, though a great battle was still expected: the Poles do not seem to fear it. A part of the French fleet yet remained in the Tagus—Don Miguel was dungeoning hundreds more of the unhappy people of Lisbon—he seems fearful of a design against his life, as well he may. A good many lives had been lost between the Papists and the Liberals, of the Roman states—the soldiers had divided between the parties: a large body of the troops refused to take a new oath to the pope, and march against the patriots of Romagna.

We have not room for details.

MR. BERRIEN'S REPLY. For the National Intelligencer.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The multiplied misrepresentations which are contained in the recent publication made by Mr. Eaton, claim from me a reply. I make it with unfeigned reluctance, well aware that the discharge of this duty to myself, and to the public, will expose me to a repetition of the wanton abuse of a press, which professes to speak in this matter by the authority of the chief magistrate. No man would voluntarily enter into such a controversy. If I do not shrink from it, it is because I feel that I am called to this act of necessary self-defense, by considerations which I may not be permitted to disregard.

From the pressure of circumstances, which I did not contribute to produce, and had not the power to control, I was some time since under the necessity of addressing you. Let me for a moment call your attention to the state of things at that time, that you may more distinctly understand my present position. I had no agency in bringing about the dissolution of the late cabinet, and was desirous of avoiding the controversies, which it was but too probable would follow in the train of that event. The law was not weak enough to suppose the number would attach any paramount importance to the retirement from office of my colleagues and myself; but I was equally assured, and the result has confirmed my conviction, that their just indignation would be excited by a knowledge of the causes which led to that event. Whatever sympathy might arise in relation to the right of the president, to exercise his own absolute and uncontrolled will, in the selection and dismissal of his cabinet, the American people would practically recognize the principle, that the power to confer office, or to reclaim it, is but a trust delegated by themselves, to be useful for the common benefit, not under the impulse of personal, and still less of unworthy motives. It was highly improbable, moreover, that the true nature of this transaction could be concealed from the scrutiny of an intelligent people. The immediate community of Washington—the members of both houses of congress, and private citizens from various parts of the union, who had mingled in society here, from the time of the organization of that cabinet, down to the period of its dissolution, had seen enough to awaken a spirit of enquiry, which would naturally extend to the people at large. While, however, I held myself bound to answer any proper call for explanation, I was most anxious to avoid intrusion upon the public, and to guard myself from being, as far as a just respect would permit, any of the controversies which might grow out of it.

When shrinking from the justly apprehended indignation of the American people, it was resolved to put the defence of this measure upon the bold and reckless denial of facts, which were notorious in this community, and beyond it—when the official paper of the government, professing to act by the authority of the president, had avouched my name to give sanction to a statement, which I knew to be untrue, I felt myself called upon by considerations, which no honorable man could disregard, to bear my humble testimony to the truth. In the performance of this unweelcome duty, I limited myself to a narrative of the facts, which had been drawn into controversy, and to a brief vindication of my own conduct in those particulars, in which it had been arraigned. I knew to what I subjected myself, by this act of necessary self-defence. Absolved by the limited range of my official duties, from participation in most of the exciting occurrences of the day—standing aloof from the intrigues which were represented to exist, and having no motive to misrepresent the truth, it was foreseen, and such has been the result, that this statement would receive the confidence of a just and intelligent community. The consequences were obvious even to those who relied most implicitly on the personal popularity of the president. What then was to be done? In its essential facts, the statement was beyond the reach of controversy. It was only the mode employed by every effort to contradict it. An impotent attempt was made to represent the transactions which it detailed, as unimportant, insignificant, unworthy the attention of the American people. Such an effort to pervert the moral sense of such a people, could not succeed. The sacredness of solemnity in the exercise of the domestic executive, had been rudely assailed, and they could not deem lightly of a despotism like this.

The alternative was to silence the witness, or to destroy the effect of his testimony, by assailing his reputation. To accomplish this, a series of measures, having the same end in view, have been steadily pursued towards me. I have been the object of a system of bullying and vituperation, alike in its nature and in its aim, and disgraceful to the immediate actors, and to those who having the power, have not interposed to repress it.

Retiring from a responsible station in the government, under the assurance of the continued confidence of the president, and with an expression of his regret for the necessity, which demanded our separation—acquired by him of all imputation of impropriety, either official, or individual—here at the seat of national government—after having been dragged before the public to maintain an issue, involving my private honor—one which had been forced upon me, under the avowed authority of the chief magistrate, I have been calumniated and nudged by those who speak at his bidding, and are silenced by his nod. If excited by feelings which no man may repress, I have at any time been tempted to indulge them, a little freedom has sufficed to convince me, what it is that my duty to myself and to the public requires at my hands. That duty consists simply in maintaining the cause of truth before the American people; and, uninfluenced by rivalry, and unswayed by menace, in exposing to them the real condition of this community, in which the reign of terror is emphatically established. I am not indifferent to consequences; but, whatever they may be, the voice of warning shall not be withheld.

I shall be compelled to speak of Mr. Eaton, the late secretary of war, whose multiplied misrepresentations have made it necessary for me to address you. I shall do this, however, from a consideration of his official connection with the late cabinet, and from the belief, that, although retired from office, his situation for all the purposes of this discussion remains unchanged. As a private individual, he has placed himself beyond the pale of honorable controversy. He has sought and evaded it, when the opportunity was afforded to him of gratifying his resentment. If I employ a moment to the exposure of his conduct, it is not because I can derive pleasure from contemplating the humiliation which he has voluntarily sought, and still less to vindicate myself from the fillings of abuse, with which he has filled the columns of the Globe. No—I have a better purpose. In the discharge of my duty as a citizen, I would exhibit to the American people that system of calumny, and menace, which prevails at the seat of the national government, under the immediate view of its highest functionary, and in which his most confidential friend is the promotor and principal actor.

Very soon after my return from Georgia in June last, when, from the tenor of his resignation, it was ascertained that I would not join in the attempt to conceal the real causes of the dissolution of the late cabinet, the movement of the cabal at this place were directed against me. I did not feel that it was my duty to enter into an exposition of those causes, and I abstained from doing so; but I could not consent to become a party to the effort which was made to conceal them; and by placing my own resignation on the ground of the president's mere will, I gave a distinct negative to the misrepresentations of that transaction, by which it had been attempted to delude the public. At this time Mr. Eaton, availing himself of a publication in a paper, with which I had no other connection than that of a subscriber, called upon me peremptorily to avow that my family had refused to associate with him. It was not the mere publication, it was the statement which I was called upon to disavow, in terms sufficiently abrupt (without any reference to what had just occurred with Mr. Ingham), clearly to indicate what was to follow. Every man will understand, on reading that note, that Mr. Eaton had determined to call me to the field, in the event of my avowal of the statement of which he complained. What other purpose could have induced such a demand, couched in such terms? I certainly so understood it, and shared the surprise of others, on reading in the conciliatory reply, which he thought proper to address to me, in answer to my avowal of the offensive statement, a distinct waiver of his original demand.

This correspondence is before the public; but a moment's consideration of it will serve to show, that the object of this rude and peremptory demand was to deter me from an exposure of the truth; and that even, according to the notions of what the world calls honor, the failure of Mr. Eaton to prosecute it, when I had distinctly avowed the offence of which he complained, took from him all shadow of right, thereafter, to urge any claim upon me. By making this demand, he asserted that the statement was offensive to him. By the manner in which he received my avowal of its truth, he manifested his disposition to submit to what he had thus treated as an aggression upon his feelings, without having received any atonement for it.

But the nature of the offence of which Mr. Eaton complained, will still more conclusively prove that this was an empty menace, conceived in the vain hope of deterring me from exposing the real nature of the transaction, which was then engaging the public attention. The statement in the Telegraph was that my family had refused to associate with him. When in answer to his demand, I avowed the truth of that statement, my offence consisted in the simple assertion of this fact. Was this a ground, on which to call a man to mortal combat? I had a perfect right to refuse this association. Mr. Eaton admits it. I offered no violence to his feelings by a saying that I had done so, as the terms of his reply very clearly prove. Why then was the demand made? It was an idle bravado, the object of which was to obtain such an answer, as might be perverted to his purposes, and in every event to admonish me, that he was armed, and in the field. Thereafter, I was to act under the influence of this salutary caution.

This first attempt was a manifest failure. An opportunity had been afforded to Mr. Eaton, to carry out his purposes, so far as I was the object of them. Whether it arose from a faltering spirit, or from his own conviction of the absurdity of his demand, he did not avail himself of it. The fact that such a correspondence existed, soon became known to the public, and they were not slow in expressing their view of it. It became necessary therefore to Mr. Eaton, to make an effort to retrieve his affairs, and certain expressions in my former address were seized upon for this purpose. It is this correspondence, which he says has eventuated in a determination on my part to shrink from responsibility, and it is that determination, imputed to me, in utter disregard of truth, which has called forth the rivalry which embelishes his appeal to the public. That public shall have an opportunity to decide for themselves, on a full view of the transaction, which Mr. Eaton has misrepresented, whether he has any legitimate claim to the triumph of which he boasts—whether, on the contrary, he has not presented to them a statement, wholly devoid of truth, in relation to a transaction, in which his conduct has been distinguished by every thing rather than his chivalry.

Mr. Eaton's second demand upon me, was founded upon certain expressions in my former address. The alleged offence consisted in the statement, that "the announcement of the names of the intended cabinet, seemed to me to present an insupportable barrier to my acceptance of office—that I thought, I foresaw clearly the evils which have too obviously resulted from this selection"—and that my ultimate determination to enter the cabinet, was founded on the belief, that the president would "speedily see and correct the evil." Assuming that the objection here referred to, applied exclusively to himself and to the relations of his name to the community in which he lived, which is neither warranted by the language of the address, nor consistent with the fact, Mr. Eaton thought himself authorized, without further enquiry, to make an instant demand of satisfaction. So absurd a pretension put forth by any man, and even for the first time, might have been promptly repelled by a simple denial of the right to make it. If I believed that the relations of Mr. Eaton's name to the community of Washington, would be productive of embarrassment, I had an unquestionable right to allow this consideration to have its proper influence upon my conduct. If called upon to state the motives to that conduct, I had as manifest a right to avow it. I am quite sure, on reflection, that public opinion would not have tolerated the acceptance of a call, so utterly groundless, whatever the circumstances under which it was made.

But Mr. Eaton had another difficulty to contend with. He had already made and waived a demand for an offence, which it was one, certainly included this. Should he still strive to speak of the relations of his family to the community of Washington, as an evil which was likely to embarrass the operations of the cabinet, it was much more to me to declare that such had been my own view of the subject, that I had refused to permit my family to associate with him—and that I had declared my determination to retire from office, rather than submit to such a requisition. Yet to this declaration, Mr. Eaton had previously submitted, and after considering it for a week, he had withdrawn the request. Was I bound then to await the ebb and flow of his sentiments, or of his disposition to indulge them? to conform myself to the fiftful humors of a man, whose purposes were thus absurd and vacillating? I do not mean to say, that I would regulate my conduct by the requirements of any arbitrary system of honor, when these conflicted with contradiction, that even according to the maxims of that code, to which he had appealed, Mr. Eaton had forfeited all claim to call upon me, by his previous submission to that which he had treated as an offence, and for which he had received no atonement.

The time selected by Mr. Eaton for making this second demand, coupled with the refusal to receive the answer, which was transmitted to him, furnish, however, the most conclusive evidence of the real spirit in which that call was made; and prove, whatever might have been the hopes of those who had connived or counsented to this proceeding, that, with him, it was a mere bravado. The wrong of which Mr. Eaton complained in his note of the 17th June, was avowed, and unstoned for. In this posture of things, he waited until my appeal to the public had placed me in a situation which, until I could disengage myself, would necessarily prevent me from turning again to answer my minor claim. Under the alleged authority of the president of the United States, an issue had been tendered to and forced upon me. Called to speak the truth, I had pledged myself to a statement of facts in the face of the American people, from the support of which I could not suffer myself to be diverted by any other consideration. The redemption of that pledge was due to the public, whose decision I had been compelled to invoke—and to my own honor. It was impossible to force it upon whom, and in what particulars, that statement could be assailed; and it was my duty to be at my post, and in readiness to defend it. Under such circumstances, to have turned aside to answer the call of Mr. Eaton, would, I am now satisfied, have subjected me to universal reprobation. A short time might probably suffice, to enable me to tell my duty to the public in this matter; but until I was relieved, it was my first duty. It is impossible to believe that Mr. Eaton could have been insensible to these considerations. He was on the spot; deeply engaged most of them. He chose this precise point of time to present his second demand. He did more, his friend, who is presumed to have acted in conformity to his instructions, refused to answer an answer, which, far from demanding an answer, gave him the most distinct assurance that it should be promptly attended to, as soon as the duties in which I was then engaged had been fulfilled; and with a knowledge of this fact, Mr. Eaton, reckless of the exposure which awaited him, has asserted, in the face of truth, that I had shunned responsibility.

If the circumstances in which I stood before the public, did not impose upon him an imperative obligation to abstain from making his call at such a moment, still the assurance which was offered to him, upon one which a brave man seeking honorable combat could not have refused. The refusal to accept it, was therefore a palpable evasion of the combat, which he affected to invite.

The spirit which was manifested by the mere fact of making this demand, under such circumstances, was calculated, however, to produce feelings which I could not at the moment repress. Connecting it with the repeated attacks of the government press, I saw in it a ruthless determination to sacrifice my honor or my

Mr. I looked beyond the immediate agent in this transaction, and was resolved to disappoint the hopes of its contrivers. In the vindication of truth and my own honor, I felt that I had the power to do so; and pressed by an unseen hand, I thought that the moment had arrived when I had become necessary to exert it. The question to be decided was, whether a system of lawless violence should prevail unchecked, at the seat of the national government, in the face of the American people? It was my misfortune to be called to test that question, with such a man, and under such circumstances, but it was not my fault. I sent accordingly for a gentleman in whom I had confidence, and communicated to him when it had become necessary to exert it, necessary for me to pursue. His remonstrances against it were instant and decided. After a free conversation on the subject, it was agreed to refer Mr. Eaton's note, confidentially, to certain gentlemen who were mentioned, together with my own view of the matter, and with it the question, whether I could have carefully accept his call. They answered, stating that they had carefully perused my note, Mr. Eaton's, and the communication referred to by him, (my former address), and then added, "we cannot perceive any just cause for the call now made on you; and under any circumstances it is our decided opinion, that in the present state of the controversy, in which you are engaged before the public, you could not with any propriety accept his invitation." "If I had had the slightest doubt as to avoid Mr. Eaton's resentment, here was an ample opportunity of doing so. Here were gentlemen who were impartial on this question; men whose courage, whose high sense of honor, whose general standing in society entitled them to be heard in a matter of this sort, and who had given a prompt and decided negative to his demand. Looking to the absurd nature of that demand, it could not be that this opinion was dictated by the deliberate judgment of these gentlemen, and that I should have been fully justified in giving to it an unqualified refusal. I was, however, to refuse Mr. Eaton's call. I erred, perhaps, in not doing so; but it is not the error which he imputes to me. I did not return an argumentative labored reply to a plain and simple demand." Putting out of that controversy certain matters which he had unnecessarily introduced into it, I referred him to our former correspondence and its result; to my actual relation to the public, and the duty which it imposed upon me; and exercising a right which belonged to me, under any circumstances, and which that relation imperiously called upon me to exert, I informed him that as soon as that duty was fulfilled, I would attend to his demand, with a disposition promptly to repair any wrong which I had inflicted. "I list answer, with the note of Mr. Eaton's friend, which enclosed it, is, however, now submitted to the public.

Washington, 29th July, 1831.

Sir—The difficulty of meeting with any person here who is unconnected with the government, and whom I can ask to be the bearer of the enclosed letter, induces me to commit it to Mr. Echols, one of my family. The considerations of a domestic nature have prevented me from communicating to him its contents. I assure myself, however, of its proper delivery, by placing it under cover to your address, and instructing Mr. Echols to deliver the package only to yourself. I am respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To Gen. Alexander Hunter.

Mr. Berrien's answer to major Eaton's challenge.

Washington, 29th July, 1831.

Sir: Your note of yesterday's date was delivered to me by Gen. Hunter.

I will waive at this time any observations on the language and style of that note, or upon any statement not necessarily connected with your present demand, which it contains. I make two exceptions to this waiver, and I remark first, that in your account of the interview between us, on the occasion of tendering to me the office of attorney general, you have omitted to state, that your communication was confined to that single point; that neither the names of the members of the cabinet, nor the principles on which General Jackson intended to administer the government, were mentioned to me, but that for these and all other matters which might influence my decision upon the invitation which had been given to me, I was referred to myself. I take the occasion to add also, with no reference to your article, that I, however, that I do not acquiesce in your interpretation of that sentence in my address to the public, in which it is stated that the announcement of the names of the cabinet seemed to me "to prevent an insuperable bar to my acceptance of the office, which had been tendered."

And now, sir, I will reply to the residue of your note. You rest the demand which you have made, as I understand it, upon the allegation, that I have given countenance and sanction to what you denominate the base slanders, which have been propagated against you in your domestic relations, and you say that this has been done in my address to the public, by speaking of these rumors, as evils which might prove an insuperable bar to my entering the cabinet, and stating that my assent was fully given under the persuasion that the president would speedily see and correct the evil. The wrong then of which you complain, consists in my having stated to the public, as you suppose, that your introduction into the cabinet was an evil, in consequence of the reports which were in circulation in relation to your family, and that for this cause I had hesitated to take a place in it, and had finally acquiesced, under a belief that this evil would be speedily removed. I state the ground which you have taken, thus distinctly, not for the purpose of discussing it with you, but that "the American people," to whom you refer as arbiters of the propriety of your conduct, may be enabled at once to see the principle on which you rest your claim to demand satisfaction from me, and having done this, will proceed to explain to you why I will not now reply to it.

You took an early occasion after my return to this place to make the demand which gave rise to our former correspondence. That was a demand for the avowal or disavowal of a statement, that my family had refused to associate with yours. I met to this by the avowal which you called for, stated the occasion on which I had given this refusal, and the determination which I had expressed to leave the cabinet, rather than to yield it. I held myself ready at that time to answer any just demand which you should make upon me, founded upon this refusal, or the avowal of it. You made none. On the contrary, after having my answer four days in your possession—after having, as you tell me, given to it "a full and calm consideration," you replied to it in the spirit of "peace, and I terminated the correspondence by a note, written in the same spirit. Up to that period your claims upon me were, then, at an end. Since that time, the letter of Colonel Johnson, the misrepresentations of a paper published under the eye of the president, and finally a statement in relation to myself personally, have compelled me to appeal to the public. That appeal is now pending. It places me in a new position, and imposes a new duty. Under the alleged authority of the president of the United States, an issue has been tendered to me, the decisions of which is vitally important to my own character and to the public interest. It is at such a moment, and under such circumstances, that your demand is presented to me. The American people, to whom you appeal, will not fail to perceive and to weigh such considerations, and to decide on which it is made. My answer is, that I have higher duties to perform both to myself and to the country, than any which your demand, even conceding it to be rightful, (an which subject I express no opinion,) can impose. I will not be diverted from the fulfillment of these duties. When that purpose shall have been accomplished, I will attend to your demand with a disposition promptly to repair any wrong which I may have inflicted. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To John H. Eaton, esq.

This letter, which was delivered to a friend of Mr. Eaton, (who, in consequence of General Hunter's indisposition, had been selected to represent him), that friend refused to receive, and returned to the bearer of it, who, as the public will have seen, was ignorant of its contents. I considered this as decisive evidence of his disposition to evade the contest which he professed to seek. If he had been sincere in making this demand, an opportunity was thus offered to him of gratifying his resentment. A short time would suffice to release me from my existing engagements to the public, and then he would have been authorized to renew his claim. By the refusal to receive my letter, he necessarily closed all communication between us. The subject of such communication had been as preliminary to further proceedings, to retract that step, and to apologize for it. Without this, any subsequent demand by Mr. Eaton, was merely idle. When it was made, having previously obtained the friendly offices of General Jones in this matter, I instructed him to say for me, that I could hold no further communication with Mr. Eaton, who must thereafter pursue his own course. He had no receipt of satisfaction on the only terms on which I could offer it, and I left him to seek it in any manner which might be more agreeable to him. He has selected his mode, by his appeal to the public, and must now abide the result. I think, then, it is obvious, that this idle bravado, twice displayed, without even a plausible pretence, has no other consequence, except the disgrace of itself, and the palpable discomfiture of its more immediate agent. From me, Mr. Eaton has received no wrong. Although I cannot admit the existence of that intimacy, which it records with his present purposes to assert, still I can fearlessly appeal to those more immediately conversant with my course here, to say whether feelings of hostility have at any time characterized my conduct towards him. This declaration is not made with any view to diminish his resentment; that he will continue to indulge as he thinks fit, without any effort on my part to propitiate it. No: Mr. Eaton, and his resentments, and the manner in which he may think proper to induce them, are utterly unimportant. That which demands our consideration is, that the law of force is openly proclaimed at the seat of the national government—it is he who ventures to rebel the groundless and the official press must speak at the peril of his life, in the vindication of his honor; and if even in self-defence, he shall dare to say aught which may draw into question the public conduct of that high functionary, whose views it professes to represent, and by whose alleged authority it speaks, he must instantly prepare himself for the consequences.

Such is the condition to which we are reduced. It is utterly unavailing to deny the fact; for the evidence is before our eyes. Two separate calls have been made upon me by Mr. Eaton within little more than a month; and the fact that he has, at each time, faltered in his purpose, only serves to render more obvious the spirit which dictated them. There is no dispassionate man, I care not of what party he may be, who will venture to affirm that he had a right, in either case, to make these demands. Why, then, were they made? The official press has, in the mean time, been unceasingly employed in vain and impotent, but ruthless efforts to assail me—and for what? for the mere act of vindicating myself, by a simple narrative of facts, excluding all superfluous comments on those things have been notorious. Ever since June last this community has been repeatedly agitated by rumors of intended conflicts. No man has been able to close his ears against them. The public newspapers from all parts of the union have brought them back to us, and there is no one who is either so elevated or so humble but, that have reached and penetrated his dwelling. For this disturbance of the quiet of the community—this degradation of the national character, a solemn responsibility rests somewhere. Whether the delusion of the moment, the time will come, and that speedily when the American people will enforce it. And who has been the principal actor in these scenes, in each case, the moving cause of this disturbance? An individual enjoying the confidence of the chief magistrate, in habits of daily and intimate intercourse with him. And by whom have these calumnies been uttered? Who is it that has conspired with an activity which has never slumbered, to fan the flames of discord? These have been the labors of a press which is necessarily under his control. Who doubts that this reiterated calumny, this continued menace of violence, might have been checked by a word? Who will question that the power to do so, involved the obligation to exert it? Else, what are government, laws, and the duties which belong to the civil magistracy? What is that high and honorable feeling which does not permit its possessor to resort to dishonorable means himself, nor to counsel or countenance them in those whose conduct he has either the legal or the moral power to control?

I dismiss with these remarks so much of Mr. Eaton's pamphlet as relates to the second correspondence between us. In the spirit of a determination to misrepresent every thing connected with this subject, he imputes to me the violation of a personal intimacy which he has never before the public, and of the cabinet, and the fact of having contributed to give currency to the reports against the character of Mrs. Eaton. He adds, that, as the partisan of Mr. Calhoun, I had fomented the divisions of the cabinet, and become party to an intrigue, which had for its object his expulsion from it. Each of these charges is wholly destitute of foundation. As to the first charge, presented to me entirely fictitious that those who have been conversant with the transactions as they occurred, can discern no resemblance to them in this statement, and they will perhaps be embarrassed in determining to whom to award the credit of exercising that degree of imaginative power which was necessary to have conceived it. I never was on terms of intimate friendship with Mr. Eaton. This declaration is alike due to myself, and to those with whom I have the good fortune to stand in that relation. I have already said that I attended his wedding. I did so upon an appeal made to me, as a member of the senate—as a political, not as a private friend. Circumstances soon disclosed to me the inferences which would probably be drawn from this occurrence, and I limited myself thereafter to a civil intercourse with Mr. Eaton, when we met. I was not in the habit of visiting him, either before or after his marriage. Still I had no hostility towards him, and in looking to the circumstances so often adverted to in this controversy, whether before, or at the time of his introduction into the cabinet, I certainly indulged no such feeling. I have before said, and now repeat, that my conduct while there, was studiously regulated to avoid offence. I could not gratify the too obvious wish of the president in this matter. I thought any interference on his part, unfortunate for himself, and for the country; but I did not seek to inflame the feeling which was excited by the indirect attempt to control the society of Washington.

A single fact, known to me, as true among whom I write, furnishes a decisive answer to the allegation of a combination in the cabinet, to exclude Mrs. Eaton from society. It is, that the question of exclusion as it related to the society of Washington generally, was settled before Mr. Eaton came into office. His marriage occurred in January, and during that and the succeeding month this question had been tried and determined, by those to whom it belonged, the members of the cabinet. Any movement on the part of those who composed the cabinet on that subject, could only therefore have for its object to reverse that decision—to introduce and not to exclude. I had no part in this matter. I was during that winter a member of the senate, and did not enter into society—and my family did not reach this place until the following summer. I did not believe that, as a member of the cabinet, I had any thing to do with the regulations of this society, and in connecting myself with the community as an individual, I conformed myself to what appeared to me to be already established in relation to its social intercourse. Now, as heretofore, Mr. Eaton is desirous of placing me in the attitude of an accuser—that he may avail himself of the public sympathy, which he has so far been able to excite. Hence, and now, as heretofore, I disclaim this office, in form as well as in fact. The call upon me for the adduction of proofs, is therefore merely idle. I am not even responsible for the introduction of Mrs. Eaton's name into the discussions between us. This was done originally by Mr. Eaton himself. The demand which he made upon me, on the 17th June, drew from me the statement contained in my note of the succeeding day, and it was Mr. Eaton who brought that correspondence before the public, by giving it, or an extract from it, to the editor of the Globe, by whom that extract was published; and this rendered it necessary to publish the entire correspondence. So far as I am concerned, therefore, the matter is closed. I was gratified by a termination of discussion between us, the question of Mrs. Eaton's relation to the society of Washington, and the rumors concerning her.

I have a brief remark to make on Mr. Eaton's statement of the interview, which took place between Mr. Branch and himself in my office. I had no agency in producing that interview, and was not, I think, advised that it was contemplated, until a very short time before the parties met. I was gratified by a termination of it, which did not interrupt the official intercourse of those concerned; but I believe nobody thought, for myself I certainly did not, that any expiation which was given there, was calculated to remove feelings of personal hostility, if any such existed. The expression of such a feeling as is ascribed to me, would therefore have been utterly inconsistent with the occasion. I advised to this subject, however, for the purpose of stating the strong impression which rests upon my mind, that there is a mistake as to the time of its occurrence, notwithstanding the abduction of Mr. Branch's letter. I kept no note of this transaction, and cannot therefore speak with positiveness; but my belief is that which I have stated. Mr. Branch will, I presume, put this matter on its true footing.

Mr. Eaton has made a labored effort to attribute the dissolution of the late cabinet to the intrigues of the partisans of Mr. Calhoun, rather than to the feeling which has been excited by the attempt to control the social intercourse of Washington. That effort is vain. The public judgment on that subject is believed to be irrevocably fixed. However, under the influence of various motives, men may differ as to the character of the acts, among the vast majority of the American people, there are few, I believe, who doubt that my colleagues and myself might have retained our places in the cabinet, if, consistently with our sense of propriety, we could have taken a different view of that subject.

The charge that I was at any time the partisan of Mr. Calhoun, is utterly destitute of foundation. Mr. Eaton cannot impute to me any act or expression which will give the slightest countenance to this assertion. In the context of 1828, my wishes were openly avowed, and acted upon, in favor of Mr. Crawford. The earliest measures of the administration, which then came into power, and more especially in relation to the interests of Georgia, placed me in the opposition to that administration, and I remained there during the contest which succeeded. I entered the cabinet in 1829, as the political friend of general Jackson, with every disposition to fulfill the duties, which that relation prescribed, but with no claims upon him as an individual, and without believing that I had incurred any obligations, as such, from the fact of having been called there. These duties, however, in the view which I took of them, independently of all other considerations, were sufficient to preclude me from being the partisan of any man. On the contrary, I endeavored uniformly to inculcate the propriety of abstaining from all agitation of the question, who should be the successor of general Jackson. This exposition of my particular views would be entirely unimportant to the public, and would not have been presented to their notice, if a contrary course had not been utterly impugned to me, for the purpose of concealing from them the real causes of the dissolution of the late cabinet.

It is next imputed to me, as an act of ingratitude to a "friend and benefactor," that I omitted to communicate to general Jackson my objection to the selection of his cabinet. The indignant feeling which such a charge would be otherwise calculated to excite, is repressed by its absurdity. It is to general Jackson also to be ascribed, the entire conviction, that it has resulted from tenance from him—that in this instance at least, Mr. Eaton has drawn at short sight, and upon his own resources. I have already said, and it is now sufficiently manifest to the public, that these objections, so far as Mr. Eaton was concerned, were not merely communicated, but strongly, and yet vainly, urged upon the president, by his own personal friends. I had no claim to that relation, and such a communication on my part would therefore have been merely nugatory. I could have no hope of changing the cast of the cabinet, when those who were both the political and personal friends of the president had made the effort and failed. The only question for me to decide was, whether, constituted as it was, it was my duty to accept an office which was tendered to me, or, as I stated, in my former note, to decline it, and, under the influence of what motives, I had determined to do so.

The suggestion which we are considering demands, however, a different consideration. General Jackson is represented by Mr. Eaton as my "friend and benefactor," and my conduct is denounced for an alleged violation of the duties which he had a right to claim from me in that character. Now, as I had no acquaintance with general Jackson, other than that which occurred during a few days service with him in the senate, I could not and had never held any intercourse with him, except during that short period, his claim to the title of my friend and benefactor must have been derived solely from the fact of his having called me to the office of attorney general of the United States; and it is no doubt the idea, which Mr. Eaton intended to convey.

I confess I took a different view of the claim to be made on general Jackson, did I am not disposed to believe, that he could maintain any such pretension, as that which is put forth by Mr. Eaton, nor to consider him in that liable to the serious imputation which it implies. In the selection of his cabinet, he was bound to consult the public interest. If he did so, however much myself as incurring a debt of gratitude, I do not doubt that there were others who were entitled to his preference, but if he believed this, and believing it, conferred the office upon me in the spirit of favoritism, he failed to discharge his duty to the public, and Mr. Eaton is his accuser. I entered upon the duties of that office with feelings of respectful good will to general Jackson, for the favorable opinion which he had indicated by the selection, and with a deep sense of my obligation to the zealous and faithful discharge of my duty, which I have endeavored honestly to fulfill, but certainly without any idea that I had been distinguished as a favorite, or that I had incurred a debt of gratitude.

The wishes of general Jackson, in relation to the office of attorney general, were communicated to me, almost simultaneously, by Mr. Branch and Mr. Eaton, in each case, without any announcement of the names of my intended associates, or of the proposed policy of the administration. The fact, which will not be denied, that I asked an interview with general Jackson, which was appointed to me, for the purpose of ascertaining those parculars as a preliminary to my decision, furnishes a distinct negative to Mr. Eaton's assertion, that I announced to him, on the day succeeding that on which he delivered his message, my readiness to accept the office which was tendered to me. I did not in fact accept it until some time after my interview with General Jackson, and recollecting that interview, he is am sure will out-verify this assertion of Mr. Eaton.

I must be permitted also to deny the authorship of certain paragraphs, extracted from the Telegraph, which Mr. Eaton imputes to me. Even while I write, a similar and equally unfounded imputation by the editor of the Globe, has furnished a new proof of the falsity of which I am the object, and I am admonished that Mr. Eaton, although he has retired from the city, since I began to write these remarks, holds himself in readiness to return. They have been sketched hastily, and at intervals of exemption from various other claims upon my time, but I trust it will be found that I have written under the influence of this salutary caution. In regard to the principal charge, I desire to say, that what I have written, bears my signature—and it is true also that I have written, whatever it is thus verified.

I rejoice to believe that I may now be permitted to bring this address to a close. Its publication will I doubt not be followed by a reiteration of the calumnies, with which I have been heretofore assailed; but my reliance is that these will be rendered harmless by the intelligence of my countrymen.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SILAS E. BURROWS, ESQ.
AND THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT MONROE.

Letter from Mr. Burrows.

New York, January 7th, 1831.

My dear sir: Believing myself in your estimation one of those friends whose motives and conduct, since I had the honor of first being acquainted with you, cannot be mistaken, I take the liberty of trespassing on your goodness to obtain information which cannot be as satisfactorily received from any other source.

I am sensible our country will be happy in hearing those opinions which emanate from the revolutionary patriot who shed his blood on the battle-field, and who presided for eight years over the destinies of our country, during which period every blessing was possessed by our happy land. Will you be so kind as to give me your sentiments relative to the effect of the U. S. bank on our national currency, and what your opinion is in relation to the renewal of its charter? The situation in which the government was placed without its aid, during the last war, its general advantages in regulating exchange, facilitating the remittances of government and individuals from various parts of the union, and generally its importance connected with the best interests of our country? I am, &c.

SILAS E. BURROWS.

Col. James Monroe, late president of the U. S.

Letter from Mr. Monroe.

New York, January 20th, 1831.

Dear sir: The confidence I have in your rectitude and patriotism, will induce me to give an explicit answer to the general interrogatories contained in your letter of the 7th, though I fear that my continued weak state of health will make it less satisfactory than it otherwise might be, especially as I have none of the official documents with me which are calculated to illustrate the subject.

You ask me what is my opinion of the effect which the U. States bank has on the national currency, and as to the policy of renewing its charter?—what the situation of the government without its aid during the last war?—what its general advantages in regulating exchange, in facilitating remittances to individuals, and its general importance?

When the old U. S. bank was first instituted, I was one of those who voted against it in the senate. I doubted the power of the government under the constitution to make such an establishment, and was fearful that the influence which it would give to the government over the moneyed concerns of the union, would have a very improper effect on our free system. The bank was instituted soon after the government was adopted, and at a period when the question of the relative powers of the two governments excited great feeling, and divided the congress and the union into very jealous and violent parties. I was of that party which construed the powers of the national government strictly, and sought to impose on it correspondent restraints. So far as any change has since taken place in my opinion, it has been the result of experience, and prompted by a belief that such change would give strength to the system, and not weaken or endanger it.

Between such a bank, and any arrangement which the government can make, the alternative must be between a bank of the government itself, and under its exclusive control, a reliance on its own resources and surplus funds, deposited in a manner to produce the best effect, and a dependence on the banks of the several states. I have no hesitation in declaring it as my decided opinion that neither of these could accomplish the great objects contemplated, and that each of them is liable in other respects to the most serious objections. To a bank of the government, this remark is applicable in both views, and with peculiar force in the latter. If confined to the metropolis, it could not extend its discounts beyond a very limited circle, nor its agency as a deposit for the revenue received in the several states—nor for remittances to individuals—and for other objects it would be equally limited. Such an institution requires an active supervision by those for whose benefit it is intended. The regular official duties of all the departments in the executive render it impossible for that branch to perform that service without an interference with those duties to the injury of the public. If branches should be established, their position might enable them to remedy some of the defects stated, but they would accumulate others of much greater force. The interference with the constitutional and regular duties of the executive would, in the same degree, be increased. But that is comparatively a slight evil. A bank thus instituted being under the control of the executive, by the appointment of its directors, and in all its operations, might, in the hands of a bad administration, be wielded as an instrument to sap the foundation of the government itself. Appeals would be made to the government from every part of the union, for its influence in obtaining discounts, and thus a solution might be practised to a great extent for the worst purposes. The influence would be reciprocal. Those connected by such a tie with the government would be hooked to for support at elections, who would not fail to render it. Thus the revenue of the nation, raised by taxes on the proper objects to support their free government, might be made an instrument to its overthrow.

The second alternative suggested, a reliance on the surplus funds, for the accomplishment of the objects contemplated, it must be obvious, must fail in every instance. The revenue of a government is generally limited to certain specified objects, according to an estimate for each, and to which it is appropriated. The fund raised, sometimes falls short of the object. It seldom exceeds it in any considerable amount. For the want of a surplus it must lie idle in the treasury until appropriated, and if appropriated as a provision for an emergency, for war for example, it must still lie idle in the treasury, until that event occurs, or be loaned out. It could not be idle. The whole nation would revolt against it, and if loaned out, it might be impossible to obtain it when called for, and might even be lost. In this mode, the regulation of the value of the currency, of exchange, and of rendering service, by facilitating remittances, would be abortive. The third alternative which has been suggested, a reliance on the state banks, would be equally unproductive. The government would require no aid except in time of war, when immense sums would be necessary, which could be procured only by loans, and when application should be made to them, there is good cause to apprehend that each would endeavor to obtain the best terms it could. There is no particular bond between them and the national government, and, impelled by their interests and that of the stockholders, it is natural that they should pursue that course. Should such an emergency arise as menaced the overthrow of the government, the interest thereby excited might be paramount, and force the banks, under the direction of the stockholders, to unite in a common effort to save the country. But the great object is to prevent such a crisis by a command of funds, which would enable the government to arrest it. In every other object the state banks would fail. There being no standard to which all must adhere, no connection between those of the different states, and many of them with limited funds, and in embarrassed circumstances, they would neither regulate the value of coin, of exchange, nor facilitate remittances.

A national bank occupies different ground. Connected with the government by its charter, and its capital, which consists of stock, in which the government participates in a certain degree, there is no instance in which, on principle, there can be a difference of interest between them, and many powerful considerations by which the interest of the bank must stimulate it, to support the credit of the government in any situation in which it may be placed. If the credit of the stock should sink, the capital of the bank would decline in equal degree: the effect of which would be felt in all its operations. Its paper would depreciate, and a check given to its circulation, if not an entire suspension. Standing at the head of the moneyed operations of the government, it is its intermediate agent in making remittances to banks and individuals throughout the union, and likewise between individuals, from which much credit and influence are gained, if not profit. It has the means, and may be considered as the most powerful agent in raising and sustaining the circulating medium on a par with specie throughout the union, and of elevating the state banks to that standard, by subjecting them to the necessity of reaching and adhering to it, to sustain their credit, and even their existence. Let the credit of the government sink, and all these advantages are lost. The bank therefore, from a regard to interest, is bound to sustain it. The directors, except the few appointed by the government, are elected by the stockholders, and are amenable to them. It gives its support, therefore, to the government, on principles of national policy, in the support of which it is interested, and would disclaim becoming an instrument for any other purpose.

The view above presented is supported by experience, and particularly by the events of the late war. When the war commenced, the government had not the funds which were necessary to support it, and was in consequence forced to resort to loans, which were with difficulty obtained from any quarter, even in a limited degree, and on unfavorable terms. I have not the official documents before me, and cannot state the sources from which any loans were obtained, nor the conditions, with the decline of the public credit as the war advanced. I well remember, however, that when I was called by the president to the department of war, on the 31st of August, 1814, the certificates of the treasury were selling at $80 in the $100, by which $20 were lost. It was evident that if a reliance was placed on the sale of certificates only, that a still further decline would ensue, and that the worst consequences might be apprehended. The country was invaded through the whole inland and maritime frontiers, and powerful squadrons were at the mouth of every bay and river leading to our principal cities, which were threatened with attack and ruin. The metropolis of our union had been forced, and its public buildings destroyed. Such was the state of the country, and the funds, when I entered the department of war. Under such circumstances, an appeal was made to the patriotism and interest of the cities, and banks within them, by the department of war, with the sanction of the president, for loans of money necessary for their own defence, for that of the maritime frontier, and the union. For the first loan that was obtained, one million of dollars from the city of New York, which took place a few days after I entered the department, no price was fixed. As the treasury notes were selling for $80 in the $100, that was claimed, but not accepted to. It was left for subsequent adjustment, to be settled on fair principles. Several millions of dollars were obtained from the District of Columbia and principal cities throughout the union, and, according to my recollection, at par. This proves that until the union is threatened with ruin, no loans can be obtained in emergencies, without a national bank, otherwise than at a great sacrifice. These considerations led to a change in my opinion, and induced me to concur with the president in the propriety of instituting such a bank after the conclusion of the war in 1815. As to the constitutional objection, it formed no serious obstacle. In voting against it in the first instance, I was governed essentially by policy. The construction I gave to the constitution I considered a strict one:

In the latter instance, it was more liberal but, according to my judgment, justified by its powers.

The above sketch contains my sentiments on the subject of your several interrogatories, which I communicate to you not for public view, but in a spirit of confidence. Since my retirement I have sought to avoid all political controversies. Having concurred with the president in the propriety of instituting the latter bank, my opinion was not withheld, and is, I presume, known, as that it remains unaltered. Should a justification of my conduct for the change of sentiment in the interval between the institution of the first and second bank become necessary, or any other appeal is made, to make it a public duty to explain the cause of that change, I shall not withhold it. I shall be attentive to the course of events, and not fail to perform that duty, should either call be made on me.

I am, dear sir, with great respect and sincere regard,
JAMES MONROE.

Silas E. Burrows, esq. New York.

NATIONAL ANTI-MASONIC CONVENTION.

Necessity, in the mechanical department of our business, and the near close of the week, forbids a present insertion of the regular minutes of this convention, with a list of the members attending, &c.—but these are chiefly matters for record only, and will not lose any part of their interest by a little delay—the people, generally, being chiefly concerned in the result, which shall be stated below. It may be sufficient to observe that about 112 delegates attended—Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania being fully represented—that on Monday the 26th, the convention was organized by the appointment of JOHN C. SPENCER, esq. of New York, as president, four vice presidents and as many secretaries; and that several committees were appointed, &c.—that on Tuesday, the 27th, various reports of the committees were presented and accepted, and much incidental business attended to—and that, on Wednesday, the 28th, WILLIAM WIRT, of Maryland, was nominated as president of the U. States, and AMOS ELLMAKER, of Pennsylvania, as vice president; each receiving 108 votes of the 111 members present—after which, and in conclusion, the following proceedings were had.

National anti-masonic convention, Sept. 28.

Resolved unanimously, That WILLIAM WIRT, of Maryland, be nominated as the anti-masonic candidate for the office of president of the United States at the ensuing election.

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed to communicate the preceding resolution to Mr. Wirt, and request his acceptance of the above nomination.

Mr. Rutherford, of N. Jersey, Mr. Sloan, of Ohio, and Mr. Elder, of Pennsylvania, were appointed the said committee.

At the meeting of the convention at 8 o'clock, P. M. the following communication from Mr. Wirt was received:

Gentlemen: The unanimous resolution of the "national anti-masonic convention" assembled at this place, nominating me as their candidate for the office of president of the United States, at the ensuing election, is an honor very grateful to me, as a proof of confidence from so respectable a body, and quite as unexpected as it is grateful. My pursuits, habits and inclinations, have removed me so far from the political excitement and contentions of the day, and I know so well, from a close personal observation of twelve years, how little of attraction there is in the office of president of the United States, to any man who values his own peace, that it was as far removed from my wishes as my expectations, that it would occur to any portion of my fellow citizens to present my name to the consideration of my countrymen for that office. Not only have I never sought the office, but I have, long since, looked at it with far more of dread than of desire, being fully aware of its fearful responsibilities, and of the fact, demonstrated by past experience, that no degree of purity and intelligence that can be exerted in the discharge of its duties, can protect its possessor from misrepresentation and aspersion.

Give me leave to add, gentlemen, that one of the last quarters from which I could have anticipated such an honor, is the anti-masonic convention; because, adopting, (too hastily, I am happy to find), the current rumors of the day, I had supposed that the very principle of your union was a war of indiscriminate proscription against all persons throughout the United States, who had ever borne the name of mason; that you would put in nomination no person who had ever been a mason himself, and who would not, moreover, pledge himself to become a party to such a war of indiscriminate extermination, and wield the appointing power of the office under your dictation; who would not, in short, become the president of your party, instead of being the president of the United States. I am happy to find that this is an error; for I should have been grieved for my country, to see the rise of any party that should affect to seize upon the reins of government, and, through the agency of an automaton president, to direct its powers to the vindictive purposes of party proscription and persecution; and I should be grieved, for myself, to learn that there had been anything in my life and character that could mark me out as a fit instrument for the execution of such a purpose. I am relieved from both these apprehensions by learning, since your assemblage here, that you have no other object in view than, in effect, to assert the supremacy of the laws of the land, that you seek to disturb no portion of the peaceable and virtuous citizens of our country in the enjoyment of those social rights which are secured to them by their constitution and laws, but on the contrary, that the principle which has emboldened you, is one of self defence, in the enjoyment of those rights; that having become convinced by the disclosures made under oath, by numerous and respectable witnesses, in the trials which have been agitating the state of New York, for several years, and by your investigations consequent on those disclosures, that the masonic society has become a tremendous political engine, with the power and the disposition to set the laws of the land at defiance, to mark out and sacrifice its victims at pleasure, and with impunity, and to silence all individual opposition by the mysterious terrors which it diffuses throughout the community, you have come to the determination to root out this noxious institution, if you can, by the use of all the peaceable, legal, and constitutional means in your power; that the most effective means of this character which has presented itself to you, is by the exercise of your elective franchise; that deeming every man unfit for office, who, in accordance with the principles established on the trials in New York, considers his masonic oaths and obligations as superior to his obligations to the constitution and laws of the country, you will support no man for any office who holds that principle, or adheres to the society whose principle it is; that you consider a man's allegiance to his country his highest earthly obligation, and that no man is fit to be trusted with one of the offices of the country who will permit a doubt to rest on the fact of his allegiance. These I understand to be your principles, and I see nothing in them which does not commend them to every man whose mind and heart are sound; for there can be no question among reasonable men, that in a free government like ours, the constitution and laws are our only sovereign; that the peace, order, prosperity and happiness of our people depend on the steady, faithful and effectual administration of our laws; that any secret society which, by the force of its mysterious oaths and obligations, and by the extent of its combination, seeks to disturb the action of those laws, to set them at defiance, to ride over and control them, to usurp the government, to hold the lives, peace and happiness of society at their mercy, and to establish a reign of terror over the initiated and uninitiated, is a political monster as fearful as the invisible tribunal of Germany, or the inquisition of Spain, and ought to be extirpated, without delay, by the use of all the peaceable means which the constitution and laws of our country furnish. I am further sure that, in our country, it is but necessary to establish the fact of the existence of such a society to insure its annihilation.

But, gentlemen, although your resolution asks of me no pledges of promises, yet the name and style of the convention from which it proceeds, the anti-masonic convention, may be considered both by yourselves and our fellow citizens, at large, as necessarily involving by implication such promises and pledges, and it is therefore proper that I should be perfectly open and candid with you, that there may be no misapprehension between us, and that you may be able to disembarass yourselves at once, by changing your nomination, if you find that you have acted under mistake in passing this resolution.

You must understand, then, if you are not already apprized of it, that, in very early life, I was myself initiated into the mysteries of free masonry. I have been told by masons that my eyes were never opened, because I never took the master's degree; but my curiosity never led me thus far—and, although, I soon discontinued my attendance on lodges, (not having entered one even from curiosity for more than thirty years, I believe) it proceeded from no suspicion on my part that there was anything criminal in the institution, or any thing that placed its members, in the slightest degree, in collusion with their allegiance to their country and its laws. On the contrary, having been before my initiation, assured by a gentleman, in whom I had implicit confidence, that there was nothing in the engagement which could affect either my religion or politics (which I considered as comprehending the whole range of my duties, civil and religious, and as extending not to the first degree only but to the whole masonic order) and being further informed that many of the most illustrious men of Virginia, with general Washington at their head, belonged to that order, and had taken the degree of master, I did not believe that there could be any thing in the institution at war with their duties as patriots, men and christians; nor is it yet possible for me to believe that they could have understood the engagement as involving any such criminal obligations. I have, thence forward, continually regarded masonry as nothing more than a social and charitable club, designed for the promotion of good feeling among its members, and for the pecuniary relief of their indigent brethren. I have, indeed, thought very little about it for thirty years. It had dropped from my mind so completely that I do not believe I should have been able to gain admittance into any lodge at all strict in their examinations, where I should have had to depend alone on my memory; and so little consequence did I attach to it, that whenever masonry has been occasionally introduced as a subject of conversation, I have felt more disposed to smile than to frown. Thinking thus of it, nothing has more surprised me than to see it blown into consequence in the northern and eastern states as a political engine, and the whole community excited against it as an affair of serious importance. I had heard, indeed, the general rumour that Morgan had been kidnapped and very probably murdered by masons, for divulging their secrets; but I supposed it to be the act of a few ignorant and ferocious desperadoes, moved by their own impulse singly, without the sanction or knowledge of their lodges; and thus thinking, I have repeatedly and continually, both in conversation and letters of friendship, spoken of masonry and anti-masonry as a fitter subject for farce than tragedy, and have been grieved at seeing some of my friends involved in what appeared to me such a wild and bitter and unjust persecution against so harmless an institution, as free-masonry. I have thought and repeatedly said that I considered masonry as having no more to do with politics than any one of the numerous clubs so humorously celebrated in the Spectator; and that with regard to the crime in Morgan's case, it was quite as unjust to charge that on masonry as it would be to charge the private delinquencies of some professing christians on christianity itself. Thus I have thought and thus I have continually spoken and written in my private letters to several of my friends. It was not until the period of your assembling here, that on the occasion of a friendly visit from one of your members, and my taking the liberty to rally him on the excessive zeal which had been excited on an occasion so inadequate, that he placed before me a detail of some of the proceedings on the trials of the conspirators against Morgan; when, for the first time, I saw the masonic oaths as established by the testimony both of adhering and seceding masons on the trials in New York. I observed that in one of them (called the royal arch) the candidate swears among other things that he will aid and assist a companion royal arch mason in dis-treas, and espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same, if in his power, whether he be right or wrong, and that he will conceal the secrets of a companion royal arch mason given him in charge as such, murder and treason not excepted; and in other oaths, in still higher degrees, I also observe that the candidate binds himself to avenge the violated secrets of the lodge by the infliction of death on the offender, and to revenge the wrongs of a brother to the utmost extremity; and the whole mixed up with the most horrible imprecations and blasphemous mockeries of the rites and tenets of the christian religion.

In the details of the trials in the case of Morgan it became manifest that these oaths are not considered by those who impose and take them as mere idle and unmeaning words; but that they are viewed as solemn obligations which are to be practically enforced, and which in the case of Morgan there is too much reason to believe were tragically enforced. According to the reports of the details of that trial as given at some of your former meetings, and given at greater length at your meetings in this city, (at one of which, in common with other citizens, I was present), those oaths are understood literally, and literally enforced; and, according to the exhibition of the evidence made in those reports, the conspiracy against Morgan was not, as has been commonly supposed, the act of a few ignorant men, alone; but was engendered in the lodges themselves, entered under their direction and supported at their expense, the conspiracy embracing, within its sweep, men of all degrees, men of the learned professions, farmers and mechanics; with too much reason to believe that the secret energy of the masonic spirit had entered and polluted even the temples of justice; and with the most demonstrative proof that the persons who had entered into these unhallowed oaths, considered their allegiance to the lodges as of higher obligation than their allegiance to the laws of their country. If this be masonry, as according to this uncontradicted evidence it seems to be, I have no hesitation in saying, that I consider it at war with the fundamental principles of the social compact, as treason against society, and a wicked conspiracy against the laws of God and man, which ought to be put down.

But gentlemen, this was not, and could not be masonry as understood by Washington. The thing is impossible. The suspicion would be parrieide. Nor can I believe that in the quarter of the union with which I am best acquainted, intelligent men of high and honorable character, if they have been drawn in to take these shocking and impious oaths, can consider them as paramount to their duties to their God and their country. It is true that after the practical exhibition of masonry which we have had in New York, no man of common prudence can sleep over these discoveries, and will take care in every case of doubt to inquire. But both justice and prudence demand discriminations for the powers of a president ought not, in my opinion, to be prostituted to the purpose of a blind and unjust proscription, involving innocence and honor with guilt and treason, and no man is worthy of a nomination to this high office in whose judgment and patriotism, confidence cannot be placed to make the proper distinction between them. "In the view of all honorable men he would deservedly become an object of disgust, if he could stoop to commit himself by any pledges, in a case like this, as the price of his nomination.

If with these views of my opinions, it is the pleasure of your convention to change the nomination, I can assure you very sincerely that I shall retire from it with far more pleasure than I should accept it. If, on the contrary, it be their choice to abide by it, I have only to add, that in a government like ours, I consider no citizen at liberty to reject a nomination by so respectable a body, upon personal considerations.

Be the final determination of your convention what it may, I shall ever retain a grateful sense of the honor conferred on me by this nomination, and I beg the anti-masonic convention to accept the assurance of my respect for them and for their cause. I do not address them as a party, because I understand the principle of their union to be, to assert the supremacy of the laws; which I trust is and ever will be the sacred and immutable principle of our common country. WM. WIRT.

Messrs. Rutherford, Sloan and Elder, committee of the national anti-masonic convention.

Baltimore, Sept. 28, 1831.

The communication having been read, the following resolution was adopted:

In the national anti-masonic convention, Baltimore, 28th September, 1831.

Resolved unanimously, That the answer of the hon. WILLIAM WIRT, to the resolution of this convention, nominating him as a candidate for the presidency, be entered on the minutes of this convention, as part of its proceedings, and that this convention recommend to their fellow citizens throughout the United States, a cordial and vigorous support of Mr. WIRT, at the next election, as the anti-masonic candidate, for the office of president of the United States.

Resolutions of similar purport were unanimously adopted by the convention, nominating AMOS ELLMAKER, of Pennsylvania, as the anti-masonic candidate for the office of vice president of the United States: And, for the appointment of a committee to announce to him the nomination.

At the meeting of the convention, at 8 o'clock P. M. the following communication was received from Mr. ELLMAKER:

Baltimore, September 28, 1831.

Messrs. John Bailly, John S. Shriver and Samuel P. Lyman.

GENTLEMEN:—I acknowledge with much satisfaction the friendly manner in which you have communicated the two resolutions this day adopted by the national anti-masonic convention: one, nominating me as the anti-masonic candidate for the vice president of the United States at the ensuing election; the other, appointing you a committee to communicate the preceding resolution to me and to request my acceptance of the nomination.

I know well, my humble pretensions to be a candidate for that high office. But a zealous and firm attachment to the cause of anti-masonry, will not permit a refusal of the nomination. I, therefore, accept it.

With great respect, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

AMOS ELLMAKER.

The communication having been read, a resolution of like import with that above set forth in the case of Mr. Wirt, was unanimously adopted by the convention.

The convention then proceeded to the transaction of other business connected with the objects in view.

Mr. Helley from the committee charged with that duty, reported an address to the people of the United States, which was read and unanimously adopted, and ordered to be published. This address though occupying upwards of an hour in the reading, was listened to with the most profound attention by the audience. Several members made pertinent and able speeches in which they spoke of it in warm and glowing terms, complimented the author on the research and ability there displayed.

A resolution was offered by Mr. Phelps of Mass. and adopted, recommending a national anti-masonic convention to be held in September, 1835, in the city of Washington, unless otherwise ordered by the central committee of correspondence.

A vote of thanks was passed in favor of the central committee of correspondence, and for the continuance of their appointment till after the next presidential election.

A resolution was unanimously adopted thanking the president of the convention for the ability and impartiality displayed in the discharge of his duties, to which he responded in an eloquent and feeling address. A vote of thanks was also passed in favor of the other officers of the convention, for the prompt and able manner in which they had discharged their assigned duties. About 12 at night, the convention adjourned enue die.

ANTI-MASONS AND GOV. LINCOLN.

From the Boston Free Press.

Boston, Sept. 6, 1831.

His excellency governor Lincoln,

SIR,—At a convention of the anti-masonic members of the senate and house of representatives of this commonwealth, holden at the state house in Boston on the evening of the 17th of June last, it was recommended by resolve to the state anti-masonic committee of Massachusetts, to call a convention at such time and place and in such form as to them shall seem expedient, for the purpose of nominating candidates to be supported by the anti-masonic party at the gubernatorial election in November next.

The subject thus submitted to the undersigned committee, necessarily involves high and very delicate responsibilities. The frankness of your character, and your known republican principles are a sure guarantee, that you will not withhold from the people an explicit avowal of your sentiments, on all subjects where their rights and liberties are concerned.

You are aware that for five years past, disclosures have been made of the nature and principles of free-masonry, calculated to excite astonishment and alarm among a free people. These disclosures have occupied the attention of various state legislatures, of numerous county and state conventions and of one convention of eleven states of this union. About sixty members of the fraternity have been indicted, after the greatest difficulties, for crimes of the most odious character. These supposed criminals have not all been arraigned. Several have been brought to the courts of law, but not to justice! Free-masonry occupied the seat and justice was no longer there!

The same masonic government, the same oaths, obligations and penalties, which occasioned these wrongs in a neighboring state, exist with equal authority and force in this commonwealth, and so long as freemasons will adhere to them, the community is not safe. Anti-masons therefore are frank to avow their sentiments. They believe the existence of freemasonry to be dangerous to liberty, injurious to morality, detrimental to religion and wholly incompatible with our free institutions.—They wish, by peaceable, lawful and honorable means, to destroy the masonic institution, and not to injure free masons; but to bring them, as men and good citizens, back to their country.

The means they propose are free and public discussion—the truth and nothing but the truth, published and circulated on the subject of masonry and anti-masonry—and the use of the ballot box. But their suffrages cannot be given merely for the honor or profit of any anti-mason. They have much higher objects in view in the use of the ballot box. In addition to supplying the most suitable men for the various offices of government, it is to hold up the subject of masonry at every election, until public sentiment shall decree its annihilation.

The profound respect and personal regard, entertained for yourself by the anti-masons of Massachusetts, now increasing in a ratio unparalleled in the history of parties, induce the undersigned, in their behalf, to solicit, at least a brief expression of your sentiments, in reply to the following questions, with permission to use the same in such manner as may be deemed advisable.

Do you consider freemasonry a positive evil?—And if so, are you disposed to unite with the anti-masonic party in the use of peaceable, lawful and honorable means not inconsistent with the station you now occupy, in order, to free our country from the dominion and influence of freemasonry.

Your compliance with this request as soon as your convenience shall allow, will confer renewed obligations upon,

Sir, very respectfully, your fellow citizens,

ABNER PHILIPS,	WM. MARSTON,
GEORGE ODIORNE,	DANIEL WELD,
JOHN D. WILLIAMS,	JACOB HALL,
HENRY GASSETT,	BENJ. V. FRENCH,
BENJ. W. LAMB,	JOHN P. WHITEWELL,
THOMAS WALLEY,	JONATHAN FRENCH.

GOV. LINCOLN'S ANSWER.

Worcester, September 13, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—I had not the honor to receive until the 10th inst. your letter, under date of the 6th, and I have to regret, that in addition to this delay, the pressure of antecedent engagements has not permitted a more prompt reply to the interesting matter of its contents. The great respect which I sincerely entertain towards those who have addressed me, among whom I have the pleasure to recognize political and personal friends, some of whom have had opportunity, heretofore, of knowing intimately my opinions upon public subjects, and of closely observing the course of my official conduct, demands, that I should give an attentive and deliberate consideration to any subject, which they may deem worthy of formal communication.

Your letter contains an expression of the opinions of the anti-masonic party upon the character, influence, and tendency, of the institution of free-masonry, and conveys information of the proceedings of a convention of the anti-masonic members of the senate and house of representatives of this commonwealth, with a distinct intimation of your own views, in reference to the gubernatorial election in November next, and concludes with a request for "an expression of my sentiments in reply to the following questions, with permission to use the same in such a way as may be deemed advisable."

"Do you consider freemasonry a positive evil? And if so, are you disposed to unite with the anti-masonic party in the use of peaceable, lawful and honorable means not inconsistent with the station you now hold, in order to free our country from the dominion and influence of freemasonry?"

Before considering these precise interrogatories, I beg leave to advert to the manner and time in which they are proposed, as the occasion of much embarrassment, by placing me in a situation of peculiar delicacy, expressed, at least, in whatever way I may treat them, to misapprehension, and possibly even, to ungenerous and painful suspicion. It cannot be unknown to you, that at a convention of members of the legislature, in the month of June last, I was nominated for re-election, which nomination was then accepted, and that I now stand in the attitude of a candidate for the public suffrage.—Having been brought into the high office, which I have the honor to hold, and been thus long sustained in it by the favor of my fellow citizens, without the slightest personal effort to procure either its original bestowment, or subsequent continuance, except in earnest endeavors faithfully and acceptably to discharge its duties, I can never consent to dishonor the station by making it the object of private solicitation, compromise of principle, or of commitment to the arrangements and purposes of any party. If pledges for the future course of administration are now to be required of me, they will be given, by reference to former frank and explicit avowals of opinion on all known subjects of public moment, and to the character of past measures of executive action, rather, and better to be relied upon, than protestations and professions in view to a nomination to office, which can be brought to the test only in the event of a favorable issue to an election.

The subject of speculative freemasonry has never yet required the official engorgance of the executive department of this commonwealth. Neither that, nor its opposite, in any instance, hitherto, has been obtruded upon the councils of the state. With the former, it is well known, I have repeatedly disclaimed any association or sympathy, and the influence of the latter, as a motive to political and official action, has been as little felt in the administration of the government. With this state of things, I have reason to believe the great majority of my fellow citizens have, thus far, been content. But your letter, if I mistake not its import, suggests, in this respect, a new position for the executive to assume. In the reference made by you to the ballot box, and the avowed determination to carry the subject of freemasonry into our political elections, accompanied with the information that a convention is yet to be called for the purpose of nominating candidates to be supported by the anti-masonic party, at the gubernatorial election, there is a distinct admonition, that these candidates are to be selected with regard to their anti-masonic opinions, and that the honor of your support will be bestowed upon those only, who would give the influence of office to the measures of a party, professedly organized for the promotion and success of anti-masonry. Under such circumstances, with what propriety I could comply with any requirement, as a precedent condition to my own nomination, I humbly and respectfully submit to yourselves, in the exercise of a spirit of liberality and candor, to consider.

It therefore, in answer to your particular inquiries, the fact of my entire freedom from any connexion, at any and at all times, with the institution of freemasonry; if the most vigilant and cautious watchfulness to discover and guard against its attempted or supposed influence or bias in the administration of the government, a belief that the institution is wholly unnecessary and useless to the objects which it professes, and from its secrecy, is easily susceptible, under the direction of bad men, of being made an instrument of much mischief to the community; that its initiatory rites and mystical ceremonies, its obligations and penalties, in their form and manner as now disclosed and published, are justly reprehensible and offensive; the opinion that all extra-judicial oaths are unlawful, and that any engagement which may conflict with moral principle, or is inconsistent with fidelity to the state is, in itself, immediately and absolutely void,—if the deepest abhorrence and reprobation of the tragic scene acted in a neighboring state, and equal regret and indignation that the instigators, agents, and abettors in that foul deed of secret murder, the accessories before or after the fact, whoever they may be, and however associated, have been able, hitherto, triumphantly to evade the demands of justice and escape merited conviction and punishment,—if these opinions and sentiments long entertained, and at all times freely expressed, are not satisfactory, I have nothing further to offer. I have neither professions nor stipulations to make for the present occasion. The administration of government should never be identified with the measures of party. Sincerely and earnestly as I desire the dissolution and extinction of the institution of freemasonry, and greatly as I should rejoice in the voluntary abandonment of it by its members, from a conviction, that, at the best, in its character of secrecy and mystery, it is obnoxious to the spirit of republican jealousy, and has become the occasion of alarm and apprehension to many good and intelligent minds, and of excitement, division and dissensions among the people. As the chief magistrate of the commonwealth, I can unite myself with no combination of men, in means for its suppression. Neither can I consent to carry the controversy which exists on this subject, by the appeal of one portion of my fellow citizens against another, strike my constituents, into the chair of state. Believe me, gentlemen, this would be doing violence to the best interests of the community. It were indeed monstrous to doubt, that among masons there are loyal citizens and true hearted patriots, men who, although adhering to the craft, bear yet greater love to their country, to whom the mystic tie never suggested the possible violation of a moral principle, and who would not recognize an obligation inconsistent with the performance of every social and civil duty. When to this character is added talents and pre-eminent qualifications for usefulness, the people have a right to the services of such men in office, of which they are not to be deprived by the application of a principle of exclusion unknown to the laws and the constitution.

While I remain in the administration of the government, I shall endeavor steadily, impartially and independently, to pursue the great interests of the commonwealth, not suffering myself to be entangled in connexions with any party, but seeking the advice and grateful for the aid of the intelligent, the discreet, and the patriotic of all parties. If in this, I do not practically adopt the opinion, expressed in your letter, that "our country is under the domination and influence of freemasonry," nor yet subscribe to that other sentiment, that, "freemasons are to be brought, as men and good citizens, back to their country," it is because, that, in this favored commonwealth, the land of good institutions, of schools, and bibles, and moral and religious observances, I cannot distrust the fidelity of a numerous class of my fellow citizens, nor see elsewhere, in the errors and crimes of a few misguided, deluded, wretched men, evidence of the degradation and servitude of the nation.

For the very flattering assurances of respect and personal regard entertained towards me by the anti-masons of Massachusetts, which you are pleased to express, I beg you to accept my grateful acknowledgements.—These sentiments could have been received by me with satisfaction, only in the consciousness, that with purity of motive and singleness of purpose, I have devoted the best of my humble abilities impartially to the services of all my fellow citizens in the duties of the station which their unnumbered favor conferred upon me.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, with the most respectful consideration, your obedient servant.

¶ The "Boston Patriot" with reference to the preceding correspondence, says:

We place in our columns to day an interesting correspondence between governor Lincoln and the anti-masonic committee for this commonwealth. Governor Lincoln was addressed by the committee on the avowed object of obtaining his views of anti-masonry. Notwithstanding the delicacy of his present situation—he being the candidate of the national republican party for re-election as governor—he has not declined to answer the questions addressed him; but has frankly declared his unfavorable opinion of "speculative free-masonry,"—and as frankly has expressed his determination not to be made the leader of a crusade of political extermination against those who conscientiously differ from him in this opinion. His letter speaks the language of an honest and independent statesman. We hope it will be carefully and generally read; for we believe it will give gov. Lincoln a new and lasting claim to the confidence of his constituents. Anti-masons, at least those who do not expect from the governor any thing "inconsistent with the station he now occupies"—we should suppose would be satisfied with it.

An anti-masonic convention is summoned to be held in this city, October 4, for the purpose of nominating candidates for governor, &c.

And the "Boston Gazette" observes—The letter of governor Lincoln, we understand is not satisfactory to the anti-masonic state committee, who have notified the several county committees to meet in convention, in this city, on the 4th of October next, to nominate a candidate in opposition to him. Lieutenant governor Winthrop, it is said, has sent the committee a letter which they consider highly satisfactory; he will probably be nominated for re-election as anti-masonic candidate. Hon. Samuel Lathrop is spoken of as the anti-masonic candidate for the office of governor. Mr. Merrick of Worcester, general Hoyt, and some other gentlemen, are also named for the same office. We shall have warm work in November.

MEXICAN REPUBLIC.

We are glad to see by the following, that this long and much distracted country, has a present prospect of internal peace. Let the generals become farmers, and manufacturers, and all will be well.

The national congress convened at the capital on the 1st August. The session was opened by a speech from the vice president Bustamante, as follows:

Fellow-citizens, deputies and senators:
The circumstances under which the ordinary session of the present year was opened, required that the attention of congress as well as that of government should be fixed exclusively on the discussion of the measures, which, having for their object the re-establishment of peace, should have been considered of absolute preference. Now that this great and important end is obtained, the executive, with the advice of the council of government, calls you to a new task, and presents for your enlightened deliberation those subjects which then could not be taken into consideration, and which on account of their urgency and importance I announced to you at the time that the convocation of an extraordinary session would be indispensable.

Therefore, gentlemen, you will have to occupy yourselves with the ratification of the treaties concluded with several powers, which treaties, while they confirm to the republic the degree of consideration which it is entitled to among the sovereign and independent nations, establish our foreign relations by the solemn recognition of our political existence.

Many branches of the internal administration will claim equally your attention, whether it be the improvement of the public treasury, and the administration of justice, or the advancement of industry, or finally, the regulation of the army and navy.

The nation finds itself at this day in a state to unfold all its elements, so as to arrive in a short time at that prosperity which it is promised with, by its situation, its climate, its natural wealth, and the liberty of its institutions. All nations that have been wearied with repeated calamities, of which, unfortunately, we have not been exempt, have confessed that the happiness of a nation is not enjoyed without the strict observance of the laws, and a due respect to the constituted authorities; and experience has taught them that the excesses of demagogues are no less ruinous than the oppression of tyrants, and that order and moderation only, secure the general good of societies as well as the particular happiness of its individuals. Encourage, gentlemen, these excellent dispositions with the wisdom of your measures, and the Mexican people will ere long be the most happy of the universe.

FIRST LAW AGAINST SLAVERY.

The following document is said to be the first act of any government designed to prevent enslaving the negroes. It was recently copied by the venerable Moses Brown, of Providence, from the records of the colony of Rhode Island, and inserted in a Providence paper. It does great credit to Rhode Island.

"At a general court held at Warwick, the 18th of May, 1652.

"Whereas there is a common course practised among Englishmen, to buy negroes to that end they may have them for service or slaves forever; for the preventing of such practices among us, let it be ordered, that no black mankind or white being shall be forced, by covenant, bond, or otherwise, to serve any man or his assignees longer than ten years, or until they come to be twenty-four years of age, if they be taken in under fourteen, from the time of their coming within the liberties of this colony—at the end or term of ten years to set them free, as the manner is with the English servants. And that man that will not let them go free or shall sell them away elsewhere, to that end they may be enslaved to others for a longer time, he or they shall forfeit to the colony forty pounds."

To the credit of the members that enacted this law says Mr. Brown, I subjoin their names from the record.

The general officers were John Smith, president; Thomas Olney, general assistant, from Providence; Samuel Gorton, from Warwick; John Green, general recorder; Randal Holden, treasurer; Hugh Bewett, general sergeant.

The commissioners were from Providence,—Robert Williams, Gregory Dexter, Richard Waterman, Thomas Harris, William Wickenden, and Hugh Bewett; from Warwick, Samuel Gorton, John Wickes, John Smith, Randal Holden, John Green, Jr. and Ezekiel Holliman.

"NEGRO COLLEGE."

From the New Haven Palladium.

"Our readers, no doubt, will be surprised at the caption of this paragraph, and will wonder what we mean by 'Negro College.' We will inform them that we mean, without any jesting, to say that there has been an attempt, a serious attempt, to get up an institution in this place for the education of colored men. The blacks for a few years past have been treated with attention and kindness by the inhabitants of this city. Two or three of our citizens have devoted much time and money for bettering their condition, but the zeal of a few has constantly increased, until a project has been brought forward, which if carried into execution would ruin the prosperity of the city. New Haven was fixed upon, by the convention held in Philadelphia some time since, for the location of a black college. Our citizens called a public meeting to take the subject into consideration, and the following resolutions were advocated by Judge Daggett, N. Smith, R. I. Rogers, and and J. H. Townsend, esqrs. and adopted by about 700 freemen. The rev. S. S. Jocelyn and three others opposed, and voted against them.

At a city meeting, duly warned and held at the city hall, in the city of New Haven, on Saturday, the 10th day of September, 1851, to take into consideration a project for the establishment in this city of a college for the education of colored youth, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz:

Whereas endeavors are now making to establish a college in this city for the education of the colored population of the United States, the West Indies, and other countries adjacent; and in connection with this establishment the immediate abolition of slavery in the United States is not only recommended and encouraged by the advocates of the proposed college, but demanded as a right; and whereas an omission to notice these measures may be construed as implying either indifference to, or approval of the same:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the sentiments of our citizens should be expressed on these subjects, and that the calling of this meeting by the mayor and aldermen is ^{seemingly} approved by the citizens of this place.

Resolved, That inasmuch as slavery does not exist in Connecticut, and where it is permitted in other states depends on the municipal laws of the state which allows it, and over which neither any other state nor the congress of the United States has any control, that the propagation of sentiments favorable to the immediate emancipation of slaves, in disregard of the civil institutions of the states in which they belong, and as auxiliary thereto, the contemporaneous founding of colleges for educating colored people, is an unwarrantable and dangerous interference with the internal concerns of the other states, and ought to be discouraged.

And whereas, in the opinion of this meeting, Yale college, the institutions for the education of females, and the other schools already existing in this city, are important to the community and the general interests of science, and as such have been deservedly patronized by the public, and the establishment of a college in the same place to educate the colored population, is incompatible with the prosperity if not the existence of the present institutions of learning, and will be destructive of the best interests of the city. And believing, as we do, that if the establishment of such a college in any part of the country were deemed expedient, it should never be imposed on any community without their consent.

Therefore, resolved, by the mayor, aldermen, common council, and freemen of the city of New Haven, in city meeting assembled, That we will resist the establishment of the proposed college in this place by every lawful means.

A and on motion it was voted that the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the mayor, and countersigned by the clerk, and published in all the newspapers of this city.

DENNIS KIMBERLY, mayor.

ANOMALY IN NATURE.

The undersigned, agent of a convention of delegates, representing the free colored people of the United States, held in this city, June last, conceives it his duty, and holds as his privilege, in the name of said convention, and in his capacity as agent, to contradict the misrepresentation, and deny the principles, propagated through the several papers, by an extraordinary public meeting, held at the City Hall, in the city of New Haven, on Saturday, 10th inst.

By what motives the mayor, alderman, common council, and freemen of New Haven, could have been influenced, or by what means excited to such extraordinary measures, we cannot conjecture. We are not accustomed to being opposed by such dignitaries; heretofore the rabble, and they only have thrown themselves in the way of our lawful and praiseworthy undertakings, nor can we account for his great combat, with a man of straw, and that too of their own creating, by these men learned in law, and high in authority. Such a formidable array, since the days of antiquity, has not been seen, nor do we believe would be, until the end of time, against a cause so feeble and so unassuming.

The facts are simply these; the above named convention appointed a committee of their own body, to take into consideration the situation of the free colored people of this country, and to report such measures as in their wisdom they deemed most prudent and advisable, for the amelioration of their condition, carefully guarding against any interference whatever with the slave. The committee reported as among the most efficient means, the establishment of a manual labor college, in which habits of industry might be inculcated, and a mechanical or agricultural profession obtained, while poring classical studies.

These were the simple unvarnished views of the convention, in reference to the college; and how our informed fellow citizens of New Haven, can compare them with "immediate emancipation, insurrection or interference with the internal concerns and laws of the south," we are at a loss to conceive.

We utterly deny having connected any such ideas with the establishment of our college. Whatever independent views, individuals of the convention or friends of the college may entertain, we do not pretend to say, nor do we intend to account for. Our object is to ask the passage of all the wise and good, in behalf of the contemplated institution. An institution whose object and plan, we think, need only be known, to secure the good wishes and prayers of this enlightened community. We hope the opposition of our opponents and slanderers, whose hearts we trust are right, while their heads are very wrong, will deter none of our friends and fellow citizens, in this place or elsewhere, from lending us their liberal patronage. We shall wait in person on the citizens of this place, during a few weeks to come, to receive their expression of good wishes and friendship to our brethren of color, and the institution in which they are engaged.

Confident that the authorities of New Haven have no rights nor powers by which they can lawfully prevent the location of the college in that place, yet as friends to peace and good order, being authorized, we have altered our subscription book, so as to read New Haven or elsewhere, for if the principles and doings of the meeting on the 10th inst. be a true sample of that city, which, by the way, we cannot believe, we rejoice in being delivered from such a community.

In conclusion, we think the dignitaries of this seat of science, have descended below themselves. It is beneath the gentleman, the patriot, or the christian, to endeavor to crush a feeble institution in its infant state, and an institution too, got up for the very best of purposes. Let the citizens of New Haven inform themselves on the subject of our college, and atone for the injury they have done us, by liberally patronizing the institution.

SAMUEL E. CORNISH, agent of the convention.

Philadelphia, Sept. 14, 1831.

N. B. The agent of the convention, who is now soliciting subscriptions in this city, feeling his cause injured by the gratuitous insertion of the proceedings of the New Haven meeting, respectfully claims of those editors who inserted the former, a place for this in reply.

THE NEW OLIVE BRANCH.

TO THE CITIZENS OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

No. XX.—New Series, No. 8.

"The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several states. The right to adjust these duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely incidental to that power, that it is difficult to suppose the existence of one without the other. The states have delegated their whole authority over imports to the general government without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the states, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection, does not exist in them, consequently if it be not possessed by the general government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry; and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case: this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the states, must be within the scope of the authority on this subject, expressly delegated to congress."—President Jackson's message to congress, December 6, 1830.

"It becomes the duty of this house to resort, to a considerable extent, at least as far as proposed, to the only remedy, the protection of manufactures. To this it has been objected that the country is not prepared. He could not for a moment yield to the assertion. On the contrary, he firmly believed that the country is prepared, even to maturity, for the introduction of manufactures."—From Mr. Calhoun's speech in support of the minimum valuation of cotton goods.

"The home trade, consisting in the exchange of agricultural productions for articles of manufacture produced in our own country, will for a long time to come, furnish the safest and least dangerous—the least expensive, and the least immoral—the most protective and the most patriotic employment of capital, however rapid and accumulated. Foreign trade tends to denationalize the affections of those whose prosperity is dispersed in foreign countries—whose interests are connected with foreign interests, and whose capital is but partially invested at the place of their domicile."—Judge Cooper's preface to the Emporium—1813.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS:

Among the most alarming circumstances attending the effervescence to the south, is the fact, that a large portion of the most decided supporters of the union and enemies of nullification, and its counterpart, a dissolution of the union, with all its attendant horrors, are firm believers in the unconstitutionality of the protecting system, and appear to require its entire abolition. Should the total repeal of the protecting system, on the ground of its unconstitutionality, be a sine qua non with them, as it appears to be with the nullifiers, all hopes of a compromise and the restoration of a good understanding on the subject, are at an end. Were the question at issue, the quantum of protection necessary to support our manufactures, a spirit of compromise might probably remove the difficulty without much trouble. But the middle, eastern, and western states cannot, and will not, give up the system. It would produce general ruin among them. For the sake of harmony, the protecting duties may be modified, and some of them greatly reduced. Many of them are injudicious, and some of them oppressive, even to the manufacturers themselves. This is partly, and I believe I may say chiefly, owing to the enemies of the system, who, particularly in 1828, in the hope of defeating the tariff enacted in that year, loaded it with so much dead weight, as they hoped, would render it so obnoxious to its friends, as to induce them to reject it. In this refined Machiavelian policy they were grievously disappointed.

It was hoped, and believed, that the mass of evidence advanced in support of the constitutionality of the protecting system was so conclusive that no person, not incurably prejudiced, could withstand it. And it is deeply to be lamented that those hopes, apparently so rational, have not been realized.

It is truly remarkable that in opposition to the unquestioned practice of the government for thirty-five years—to the recommendation of five presidents—to the decided opinions and practice, not only of some of the illustrious men who framed the constitution, but of others who are regarded as oracles by the south, (e. g. Mr. Lowndes and Mr. Calhoun, both advocates of the protecting system) there has not been a single substantial argument advanced. It is gravely stated, that the power to regulate commerce, given to congress by the constitution, does not imply a power to destroy commerce. When this position, on which so much stress is laid, is admitted to the fullest extent, what does it prove? What bearing has it on the question? To render it any way available, it would be necessary to prove that the protecting system destroys commerce: whereas a reference to the proper documents will prove that our commerce and navigation have been regularly increasing, notwithstanding the galling prohibitions and prohibitory duties to which the most of our staples are subject in Europe, which receives little or nothing from us, but what it cannot dispense with.

To the evidence I collected on this subject, and published in 1826 and 1830, I can add little or nothing. It appears full and conclusive—and therefore I shall once more, with such improvements as have since occurred to me, respectfully submit it to the calm consideration of the public. I trust that no apology is necessary for the republication, as the changes are rung daily on the opposite doctrine, without the pretence of any novel reasoning.

I proceed to prove the want of foundation of the unconstitutionality of the tariff:—

1. By the uninterrupted exercise of the power of protection from the year 1789 till the year 1828 inclusive, a period of forty years, during 36 of which it was never called in question.

2. By the utterly erroneous logic of the chief, I might say the only argument on which the charge of unconstitutionality rests.

3. By the explicit recommendation of five presidents, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe and Jackson.

4. By the replies of both houses of congress to some of those recommendations.

5. By the advocacy of the system in the congress of 1789-90, by some of the first men this country ever produced, among whom were some of the most enlightened of those who framed the constitution, and whom it would be the height of absurdity to suppose ignorant of the meaning of the instrument they were four months maturing.

6. By the votes of men of high standing in the congress of 1816.

1. The uninterrupted exercise of the power.

To the second act passed by the first congress, July 4, 1789, was prefixed an explicit announcement of the power in question, in these words:—

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares and merchandise imported."

During the whole period that intervened from that day until the year 1828, this power has been exercised in probably from a dozen to twenty instances—and until the year 1824, no doubt was ever expressed on the subject, by any of those powerful members of congress who opposed many of the details of the system as inexpedient, some of whom were deadly hostile to it, under the idea of its being injurious to their constituents.

II. Erroneous logic of the objection.

At the expiration of 35 years, a new light sprung up on the subject. Col. Hamilton, in the session of 1823-4, presumed he had discovered the unconstitutionality of the tariff, on finding that a proposition brought forward in the federal convention to authorize congress to encourage manufactures by "bounties," had been rejected—and as bounties and protecting duties produce the same effect, ergo, a duty for protection was a bounty!!! and the rejection of the proposed power of granting bounties clearly implied a similar rejection of protecting duties!!!

This logic goes to destroy precision in language. It cannot be sustained. The question might be submitted to a committee of the first philologists in the British dominions, or in the United States, and it would be scouted unanimously by the whole of them. If a protecting duty be a bounty, because it produces the same effects as a bounty, then we might say a horse is a camel, and a camel a horse—a stage-coach a phaeton, and a phaeton a stage-coach—a common dwelling house a palace, and a palace a common dwelling house—a merchant vessel a man of war, and a man of war a merchant vessel—for in the first case, both animals are beasts of burden—in the second, both vehicles serve for the conveyance of persons—in the third, both buildings serve as habitations for human beings—and in the fourth, both are formed for navigating the seas.

Considering the splendid talents of col. Hamilton, this kind of logic was not to have been expected from him. It belongs to barristers of a different class, who are not to be mentioned the same day of the week with col. Hamilton.

III. Presidential recommendations.

General Washington's speech to congress, of Jan. 11, 1790, declares that—

"The safety and interests of a free people require that congress should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly military supplies."

"The advancement of agriculture, commerce and manufactures, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation."

Again—His speech of December, 1796, explicitly holds out the same doctrine:—

"Congress have repeatedly, and not without successful effect, attracted the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much importance not to insure a continuance of these efforts in every way which shall appear eligible."

Mr. Jefferson, in his message of 1802, states, that—

"To cultivate peace; maintain commerce and navigation; to foster our fisheries; and protect manufactures, adapted to our circumstances, &c. are the landmarks by which to guide ourselves in all our relations."

From Mr. Jefferson's message of 1808:—

"The situation into which we have been thus forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufacturing improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent."

Extract from the message of Mr. Madison, November 5, 1811:—

"A portion of your deliberations cannot but be well bestowed on the just and sound policy of securing to our manufactures the success they have attained, and are still attaining, under the influence of causes not permanent."

Extract from the message of Mr. Madison, Dec. 5, 1815:—

"Under circumstances giving powerful impulse to manufacturing industry, it has made among us a progress, and exhibited an efficiency, which justify the belief, that with a protection not more than is due to the enterprising citizens, whose interests are now at stake, it will become, at any early day, not only safe against occasional competitions from abroad, but a source of domestic wealth, and even of external commerce."

In selecting the branches more especially entitled to public patronage, a preference is obviously claimed by such as will relieve the United States from a dependence on foreign supplies, even subject to casual failures, for articles necessary for public defence, or connected with the primary wants of individuals. It will be an additional recommendation of particular manufactures, where the materials for them are extensively drawn from our agriculture, and consequently impact and insure to that great fund of national prosperity and independence, an encouragement which cannot fail to be rewarded."

From the message of president Monroe, Dec. 1819:—

"It is deemed of importance to encourage our domestic manufactures. In what manner the evils which we have adverted to may be remedied, and how it may be practicable in other respects to afford them further encouragement, requiring due regard to the other great interests of the nation, is submitted to the wisdom of congress."

From the same, Dec. 3d, 1822.

"Satisfied I am, whatever may be the abstract doctrine in favor of unrestricted commerce, provided all nations would concur in it, and it was not liable to be interrupted by war, which has never occurred, and cannot be expected, that there are strong reasons, applicable to our situation and relations with other countries, which impose on us the obligation to cherish and sustain our manufactures."

From the same, Dec. 1823:

"Having communicated my views to congress at the commencement of the last session, respecting the encouragement which ought to be given to our manufactures, and the principle on which it should be founded, I have only to add, that these views remain unchanged, and that the present state of those countries with which we have the most immediate political relations, and greatest commercial intercourse, tends to confirm them. Under this impression I recommend a review of the tariff, for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defence and independence of the country."

To these presidential recommendations let me add that of the secretary of the treasury, W. H. Crawford, esq. from his report, December, 1819:

"It is believed that the present is a favorable moment for affording efficient protection to that increasing and important interest, if it can be done consistently with the general interest of the nation."

IV. Congressional replies.

Extract from the reply of the senate to the speech of gen. Washington, January, 1790:

"Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, forming the basis of the wealth and strength of our confederated republic, must be the frequent subject of our deliberations, and shall be advanced by all the proper means in our power."

Extract from the reply of the house of representatives:

"We concur with you in the sentiment that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, are entitled to legislative protection."

Extract from the reply of the senate to the speech of gen. Washington, December, 1796:

"The necessity of accelerating the establishment of certain useful branches of manufactures, by the intervention of legislative aid and protection, and the encouragement due to agriculture by the emission of boards, (composed of intelligent individuals), to patronize this primary pursuit of society, are subjects which will readily engage our most serious attention."

V. Advocacy of the system by the congress of 1789-90.

Mr. Madison "moved to lay an impost of eight cents on all beer imported. He did not think this would give a monopoly; but he hoped it would be such an encouragement as to induce the manufacture to take deep root in every state in the union."

Lloyd's debates of congress, vol. 1. p. 65.

The same—"The states that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these states retained the power of making regulations of trade, they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions. By adopting the present constitution, they must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here.—Idem, p. 24.

The same—"There may be some manufactures which, being once formed, can advance towards perfection without any adventitious aid; while others, for want of the fostering hand of government, will not be able to grow at all. Legislative attention will therefore be necessary to collect the proper objects for this purpose.—Idem, p. 26.

Mr. Clymer "did not object to this mode of encouraging manufacturers, and obtaining revenue, by combining the two objects in one bill: he was satisfied that a political necessity existed for both the one and the other.—Idem, p. 21.

He "hoped gentlemen would be disposed to extend a degree of patronage to a manufacture, [steel] which a moment's reflection would convince them was highly deserving protection.—Idem, p. 62.

Mr. Carroll "moved to insert window and other glass a manufacture of this article was begun in Maryland, and attended with considerable success. If the legislature was to grant a small encouragement, it would be permanently established.—Idem, p. 24.

Mr. Wadsworth—"By moderating the duties, we shall obtain revenue, and give that encouragement to manufactures which is intended.—Idem, p. 118.

Mr. Ames "thought this a useful and accommodating manufacture, [unails] which yielded a clear gain of all that it sold for, but the cost of the material; the labor employed in it would be thrown away probably in many instances. He hoped the article would remain in the bill."—Idem, p. 81.

The same.—"The committee were already informed of the flourishing situation of the manufacture of (candles), but they ought not to join the gentleman from South Carolina. (Mr. Tucker) in concluding that it did not therefore deserve legislative protection; he had no doubt but the committee would concur in laying a small protecting duty in favor of this manufacture."—Idem, p. 82.

Mr. Fitzsimons—"was willing to allow a small duty, because it conformed to the policy of the state who thought it proper in this manner to protect their manufactures."—Idem, p. 13.

The same.—"It being my opinion that an enumeration of articles will tend to clear away difficulties, I wish as many to be selected as possible; for this reason I have prepared myself with an additional number; among these are some calculated to encourage the production of our country, and protect our infant manufactures."—Idem, p. 17.

Mr. Hartly—"If we consult the history of the ancient world, [Europe], we shall see that they have thought proper for some time past to give great encouragement to establish manufactures by laying such partial duties on the importation of foreign goods as to give the home manufactures a considerable advantage in both price and quality." I think it verment should extend to all these manufactures which will tend to national utility. Our stock of materials is, in many instances, equal to the greatest demand, and our artisans sufficient to work them up, even for exportation. In those cases, I take it to be the policy of every enlightened nation to give their manufacturers that degree of encouragement necessary to perfect them, without oppressing the other parts of the community; and under this encouragement, the industry of the manufacturer will be employed to add to the wealth of the nation."—Idem, p. 22.

Mr. White—"In order to charge specified articles of manufacture so as to encourage our domestic ones, it will be necessary to examine the present state of each throughout the union."—Idem, p. 29.

Mr. Bland, [of Va.], "thought that very little revenue was likely to be collected from the importation of this article, (wells); and as it was to be had in sufficient quantities within the United States, perhaps a tax amounting to a prohibition would be proper."—Idem, p. 66.

"Mr. Bland informed the committee that there were mines opened in Va. capable of supplying the whole of the United States; and if some restraint was laid on the importation of foreign coal, those mines might be worked to advantage."—Idem, p. 97.

Mr. Doudinot—"I shall certainly move for it, (the article of glass), as I suppose we are capable of manufacturing this as well as many others. In fact, it is well known, that we have and can do it as well as most nations; the materials being almost all produced in our country."—Idem, p. 28.

The same.—"Let us take, then, the resolution of congress in 1783, and make it the basis of our system, adding only such protecting duties as are necessary to support the manufactures established by the legislatures of the manufacturing states."—Idem, p. 43.

Mr. Simmickson—"declared himself a friend to this manufacture, [beer], and thought if the duty was laid high enough to effect a prohibition, the manufacture would increase, and of consequence the price would be lessened."—Idem, p. 65.

Mr. Fitzsimons—"moved to lay a duty of two cents per pound on tallow candles. The manufacture of candles is an important manufacture, and far advanced towards perfection. I have no doubt but in a few years we shall be able to supply the consumption of every part of the continent."—Idem, p. 67.

Mr. Lawrence—"thought that if candles were an object of considerable importation, they ought to be taxed for the sake of obtaining revenue; and if they were not imported in considerable quantities, the burden upon the consumer would be small, while it tended to cherish a valuable manufacture."—Idem, p. 68.

The same.—"Suppose 5s. per cwt. were imposed [on unwrought steel], it might be, as stated, a partial duty—but would not the evil be soon overbalanced by the establishment of such an important manufacture?"—Idem, p. 69.

The same.—"The necessity of continuing those encouragements which the state legislatures have deemed proper, exists in a considerable degree. Therefore it will be politic in the government of the United States, to continue such duties until their object is accomplished."—Idem, p. 67.

Mr. Smith, [of S. C.]—"The people of South Carolina are willing to make sacrifices to encourage the manufacturing and maritime interests of their sister states."—Idem, p. 212.

VI. Congressional votes in 1816.

That Mr. Lowndes was equal in point of talents to col. Hamilton—that he was as fully able to decide correctly on the spirit and meaning of the constitution—that he was as sacredly and scrupulously exact in the observance of his solemn oath to support that instrument—and that he was as feelingly alive to the rights and interests of the south, and as zealous to protect them, as col. Hamilton, col. Hayne, or Mr. Cheves, will not be questioned by the most partial friend of those gentlemen; and if I prove that this Telamon Ajax of southern rights, was in favor of the protecting system, it ought to make col. Hamilton pause in his career, and review and correct his opinions on the subject.

The highest rate of protection ever afforded to American manufactures, previously to the tariff of 1823, was that, which subjected all coarse cotton below 25 cents a square yard, to a duty of 25 per cent. on the assumed cost of 25 cents.

On the 6th of April, 1816, a motion was made by Mr. Tucker, to strike out this clause, which, had it succeeded, would have prevented the success of that all important manufacture, coarse cotton goods, which has conferred so much advantage on the country, and afforded such an excellent market for our cotton. The motion was rejected by a very decisive majority—82 yeas, 61 yeas.

South Carolina had eight members in that congress, of whom six, viz. Wm. Lowndes, John C. Calhoun, John J. Chappell, Wm. Mayrant, Henry Middleton, and Wm. Woodward, esqrs. voted in favor of this high duty, which according to the first cost, varied from 25 to 100 per cent. and probably averaged at least 75. Messrs. Calhoun, Mayrant, and Crawford, went further. They voted that the minimum should be fixed at 30 cents the square yard.

So far as regards Mr. Lowndes, this vote is conclusive. But there is still further testimony, from the National Intelligencer—and let me observe, en passant, that at that time the debates were taken down very briefly, so that they do not furnish any of the details of the luminous speeches of this gentleman. The notice of the course he steered is very brief, but sufficiently explicit to show that he was an advocate of the protecting system, on this most latitudinarian feature—of course at daggers' points with Mr. Hamilton.

"Mr. Lowndes entered into an ample and particular defence of the system reported, on the subject of cottons, by the committee of ways and means."—National Intelligencer, March 28, 1816.

"Mr. Lowndes observed, that he believed the manufacture of woollens, and particularly of blankets, required a decided present encouragement."—Idem, March 27, 1816.

I well know the bias under which every man labors in favor of a cause which he advocates, as well as of the facts and arguments by which he supports it—and therefore I may greatly overrate the force of those I here advance. But making all due allowance for this bias, I am inexpressibly deceived, if the above evidence in favor of the constitutionality of the protecting system, do not establish it beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt. Indeed, did I not know the tenacity with which statesmen and philosophers adhere to dogmas which they have promulgated and defended, and on which they have staked their reputation, I should hope that col. Hamilton himself would be struck with the host of illustrious names arrayed against his theory, and magnanimously acknowledge its untenableness. We have on the one side—uninterrupted and unquestioned practice for 35 years—General Washington, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, Mr. Ames, Mr. Fitzsimons, Mr. Clymer, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Archer, Mr. Wadsworth, &c. &c.; and on the other, col. Hamilton and his school—a school resting on the basis of the most unsound logic—and created in times of effervescence, of which times the characteristic, in all ages and in all countries, has been, to receive, with credulity, opinions promulgated with confidence, by leading individuals, however sandy the foundation on which the superstructure is raised.

HAMILTON.

Philadelphia, Sept. 1, 1851.

P. S.—Some apology is due for the extreme length of this essay, which nothing could justify but the im-

*This may require some explanation. Cotton goods that cost 6, 8, 10, or 12 cents per square yard, were assumed to have cost 25 cents; and as the duty was 25 per cent. on this assumed cost, it follows that the duties on the articles costing as above, were 100, 75, 60, and 50 per cent.

mense importance of the question discussed to the peace and permanence of the union, and the advantage of placing the whole of the arguments together before the reader.

It is earnestly requested, and confidently hoped, that the printers in the southern states—even those who doubt or deny the constitutionality of the protecting system—will display their impartiality by inserting this essay, to enable their readers to judge understandingly on the mighty subject.

"FREE TRADE" AT NEW ORLEANS.

In our last paper we briefly noticed the call of a "free trade" meeting at New Orleans, and the issue of it—since which we have received the following more particular account of what took place, in the Mercantile Advertiser. It may amuse some of our readers.

The great anti tariff nullification meeting.—A most singular occurrence took place in this city on Thursday night last; it has perhaps no example in any register of political affairs. A notice appeared in the Louisiana Advertiser of this city on Wednesday morning last, of a meeting to be held of "the friends of free trade, at Hewlett's coffee house, on the following evening at 8 o'clock, to appoint delegates to the free trade convention to be held at Philadelphia on the 30th of September." A respectable number of citizens accordingly attended. After waiting for some time beyond the hour appointed for the meeting, and no person of the free trade party appearing to take the lead in organizing the meeting, or to do any act common to any party calling a public assemblage of the people; the noise of many tongues, the laugh of ridicule, and the jeering of the sarcastic, showed that great dissatisfaction prevailed among all, tariff and anti-tariff; at last, however, a gentleman in the crowd, called out for Mr. McConnell to be placed in the chair. Immediately a loud and general exclamation of approbation burst forth from the people, and upon their reiterated request that he should consent to occupy the station, he ascended the rostrum. Silence now prevailed throughout the hall. The Dr. then addressed the meeting. We shall attempt only to give the substance of what he said.

"I have been summoned fellow citizens, and very unexpectedly to me, to preside over this meeting; the object of which it may be inferred I have in my power to explain. Except, however, as far as it is made known by the notice in the Louisiana Advertiser of yesterday, I am ignorant. It would seem from the notice, that the purpose for which this meeting was requested, is to elect delegates, to meet others from several sections of the union, in a convention, to be held in the city of Philadelphia on the 30th of the present month. The object of this convention is, so far as I understand, to effect a co-operation of the friends of free trade, throughout the United States, to procure a repeal of the tariff system; or in the language of some writers to establish "state rights and free trade." As respects, however, the motives which dictated the Advertiser in calling a meeting of the advocates of free trade in this city, I as well as many other citizens conceive them to be, nothing more nor less, than an effort to prop the remaining popularity of Andrew Jackson in this state. I am, however, fellow-citizens, not a friend directly or indirectly to the doctrines of nullification, and, therefore, did not come here with any view to countenance any measures that tend in the least to sustain them—I am a friend to the union; to the happiness and prosperity of our common country.

For fear fellow-citizens that in calling me to the chair every person present may not be apprised of my principles, or may be under some mistake respecting them; you will pardon me if I state as briefly as I can what they are. Most of you, fellow-citizens, said Dr. McConnell, knew me from 1824 until 1829 an enthusiastic supporter of Andrew Jackson, but from the recent scenes at Washington, so disgraceful to our country, together with the general course of president Jackson's administration, his weakness and inconsistencies, and above all, his intention of being again a candidate for the presidency, contrary to his private, as well as public declarations, I have ceased to be his political advocate; and I now avail myself of this public occasion, thus candidly to say so, and before this assembly of the people to declare my secession from the ranks, which but a few months ago, I was proud of being enrolled in.

Fellow-citizens, not only by his public declarations—not only by those made to several other individuals do I condemn president Jackson, but to me did he say in 1829, and in the city of Washington—"that nothing on earth would induce him again, to be a candidate for the chief magistracy of the republic"—for in this declaration he deceived me, his friend. Here the feelings of the speaker gave great solemnity to his utterance, and extending an arm in a very expressive manner, he said, that for the sin of which he had been guilty, and of which he was now convinced, in having been a partizan to support general Jackson for the presidency, he trusted that the mercy of a wise and benevolent God would forgive him. In conclusion Dr. McConnell said: as the immediate object of the meeting has entirely failed, I beg leave to propose to you, fellow-citizens, that it be adjourned, until the first day of September, nineteen hundred and thirty-one.

We cannot say what number of anti-tariffites, or Jackson men, or nullifiers were present; we only know that the speech of Dr. McConnell was received with evidences of great approbation, and in a short time afterwards the greater part of the people retired.

If in giving the account of the "free trade and state rights party," we inadvertently should have made any statements deemed not consistent with facts, we presume the Journals of the free trade party, in their account of the meeting, will correct us. C.

GENERAL BERNARD AND THE PRESIDENT.

From the New York Standard.

Washington City, 8th July, 1831.

To Andrew Jackson, president of the U. States.

SIR,—In 1816, under the auspices of the illustrious Lafayette, I received, from the people of the United States, the favor of serving as an engineer in the army. From that epoch to this day, I have been employed in the military organization of the frontiers, and in the planning of fortifications destined to their defence; I have also been employed in the framing of projects relating to a general system of roads and canals throughout the union, and on various other duties connected with military establishments and internal improvements.

The strong sympathy between the union and my native land, has been to me a powerful incitement to perform my duties to the best of my ability. Should my humble services have repaid partially what I owe to a great people, which, on all occasions, has shown to me so much liberality and confidence, I remain conscious, that those services will secure to me an honorable place in the estimation of my countrymen in France.

Now, aware that the noble task to which I have been associated is completed within the agency assigned to me, and conscious that the present unsettled state of Europe, and the political interdependency of my native country, place me under the moral obligation to tender once more my humble services to France, I beg of you, most respectfully to accept of my resignation.

The habits of my family raised in this land of peace and happiness; my feelings of devotion towards so many generous and hospitable friends;—my sense of gratitude towards the members of the administration, render this determination most painful to me; but it is a sacrifice which I owe to the cause of this age of turmoil and political struggle. I find, however, a consolation in the hope that my motives will be generously appreciated by the statesman and the patriot, whom they are most respectfully submitted.

Be so indulgent, sir, as to accept my thanks for the liberal patronage you have constantly bestowed upon me since my arrival in this land of freedom, and to believe in the sentiments of the unalterable gratitude of your most respectful servant,

Washington, July 9, 1831.

GENERAL,—Your letter is received tendering your resignation of the post, to which, fourteen years ago, your own well earned reputation, and the friendship of the most illustrious and beloved of the adopted sons of my country, were your passport. The knowledge of you afforded by your long residence among us, has justified the high expectations created by such an introduction; and it could not but be a cause of deep regret, to the nation that any circumstances should arise to deprive it of services so highly appreciated. That the regret is greatly enhanced by the nature of the circumstances which impel you to this step, you understand us too well to doubt. You know how strong are our sympathies with every branch of the great family of man struggling for self government—how deep, with the noble people to whose generous and gallant spirit we were so greatly indebted in our own struggle for this inestimable right. Here, as your observation has satisfied you, the "noble task" is done—our independence is beyond doubt or danger; and that any shocks which the cause may be destined to encounter in your native land, will only serve to prove that it rests there on an equally immovable base, is among the most cherished hopes of the people from which you are about to separate.

Rest assured, general, that your motives are understood and appreciated: I release you from the service of my country, under the conviction that in conducting your family from this abode of liberty and peace, to one which the designs of Providence may yet destine to be a theatre of strife and turmoil, you are actuated by that love of your land which ever lives in a sound heart, and that affection for the great cause which characterizes the enlightened and uncorrupted minds of the age. With this assurance, accept for yourself and family, my best wishes for your safe return to the bosom of your country, and for the enjoyment of every happiness.

ANDREW JACKSON.

SIMON BERNARD,—brig. gen'l. in service of the U. S.

BEAUMARCHAIS' CLAIM.

This claim of a foreign speculator on the government, for supplies furnished during the revolutionary war, after harassing each successive congress for more than fifty years, has at length been settled by Mr. Riva's treaty with France, at an expense of about a million of dollars. The magnitude of the claim, and its connection with history, render it deserving of attention.

The court of France early manifested interest in the controversy between Great Britain and her colonies. In 1776, when Franklin was acting as colonial agent in London, the French ministers there sought interviews with him, and impressed the sagacious printer with the belief that the King of France was disposed to fan the flame of contention. As the contest deepened, the policy and views of France were more decidedly developed. Avoiding a declaration of war with Britain, it was determined by the French ministry secretly to furnish the colonies with supplies for their defence, and yet preserve apparent neutrality.

To effect these purposes, an agent named Beaumarchais was sent to London, 1776, who met Arthur Lee, the agent of the secret committee of congress, and concluded an arrangement with him for the remittance of 200,000 louis d'ors, in arms, ammunition and specie, given by the French court. These were to be furnished under color of commercial transactions with the fictitious house of Roderique, Hortales & Co. of which the real partners were the sovereigns of France and Spain. A million of livres were placed in the hands of Beaumarchais, and a receipt given by him to the French government, which was, for a long time, concealed. As it was necessary to manage the expenditure in such a manner that it should not be imputed to the court, at a time when every movement was closely watched, it was made to assume the appearance of a private transaction.—The American commissioners were given to understand that the supplies furnished were free gifts, but were charged to keep this a profound secret, even from congress. Clothing, arms and cannon, were furnished in the name of the mysterious house, but in reality from the king's arsenal. In 1777, Dr. Franklin and Mr. Lee thought it necessary to explain to congress, the mode in which the warlike stores and money had been obtained. Their letters were entrusted to the captain of an American vessel, with special instructions to deliver them with his own hands to the president of congress. The packet, on being opened, contained only blank papers. The captain suspected of fraud, was examined and confined, but without leading to any discovery. Some months after, duplicates of the letters were received. At the unfortunate time, when the information they contained was most needed, Beaumarchais sent an agent to demand payment for the supplies furnished by him. In a state of great perplexity and doubt, without certain information, and closely pressed by the agent, in March 1778, congress thought proper to pay $20,000 and to enter into a contract for the future payment of the balance.

The same reasons of state policy, which had induced the French court to conceal its benevolent assistance to the American states under the disguise of commercial transactions, compelled the ministry, for the preservation of its treacherous neutrality, to disclaim their existence. When pressed by the British ministry at Paris, knowledge of the operations of Beaumarchais was denied, and orders were issued to prohibit all supplies from him or any other persons. The American commissioners addressed a note to the French minister, enclosing a copy of the agreement for settlement with the house of Roderique, Hortales & Co. stating their entire ignorance of the persons constituting the firm, and the understanding of themselves, congress, and the people, that they were indebted to the good will of the king for the supplies. An official note replied that the king had furnished nothing, that he had only permitted Beaumarchais to borrow from his arsenals that he would from friendship interfere to prevent congress from being pressed for payment, but that he did not know the celebrated commercial house, and could form no opinion of their solidity or punctuality.

These facts were divulged by Thomas Paine, then secretary of the committee of foreign affairs, in his controversy with Silas Dean, but the French minister, alarmed at the disclosure, demanded of congress a disavowal and contradiction. The court of his sovereign was not then to be denied requests of any kind. Paine appeared before congress, avowed his authorship and resigned his office. The publications were disclaimed, and an official declaration made that the alliance with France was not prefaced by secret supplies.

Congress having first sanctioned and again confirmed the full claim of Beaumarchais; was again pressed for payment by his agent. The amount in 1779 was four millions and a half of livres, and in June of that year, bills were drawn for about half that sum on the American minister, payable in three years, with the expectation that before the time arrived, measures would be taken by the French court to prevent payment. They were, however, immediately sold, accepted by Dr. Franklin, and paid to the assignees on maturity.

In 1783, it appeared by the settlement between Dr. Franklin and the count de Vergennes, that 3,000,000 of livres had been furnished to the United States, prior to the treaty of 1778, as gratuitous assistance from the bounty of the king. 2,000,000 were paid directly to the American commissioners, and all information as to the appropriation of the third million was withheld as a state secret. At length, in 1794, the then government of France furnished a copy of a receipt from Beaumarchais for the million of livres, dated in June, 1776. The officers of the treasury charged this sum with interest against the claim, and the balance was paid. From that time to the present, the heirs of the claimant have petitioned congress against the charge. The claim is, however, at length put at rest, and sent to limbo, to keep company with the shade of Amy Darden's stud-horse.

AN ABOMINATION IN THE LAW.

From the Albany Daily Advertiser of Aug. 26.

U. S. court at Utica—Mrs. Bradstreet's suits. A great feeling has been raised in this city and the neighboring counties, for the last few days, by reason of the U. S. deputy marshal of the northern district having served notices on 312 of our citizens to attend as recognitors, (or jurors), in certain causes in favor of Martha Bradstreet, against 13 separate individuals in the village of Utica. It appears that about three years last past, Mrs. Bradstreet got an order for a grand assize in some 15 or 20 of her suits; grand knights or summoners were selected, and those summoners selected from Albany, Rensselaer and Schenectady, 24 persons in each suit, to serve as recognitors or jurors. After these two causes were tried, Judge Conkling refused to have any other causes tried until a decision was had upon the causes tried and removed to the supreme court of the United States at Washington. A decision having been had last winter, on those causes, a rule was entered at the last term of the court held in this city, that the recognitors be summoned to attend at the next term of the court; and very unfortunately for the jurors, as well as the United States, (who it is said must pay them) the next court is held in Utica, on Tuesday next, and those 312 persons compelled to travel that distance from their homes, and when there, to be kept some three or four weeks, or be dismissed and liable to be called at some future court or courts, when the parties shall eventually bring their causes to issue.

Of the above number of 312, the number of 260 are taken from the city of Albany; the residue from Rensselaer, Schenectady and Saratoga counties.—Each person will get $1 25 a day, and ten cents a mile, travel fees.

There are 13 suits; and to each suit there are 24 "recognitors, to make recognition of the grand assize, between Martha Bradstreet, an alien, demandant, and — a citizen tenant."

We understand that from each 24 persons, there are 16 selected, who act as jurors.

If Mrs. Bradstreet should succeed in her suit, she will be one of the richest persons in the United States, if not the richest. Her claims are on a large portion of the village of Utica.

We trust the tavern keepers at Utica will be prepared to provide comfortably for our two hundred and sixty fellow-citizens.

The Argus of the 1st. inst. says that the cases had been put off, and that all the recognitors were discharged, and after some notice of the proceedings, adds—

Mrs. B. appeared in the court, and argued the motions in person. She exhibited, it is said, great ability and much eloquence. She declared that, whatever obstructions might be thrown in her way, she would not abandon the prosecution of these suits, while life remained. It is her object to remove these suits to the southern district of this state, in which Judge Betts presides. It was the common remark of those present, "that Mrs. B. was the best lawyer who spoke on the occasion."

A most serious and affecting part of this affair, remains yet to be told. The recognitors cannot get any pay for the time they have spent, nor for the expenses they have been at in travelling to Utica.—The judge told some of them, before they left this city, as we have been informed, that they would be paid. But it seems that the marshal held a different opinion, and on application to him at Utica, he told the recognitors he had no authority to pay them.—On an appeal to the judge, it is stated that he said he had been under an erroneous impression as to their claim to pay, and that they were not entitled to receive it.

Of course the 312 recognitors, 260 of whom were from this ancient city, will return to their homes; minus—stage fare, tavern charges, and such like. A serious loss, and a still more serious disappointment.

It is an ABOMINATION—in civil suits, at least, that persons should be thus dragged from their homes, at the will of any person who pleases to summon them, being compelled to bear their own expenses—yes, and on the part of an alien, whose claims are probably invalid, and who has, perhaps, no means to pay these expenses, if they should rightfully fall upon her. It is robbery on a grand scale—tyranny of the worst description—a base imposition on private rights and duties.

CASE OF CARRARA.

From the New York Evening Post.

A considerable time has elapsed since the apprehension of Carrara, on the charge of having stolen the jewels of the princess of Orange and brought them into this country. The question whether Carrara should be imprisoned or discharged, has been argued before the police magistrate, yet we do not hear how the accused has been disposed of. The magistrate doubtless feels the natural desire to lend every aid in his power to the investigation of the transaction, but he must feel the difficulties which lie in the way of committing Carrara. Our laws were made for the government of our own country, and do not take cognizance of crimes perpetrated in others, unless the offender commits some act within our own limits, which amounts to a continuation or completion of the offence. We do not erect tribunals, or pay judges and public attorneys, to prosecute and try criminals for offences committed in Brussels, Canton or Archangel, whatever may be the rank of the person against whom they are committed. Besides, even if our courts had jurisdiction of crimes committed in Europe, the present case is embarrassed with difficulties as to the testimony. Before we can imprison and try a man by a regular course of indictment for stealing the jewels of the princess of Orange, said to be done about two years ago, it must be first shown that she had such jewels—that they were stolen, and that there is good cause to believe that they were stolen by the person in possession of them. All the facts and circumstances of the larceny must be as fully exhibited, as if the crime had been committed in this country.

It has been said that these jewels were employed to pay a debt contracted in gambling, and thus came into the possession of Carrara. How this may be, we know not; but if so, the receiver cannot be punished, unless he knew they were stolen. But in whatever manner he received them, he introduced them in violation of the laws of the union; and they, like all smuggled articles, have been forfeited to the laws of the United States. The United States have libeled the articles, and may hold the person who introduced them answerable for the penalty. Whether the United States may interfere until the case is tried we know not, but it would clearly be an unsafe precedent to hand over smuggled goods to a claimant, on the plea that they were stolen in a foreign land, without first establishing the fact before a jury. We have to look to our own laws and be cautious that they are strictly administered, without being made to accommodate themselves to support important contingencies. What is doctrine to-day, may become precedent to-morrow. Let every rogue be punished, but let it be done by the law of the land.

From the Mercantile Advertiser.

An article appears in the Post of last evening on the subject of the jewels of the princess of Orange, which is incorrect in nearly all the details. The case of Carrara states thus: After the arrest, the counsel moved for his release, and the case was argued before justice Hopson, who, after some days of consideration, committed the accused for examination. Soon thereafter, learning that it was the intention of Carrara, to apply for his discharge under the habeas corpus, justice Hopson immediately committed him in full. The application for the habeas corpus will be argued on Friday.

It is under our revised statutes, which went into operation on the 1st of January, 1830, that Carrara is detained. By these statutes, a felon found in our state may be arrested and tried whether the robbery was committed in a neighboring state or in a foreign country. We understand that the plea on which the application for the habeas corpus will be made by Carrara's counsel is this—that as the robbery of the jewels is alleged to have been committed in 1829, therefore the case occurred before the revised statutes went into operation, and Carrara cannot be tried under them; his release is consequently demanded: while the court thus far has decided, that as Carrara did not arrive in this state till 1831, he is amenable to the laws in force at the time he arrived.

Carrara has lately, as we understand, made certain confessions; among other things he states, that he was not the robber, but if his wife be found, she can explain all—he will not deny, neither does he admit that the jewels were those of the princess of Orange, but refers to his wife, who is able to reveal the whole transaction—she has not yet been found.

From the Same.

An order was received yesterday morning, from governor Throop, issued with the approbation of the general government, to deliver Carrara to the minister of the Netherlands, that he may be sent to Holland and tried for the offence with which he is charged, in that country, according to its laws. This order is issued in accordance with the revised statutes, volume 1st, page 164, sections 8, 9, 10 and 11, which are in the words following.

Sec. 8. The governor may, in his discretion, deliver over to justice any person found within the state, who shall be charged with having committed without the jurisdiction of the United States, any crime except treason, which, by the laws of this state, if committed therein, is punishable by death or by imprisonment in the state prison.

Sec. 9. Such delivery can only be made on the requisition of the duly authorized ministers or officers of the government within the jurisdiction of which the crime shall be charged to have been committed.

Sec. 10. It shall be the duty of the governor to require such evidence of the guilt of the person so charged, as would be necessary to justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, had the crime charged been committed within this state.

Sec. 11. The expenses of apprehending and delivering such person, shall be defrayed by those to whom he shall be delivered.

This proceeding, supersedes the writ of habeas corpus, which was to have been sued for this day as we have already announced.

We were informed many days ago, that the wife of Carrara, who is conversant with the whole history of the robbery of the jewels, if not one of the principal actors, after the arrest of Carrara, left this city with a man named John Roumage, for Philadelphia, under the names of 'Mr. Robert and lady,' and sailed on the 20th August from that city in the ship Monongahela, for Liverpool—in consequence, one of our police officers embarked on board the Silvanus Jenkins, which sailed from this port for Liverpool on 24th August, and hopes are entertained by our authorities, that he will be in Liverpool when the Philadelphia packet arrives, or at all events, he will be able to arrest Carrara's wife in England.

It appears that Carrara's wife, upon his arrest, escaped to England, with jewels thought to be worth a million of dollars. She has been pursued.

BEAUTIES OF MILITARY RULE.

A letter from Lima, dated June 3, says—I send you a few papers of this city; but they are of very little value, except as an object of curiosity—they develop nothing, in a measure, of the political or commercial condition of the country. You have doubtless been advised of the late attempt to assassinate gen. La Fuente, the vice president, and of his escape. There being a misunderstanding between Peru and Bolivia, in relation to territorial limits, general Gomara, president of Peru, marched with the army to the frontiers of Bolivia, leaving general La Fuente, the vice president, in the actual exercise of the functions of executive of the government. About the middle of April, a conspiracy was formed against the vice president by certain aspiring characters, who had no hopes of preferment during his incumbency of the executive chair; and it is currently reported that the conspirators got their cue from Gomara himself, who was apprehensive La Fuente was endeavoring to supplant him. A plot was accordingly laid to put the latter out of the way by assassination. The attempt was made at night—La Fuente was in bed, indisposed with the Terciana, (ague,) his wife and family setting around him,—bands of soldiers were placed around the house to guard every avenue of escape, while a party of them entered the chamber to perpetrate the savage deed. One version of the affair is, that the wife of the vice president rushed to the door, there met the ruffians, and kept them at bay some moments, by heroically seizing their bayonets with her hands, &c. until her husband had time to escape from the room, in his night clothes. He was pursued through different apartments, out of windows, over roofs, (all the roofs being flat, in this country, it never rains), &c. &c. with soldiers and officers close at his heels, volleys of musketry being fired at him, until an officer in pursuit being killed accidentally by his own soldiers, supposing him to be La Fuente, the chase ceased in consequence of the confusion which this event created, and the vice president finally made his escape to Chorillos, from whence he proceeded, at night, in a boat, to the bay of Callao, and went on board the U. S. sloop of war St. Louis—where he remained about a month, and took passage in the American ship Portia, for Chili. When he went on board the St. Louis, capt. Sloat frankly informed him the ship could not be an asylum for him, should the government at Lima demand his person; and the authorities were advised through our charge, Mr. Larned, that the vice president was on board,—but they did not molest him. Gen. Miller an Englishman, the commander of the 3d division of the Peruvian army, fearing lest he should not find favor in the sight of the new authorities, also took up his quarters on board the St. Louis,—and, a few days since, sailed for the Sandwich Islands, to await the settlement of the squabbles among the factions in this unfortunate country. A man by the name of Andres Reyes, (or Andrew Kings) the president of the senate is the executive chief of the republic, pro tem. The congress is in session,—but their acts are of no importance,—they are afraid of the army, or of those who control the army. The war with Bolivia, seems to be unpopular here,—and information has reached this city from the army on the frontiers of Bolivia, not many leagues from Anquips, that a majority of the officers and soldiers being averse to invading Bolivia, had deposed Gomara, the commander, (and president of this republic) and put a colonel in the command of the troops. The prevalent opinion was, that had a general battle taken place, general Santa Cruz, president of Bolivia, and who commanded his troops in person, would have come off victorious.

Now that it is believed Gomara is deposed, there are divers opinions among the people who ought to succeed him as president of Peru—some think he may be reinstated—others that La Fuente may be recalled—and others, again, that Rica-Aguero, a former vice president, and now in banishment in Chili, may be requested to return. Affairs of state are consequently in a very unsettled condition. The present government is very much in want of money,—a few days since they offered the two principal American houses in the place, (the only houses, of any nation, in Lima, who have much money), two per cent. a month, for $100,000: the offer was declined,—the merchants having no faith in the stability of the present state of things.

THE SOLAR PHENOMENA.

We are obliged to a respectable friend in Alexandria for the following interesting observations upon the late extraordinary appearances connected with the sun.

Alexandria Boarding School, 8th month, 20th, 1831.

Friends Gales & Seaton: In compliance with the suggestion in your paper received to-day, I send you the following views respecting the very unusual, if not unexampled appearance of the sun, observed a few days since.

To understand the phenomena alluded to, it will be necessary to make a few preliminary observations. During the great total eclipse of the sun that had recently taken place, the moon had just passed its perigee, or that point in its orbit nearest the earth, and consequently the combined action of the sun and moon upon the atmosphere produced a great tide in the equatorial regions, and diminished the pressure of the air upon the whole of the surface of the earth.* This diminution of pressure upon the surface of the water would occasion a great increase of evaporation, particularly when united with the high temperature that accompanied it. For it is an established fact, that the amount of evaporation from an uninsulated surface of water depends upon the elevation of temperature and diminution of pressure.

A vast quantity of vapor thus raised was very observable on the evening of the 12th instant, at a considerable elevation, in the western part of the heavens, and continued to reflect a very red light for a long time after the sun had set.

The appearance of the heavens on the morning of the 13th I did not observe; but about mid day, the sun shining through this body of vapor had a silvery appearance similar to that which it wears when shining through a vanishing fog, and I observed it to give an unusually ghastly appearance to the countenances of persons. Between three and four o'clock, the position of the sun with respect to this body of vapor becoming changed, it assumed a greenish blue appearance, precisely similar to that produced by the following experiments, and which, in my opinion was dependent upon the same cause. Let a screen upon which the spectrum produced by the separation of the solar beam into its primitive colors by a glass prism is thrown, be perforated so as to let all except the red ray fall upon a double convex lens, and be converged to a focus, the result will be a representation of the sun of a greenish blue color, exactly such as it was observed to have at the time alluded to. The color is that resulting from the combination of all the primitive colors except the red, and is denominated in optics the opposite color.

The same experiment may be performed more familiarly thus: place a red wafer upon a white wall, and look at it intently with one eye for some time, then let the eye rest, without much effort at seeing, upon the wall, and a spot, the size of the wafer, of a greenish blue color, will be perceived. The explanation is, that the retina, through the action upon it by the red light from the wafer, becomes insensible to the red ray in that part upon which the image of the wafer rested, and hence the color produced upon that part of the retina, will be the one resulting from the combination of the other six.

The greenish blue color of the sun, then, I think, depended upon the red rays being reflected by the intervening body of vapor, while the other six passed to the eye, and produced the observed appearance. This opinion was strengthened by one or two facts observed at the time. I passed the sun's ray through a prism, and while the yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet colors appeared with their proportionate brightness, the orange was considerably less distinct, and the red much less than the orange.

Another corroborative fact was, that, as the sun descended below the body of vapor, which was about fifteen or twenty minutes before its setting, the vapor reflected an intensely red light—the light that passed through it was therefore separate from the red, and would have produced the opposite, or greenish blue appearance.

The spot that was observed, is by no means an unusual thing upon the sun's disc. It was visible to the unprotected eye, merely in consequence of the diminished brightness of the sun. By aid of a telescope, a considerable number of spots were visible. In the summer of 1816, a spot was visible to the naked eye for eight or ten days in succession.

If the above remarks are any way satisfactory to you, it will be a gratification to

Your sincere friend,
BENJAMIN HALLOWELL.

*It is evident, that as the air is partially supported by the combined attraction of the sun and moon, its pressure upon the earth must be diminished. The greatest effect would not be at the immediate time of conjunction, but some days after.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 6—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, OCT. 8, 1831.

[VOL. XLI. WHOLE NO. 1,046]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ "Clear the decks." Assisted by a whole sheet supplement, whereby thirty-two close pages are given for the present number, we have power to publish, in season, the long and important report on the condition of the bank of the United States, as well as dispose of a huge mass of other interesting matter, which was chiefly waiting an insertion. We are thus enabled a little to relieve our files, in preparation for other long articles expected. The miscellaneous collections, or selections, are in great variety. The report about the bank should receive the earnest attention and serious reflection, of every man capable of understanding the business of such an institution.

The journal of the anti-masonic convention is now completed—the reports and address we expect to make room for, pretty soon after they shall be published.

We take the present opportunity to insert reports of two important law cases—one relating to the noise-making bonds at Charleston, South Carolina,* and the other concerning the act of May 1830, more effectually to enforce the act of May 1823, concerning the duty on woolen cloths, &c. The first affecting the constitutionality of the tariff laws—the second bearing upon "free traders," alias smugglers, and checking their operations—showing what are fraudulent entries at the custom-houses, by which the revenue has been diminished in millions of dollars, and the growers and manufacturers of wool are denied that protection which it was intended they should obtain—for the profit of foreigners; nine-tenths of such doings, at least, being for the benefit of Grab-galliered and other English adventurers—who put upon the price of their goods the whole amount which they retain from the treasury!

☞ We gave a fair and full account of the proceedings of the "free trade convention" at Philadelphia, with a sufficient sketch of the debates to show the direction which things are taking. Some of the speakers on the unconstitutionality of the tariff (though Mr. MADISON said, in 1795, that it was the necessity of laws to protect the industry of the people of the United States which originated the project of a federal constitution, having its start in Virginia), appear to have been pretty ardent, and a general discussion of the subject, involving, perhaps, the principles of nullification, may be expected; and the end will be—we know not what?—Some who admit the unconstitutionality, will kick severely against nullification, and many will reject both, though favorable to an extensive modification of the tariff, in a reduction of the duties imposed by it. We expect to insert all the reports of the "federalist committee," and the address—unless their excessive length shall render a selection necessary. The address reported condemns the tariff laws as "unconstitutional,"—we shall see how it is disposed of.

*It is stated in a Charleston paper that the defendants in the bond case have appealed from the late decision, and that it will again be tried in circuit court, which will sit in Columbia in November.

The Washington Globe, in reference to this bond case—

"We consider it highly honorable to the mercantile part of the community of Charleston, that none of them could be found so regardless of the sentiments of propriety, as well as patriotism, as seriously to question the right of the government of the union to lay and collect duties on imports. No effrontery could be found equal to this effort, but that of a practised attorney; and we do not believe that any one, even of this class, would have had the hardihood, but that he knew he might expect the support of a vice president and a league of lawyer politicians." This is "going the whole."

VOL. XLI.—No. 8.

☞ At the close of each semi-annual volume we expect some discontinuances, from deaths, removals and other causes; and are careful to post-up the names of all such as have previously ordered their papers stopped: yet a considerable loss is sustained because of the neglect of persons—who, having received three or four, or more, numbers of a new volume, are reminded that they had not intended to continue subscribers another year—and we are then notified of their wishes, not infrequently at the ungentlemanly cost of postage, but with the more serious evil of breaking a volume because of their carelessness! The least that common decency requires would be, that all such should pack-up and return the extra numbers which they have received—but this is very seldom attended to.

The current discontinuances are not more numerous than usual—but two or three provoking cases, (because taxed with postage), seem to render it necessary to remind all subscribers of the terms on which the REGISTER is published—that no paper can be discontinued, unless at the close of a volume, except in our own discretion—nor, unlike newspapers more properly so called, this work is in volumes, and much of its profit in the surplus or retained copies—which are valueless if incomplete. We have no desire to press it upon any individual. It will always be stopped at any time desired, being informed in due season—but it cannot be supposed that we shall submit to injuries which grow out of sheer carelessness, in the manner stated; and hereafter, if not regularly advised, we must enforce our terms, (and the established principles of the law in the case, as repeatedly decided), against those who commit such acts of injustice towards us.

☞ We are oftentimes favored with descriptions of new machinery. The compliment is thankfully accepted; but our knowledge of such things is so small that it is almost waste time to attempt to describe new machines to us—being ignorant even of the common names of the chief parts of them; and now too old to learn them. We feel much pride in the ever-restless genius of our countrymen, and will gladly notice the happy fruits of their talents, at all times and on all occasions—but, for the reason stated, cannot pronounce on machinery, unless having seen its effects, and then, perhaps, only incorrectly. Hence we have handed over to our friend Smith, editor of the AMERICAN FARMER, as more properly coming within his walk, an account of Smith and Thompson's "ditcher, lever and hedger," which was recently forwarded from Michigan—the postage being considerably and properly paid: which does not always happen in like cases.

☞ Mr. Thomas Ritchie has not yet enlarged the "Enquirer," that he may enter upon a liberal discussion of the tariff question with "Hezekiah Niles." He wants room—though his press groans under the weight of proceedings of small meetings of persons in Virginia against the tariff—at which from five to ten persons, in all, were assembled—each capable of writing for a whole week, and entirely convinced that the safety of the "universal world of America" depends on the publication of a volume or two of his own matter in Thomas Ritchie's newspaper—which governs Virginia, which governs the south, which governs the union; out of which there is no good thing, and in which all things are blessings or curses as Mr. Thomas Ritchie orders that they shall be arranged!

*The Richmond Whig asks—Will our friend Niles inform us how comes on his expected controversy with our neighbor? We would suggest to him that the meeting of congress and our legislature is approaching, and they will furnish another excuse for putting it off. By the bye, we feel in the humor this evening of letting our friend Hezekiah into a secret. The proposed enlargement of the Enquirer has been delayed, waiting for a new head-piece, an article it has been sadly in want of for some time.

This famous manufacturer of blessings and curses has had the magnanimity, on many recent occasions, to do what he might to injure the character of "Hekz-kim Niles'" paper, though ingloriously skulking from a generous argument with him. And the latter has the pleasure to notify Thomas Ritchie of the success which attends his kind exertions! Since the first day of the present year, ONLY seven hundred and fifty-two new subscriptions have been made to "NILES' REGISTER," or, at the rate of only one thousand for the current year—and the whole number now printed is only four thousand one hundred and four copies, requiring one hundred and seventy-one quires of "white paper," for every publication. As this increase is a very small one for an old paper to obtain—the fact is proclaimed, in melancholy sadness, that Mr. Thomas Ritchie may have pleasure in the statement! If he believes it not, he may depute any custom house officer here, (ready to yield a prompt obedience to his commands), to count the names on our subscription-book, and examine the worthy working people employed in the office—that the ruin caused by Thomas Ritchie's "curse" may be established beyond all manner of doubt!—and he will likewise discover that only about one hundred of these new names came from Thomas Ritchie's dominion—which is Virginia. The officer whose duty it may be, shall also have the discontinuance-book laid before him, that Thomas Ritchie may have yet more pleasure therefrom!

To be serious. The littleness of Mr. Ritchie, in frequently attacking the character of the REGISTER, because that its editor yields "no allegiance" to his "weather-cock" standard of right, has rather excited pity than provoked contempt. The facts above stated are true—and I am thankful for the great patronage which has been afforded. Gratitude is best shown in works. The last volume of the REGISTER was the most capacious, as well as the most interesting, perhaps, ever published, except at an extra charge to subscribers; and it is probable that the current volume, in the quality and quantity of its matter, will be much more valuable than the last. It is a favorite saying with me, that "the protected should protect!"—and the substantial encouragement given is continually pressing itself upon the strong desire of my heart, TO RENDER JUSTICE to the numerous and faithful friends of THE WEEKLY REGISTER; as well as to induce yet many more to receive this extensive "Chronicle" of the events of the times.

☞ The U. S. Telegraph is publishing major Eaton's reply—with copious notes. Some of them are curious, and others severe—and will much interest all who are knee deep in the "controversy."

MONDAY. The secretary of the treasury has given public notice that, on the first of January next, nearly six millions of the public debt will be paid off. This will be so much more capital released, and we suppose its being set afloat will have the effect still further to advance the price of stocks. Messrs. Calens and Mr. Poultney, (private bankers in Baltimore), if they do not beware in time, will rue the day that they offered to pay five per cent. interest upon all deposits of money for a term not less than twelve months. It is paying too dear for the while.

☞ The preceding paragraph is from the "National Intelligencer." The opinion of many persons in Baltimore, who are thought to be among the best judges of "money matters," is opposed to that of our friends of the "Intelligencer." The fact is, that, because of heavy exports of specie, on account of the high price of exchange on England, money has already begun to be "scarce," and will soon be in great "demand." There have been more movements of specie in Baltimore during the last three or four weeks, than, perhaps, in the preceding twelve months. The protection of domestic industry had caused much ease to the whole (solvent) trading community—but the vast importations of foreign goods, and the consequent departure of specie, shows that the tariff is not yet sufficiently high, or its provisions sufficiently enforced, to prevent injurious derangements of business, by fluctuations in the value of money, as measured by the price of lands, houses, or any other thing. Moderation is always best—and steadiness most profitable. There has been an apparently regular and safe rise in the value of property in nearly all the chief cities and towns of the United States—but the abstraction of ten millions of dollars from the vaults of our banks would lessen the circulation not less than fifty millions, and so increase the value of money that many engagements, thought entirely prudent two months ago, may not easily be complied with. We regard specie only as a merchantable commodity, and should it reflux on account of the low price of bills of exchange, all persons ought to rejoice in its movements, shewing a profitable circulation of value; but when it departs because of the high price of exchange, (not being a native production), it is the best of all possible evidence that there is a real balance of trade against us, however difficult it may be to prescribe rules which certainly shew what are balances of trade. A few years ago, as we have often remarked, it was the fearful cry, of the profound philosophers of the south, that the tariff laws would ruin the revenue, and compel a resort to direct taxation for the ordinary support of the general government: now the fact is, as we have always said that it would be,—the common prosperity of the people, because of a protected industry, enabling them to purchase more freely, will give to the revenue not less than five millions of dollars more than the most sanguine calculated for the current year, shewing an extra importation of about twenty-five millions, which must be substantially settled in coin, unless increased demands should be made for our staple productions—and there is no prospect that Europe is willing to make a general war for our benefit.

P. S. Since the preceding was written, we have ascertained that money is scarce—very scarce, among all that are dependent on the usual accommodations at bank; and we learn that the pressure will become heavy, unless the export of specie shall be speedily checked. Between six and seven millions of dollars have lately departed for England—that week, half a million left New York in one day. Forced sales of goods are making to obtain funds, and ruinous prices only obtained for some of them. And the New York Courier and Enquirer says—"We understand from Washington, that the U. States revenue for the present year will exceed the estimates by eight millions of dollars. It was estimated at $22,000,000—it will reach nearly $30,000,000. Such is the prosperity of the country under Jackson! In two or three years the whole debt will be paid off."

If it be the fact, that the revenue will amount to thirty millions—bankruptcy must be "the order of the day!" These 30 millions will represent an importation of not less than 100 millions besides articles free of duty, such as specie, bullion, &c.—and what have we that can produce that mighty sum in the foreign market during the year? If the balance is drawn in specie, the distressing scenes of 1821-22 will be revived; and the payment of the public debt be attended with the loss of many times its whole amount to private individuals, in sacrifices of property and derangement of business.

RAIL ROADS, &c. The eastern extremity of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road reaches the tide, passing down that great thoroughfare, Pratt street. The most sanguine have been agreeably surprised at the result, (if any), obstruction which it presents to the ordinary transportation of persons and goods in, or across, the street. The rails are laid on solid blocks of granite, which are fitted to the common pavement; and there is now no difficulty or disadvantage to be apprehended in passing branches of the road through all the principal streets, if desired. Thus the trade of this road will be distributed to all parts of the city, as shall appear "necessary and proper."

The entire line of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road will be opened to the city of Frederick, and to the Potomac, at the Point of Rocks, and be in full operation, before the end of the present year; and then a vast quantity and weight of articles will be transported on it—and we shall feel some part of the benefit which we have expected from this splendid undertaking; the whole execution of which is in the most substantial manner, though beauty and taste have not been disregarded. Many improvements have been latterly made in the construction, or use, of rail roads, and experience will yet lead to others not less important in the general economy of them, and of the power used, &c. The cost of transportations will be rendered much cheaper than has been hitherto supposed.

We intended to have given a list of all the rail roads now about to be commenced, or which are seriously contemplated—but have not either time or room to present it. Many long and important roads will soon be begun; and, when in use, we shall powerfully experience the good of the "American System," in the savings of time and money which these roads will cause.

CIRCUMSTANCES ALTER CASES! Some time ago, when "Hezekiah Niles" proposed the circulation of tracts among the free working people, to shew them the importance of the protecting system and in what manner it benefited them individually, a mighty outcry was raised against the proposition—the Charleston Mercury being at the head and Thomas Ritchie at the tail of its opponents; but the following will shew what is doing in that way in the south. That which was wrong, grievously wrong, in "Hezekiah Niles," is right in any English agent or Englishman—and surely so in any unselfish American who belongs to "the democratic party!"

The tract committee, (at Charleston, S. C.) reported that they had distributed, in various parts of that state, about 1,000 copies of Gen. Hayne's oration—179 copies of the celebration of the 4th July—150 copies of the address and constitution of the association—and 650 copies of tract No. 1, containing the proceedings of their first meeting. There are now printed and ready for distribution, 3,000 copies of Mr. Calhoun's letter, being tract No. 2. The printer has now in his hands, the copy for tract No. 3. The committee are also engaged in preparing a State Rights and Free Trade Almanac, for 1832—which will be ready for the press in a few days. Gen. Hayne read to the meeting a letter from a gentleman at the north, exhibiting the fact that the recent luminous exposition of the vice president of the United States, has already begun to enlighten the minds of their northern brethren with regard to the true character of our government. [Boston Courier.]

[Well—the account is balanced! About 60,000 copies of "Hezekiah Niles" late essay called "Politics for working men" have also been distributed, and in parts of the country where "Walker's appeal," (which, however, we have never seen, and shall never approve), would create less excitement, though the public roads were covered with copies of it, than so many skeletons of the life of the "man in the moon."

FRANKLIN INSTITUTE. The exhibition of this institute at Philadelphia, commenced on Wednesday last and will close to-day. It is in good season for the "free trade convention," and we venture to say that if the members of that body will attend this splendid show of the products of American industry, examine the quality and ascertain the prices of the articles—many will think that they had better staid at home. The specimens of broad and other cloths, carpets, stoves and grates, marble work, glass wares, porcelain, cotton goods, and blankets are specially mentioned, because of their great variety, good quality and beautiful appearance. The list of articles is exceedingly numerous, and shews many things in high perfection which few persons in the south believe are made in the U. States. In all our cities, the sales of American goods far exceed in value those of the imported. The domestic manufactures sold at Philadelphia, are worth much more than the whole cotton crop of the United States. We do not include in this notice the product of mechanics working to orders of individuals, for their own use.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION. The delegates to be appointed to attend the convention of agriculturists, manufacturers and mechanics, to be held in the city of New York on the 26th instant, promises to be numerous and highly respectable. The object of this meeting is to promote and protect the domestic industry, in all its chief departments, and secure the home market to American citizens.

The call of a meeting at Boston to appoint delegates to this convention, is signed by about two hundred and fifty persons—many of them we know to be of the most respectable standing, and without regard to differences in political opinion. This is as it should be. The principles to be considered have no reference to the parties of the day, and, we hope, will be sustained long after the present actors in them have passed off the stage, and are "seen of men no more."

The mayor of Boston heads the list of persons calling the meeting at Boston, and Mr. Arnold, governor of Rhode Island, heads that which calls a meeting at Providence. A like call is made at Wilmington, Del. We observe that, in all these cases, gentlemen have associated without respect to political parties.

PROGRESS OF GOOD PRINCIPLES. Several cotton-planters have lately added their names to our subscription list—having seen, and magnanimously felt, willing to admit, that the tariff inflicts no injury on them, while it benefits other numerous classes of their fellow citizens, and powerfully increases the general wealth and power of the nation. We sincerely believe—and we have reflected much on the subject, that the cotton manufacture in the United States has, or will, accomplish almost as much good to the planters as they have derived from the gin, which a Yankee furnished them with, to clean their great staple product; and that, at this time, such manufacture causes the consumption of from two to three hundred thousand bales of American cotton for cloths that would otherwise have been made out of EAST INDIA cotton—because the British, that they may come into competition with our manufacturers, are compelled to use our strong and clearer cotton, in lieu of the product of their own East India possessions—and besides, no ship-loads of cotton goods now reach us from India. We have seen whole cargoes of them, but shall see them no more. This matter is worthy of much reflection.

Alabama, Sept. 15, 1831.

Dear sir:—The importance of the REGISTER in those portentous times, induces me to order it expressly for myself, having taken it the last 18 months with a friend. We have a very respectable minority in favor of the American system, and those among the most able planters; and I would aill, to the honor of our state, we are not cursed with many nullifying demagogues, whose gratuitous services are so kindly proffered to the poor cotton planters. While the manufacturer sells at the present reduced prices, we have no just cause of complaint, and can make more by raising the raw material than by manufacturing of it—and this is the ostensible reason they are not established among us. My crop of cotton has paid nine and a half cents (clear) for the last three years (perhaps handled with more care than is practised by every person); at this price I think it a more profitable crop than sugar, and it yields the economical farmer a handsome support (with ten children to feed, clothe and educate). Enclosed you have a U. S. five dollar bill, please commence with the first number of the volume," &c.

ANOTHER.

Extract from a gentleman in Georgia. I have now taken your paper for ten years, and acknowledge myself pleased with its course, though often embattled for uttering its sentiments. Your information respecting the iron and other domestic manufactures has enabled me to keep on hand a constant supply of all the newest articles of our own manufactured goods.

A letter from Mississippi. "We have a powerful minority, decided advocates of the system of protection, among these too are many of the very largest cotton planters, and those who calculate most closely their own interests. [Sept. 13.]

The occasion is well fitted to add the following from the Richmond Whig.

The tariff.—The views of the writer of the letter from Louisiana, to the editors of the Whig, from which we make the following extract, are expanded and just. The argument applies with equal and greater force to the bread stuffs of Virginia, because they are, in fact, excluded from a foreign market, by foreign monopoly. We do conscientiously believe that our wheat, flour and corn are appreciated in value at least ten per cent. by the encouragement now given to domestic manufactures; and that, but for the northern manufacturer, not one half of the present product of Virginia could find a market. It is this view of the subject mainly, which has induced us, in despite of the certainty that we were making ourselves unpopular at home, to advocate a protecting tariff. Free trade we prefer, could we get it; but when restriction is the order of the day in the great markets of Europe, national pride and self-preservation call on us to meet restriction with restriction. Time was when in a contest of this kind, Virginia would have been the foremost to meet a cunning foe, and we do not despair that her ancient spirit may yet be revived.

"Franklin, La. August 27th, 1831.

"It is a remarkable fact, that the cultivators of the same staple in different sections of the country, should entertain so entirely different opinions on the policy favorable to their pursuit.—There is not a cotton planter on Red river, whose mind is capable of analyzing and investigating, but admits the benefits they derive from the tariff. Some of them are men who would do honor to any state for their talents and learning; one of them in particular, who in former times thought it theoretically injurious, now acknowledges it practically beneficial; and this gentleman is one of the first members of our bar, and sells yearly hundreds of bales.

"I believe the Carolinians allow that the prices of their negro clothing, farming utensils, &c. &c. have fallen since the existence of the tariff. For the sake of argument, grant them their conclusion that the price of the staple is decreased in the foreign market, by the duties that are laid on the manufactured articles. Make an estimate of the difference of prices before and after the passage of the tariff law, of the things most used by the planters, and state the imagined reduction in the price of cotton, and then there will be an immense gain to the planter. He can now buy for the money which he receives for a bale of cotton, more in quantity and better in quality of that which he needs, than he could from the imagined price of a bale, if the tariff did not exist." This is easily demonstrated. No people in the world are accumulating more surely and steadily than the cotton planters of this state, whose plantations are managed with care and prudence. Between them and the cane growers, the prospects of the former are preferable."

AMERICAN SILK. The annual value of the product of raw silk in the United States, must now considerably exceed half a million of dollars—the chief part being created by the spare labor of a few women and children in certain small towns of industrious and thrifty Connecticut. But we hear of plantations of mulberry trees in several places, and of a great demand for silk worm eggs. If this should become general, the boys and girls, on many thousand farms in the United States, may have a delightful recreation, and earn for themselves from five to ten dollars each, without at all interfering with the usual or proper occupation of their time—for the mulberry tree may be found in sufficient numbers in most parts of the union, and the season which requires attention to the worms is a brief one. Markets are now established for the cocoons—the store-keepers will soon begin to take them in, in exchange for goods, and the whole business proceed in a regular manner. It is quite possible that, in the next year, the ultimate product of American silk will hardly fall short of 2,000,000 dollars—and it may become efficien millions without injuriously effecting labor, land or capital appropriated to other purposes—simply through the application of a little time, (which is now wasted), in a wholesome and highly interesting employment; one that is eminently calculated to give the youthful mind a sound direction, and lay the foundation for habits of industry and economy which cannot easily be shaken. With what a just and profitable pride, will children exhibit their new hats or bonnets, new coats or frocks, that they themselves shall purchase with their own money? Who can limit the effect of such proceedings, or value the ultimate product of such principles, implanted in the bosoms of the young?

My valued friend Mr. Knapp, of Economy, Pennsylvania, called last week and presented me with a very handsome and serviceable pattern for a silk vest—the making of the silk and the vesting, being all within the "family." He stated that they had made 1000 lbs of silk last year, and were preparing to go extensively into the business—adding, he had given notice that he would purchase all the cocoons offered, and should have in operation all the necessary machines for the manufacture of silk goods. He showed me also a silk neck-handkerchief, such as is in general use in the family—an excellent article, of delicate softness and yet strong. The people at Economy are, of all others, perhaps best fitted to afford an example in this respect. When their mulberry plantation shall be in full bearing, they will certainly make much silk among themselves; and what is yet more important, be able to supply plants and eggs to all who may desire them, on reasonable terms—and thus add many tens of thousands of dollars to the productive industry of their neighbors, who, once enjoying the profits of this new business, will pursue it with that zeal which so strongly marks the character of the free laboring classes of the United States.

Since writing the preceding we met with the following interesting paragraphs in the AMERICAN FARMER.

The editor of the American Farmer has had the pleasure within a few days, of receiving half a dozen skeins of sewing silk made by Miss Belinda Grishy, of Rockbridge county, Va. She obtained the eggs of the editor last winter, with brief directions for their management; fed the worms on the common mulberry of the adjacent forest, reeled the cocoons with a common country cotton reel, doubled and twisted the silk with a common cotton spinning wheel, and dyed it with such domestic materials as were at hand. The gentleman who was the bearer of the specimens, is a merchant of that neighborhood, and, when asked his opinion of the silk, he said it was as good as any Italian silk he ever sold, and that he wanted no better, that it would sell readily, and that he would purchase all the young lady could make at $8 a pound. It is Miss Grishy's first attempt, never having even seen a silk worm previous to this summer, nor received any other instruction in any branch of the art than that contained in our brief directions. Her success in this trial has determined her to pursue the business regularly—finding it, as she says, both pleasant and profitable, and by no means difficult.

The quality of the silk is really excellent—its only faults being in the dyeing and fineness. The pink and red are rather dull, but the green is beautiful; none of the colored skeins, however, have the rich gloss of which silk is susceptible. Four of the skeins are of a good sized thread for common use, but two of them are almost as fine as the fibre of the spider's "attenuated web." And yet it had been twisted, doubled and twisted again on a common wheel. These, however, she only made thus fine to see how delicate a thread she could make. We have called the silk excellent, by which we mean that it was perfectly evenly reeled, properly twisted, and of good strength, and not inferior in any quality except the colors, to any silk we ever saw. These samples of silk may be examined at the office of the Farmer by any one who may take an interest in the matter.

American silk. The cultivation of mulberry trees and silk worms, in various sections of the country, is rapidly extending. Orchards, even including 100 acres, were planted during the last year; and many are now reaping a handsome profit on silks. The New England Farmer says—a gentleman in Mansfield, Conn. had upwards of 10,000 skeins of sewing silk, which readily sell for about $8 50 per pound. Machinery is now being completed in that town for spinning and weaving the raw material, under the direction of competent foreigners. The sales of sewing silk alone in Mansfield this year are estimated at more than $85,000.

With the extent of country embraced by the United States, and the diversity of the climate, it is rational to calculate that the time is not very far distant when our enterprising citizens need not be under any dependence to foreign nations, either for the necessities or luxuries of life. All the fabrics which comfort or convenience requires, are now manufactured in great abundance; and as many as may be demanded by the most fastidious taste, the development of our resources will soon supply. (Poulson.)

SHIP BUILDING was hardly ever so active in the United States as at the present time—a certain "sign" that the tariff is ruining the commerce of the country! We hope that there may not be an over-building. The ships lately launched are generally vessels of a very superior class.

FLOUR—Liverpool market, August 20. Average for wheat 6½. 10d. the quarter. The price regulates the duty—and, on the day given, the duty on flour was 22½ cents, per barrel. "Free trade."

EDITORIAL CHANGE. The New York "Age" being merged into the "Evening Journal," the latter has appeared in a new dress, and promises to be conducted with much spirit and ability. It is faithfully devoted to the interests of the free laboring classes.

MR. EVERETT, it is understood, will attend the fair of the American Institute at New York on the 11th inst. and deliver an oration suited to the occasion.

"LABOR IN VAIN." Governor Hamilton, of South Carolina, delivered on the 12th ult. at the meeting of the state rights and free trade association, an address from which we make the following extract. The attempt to impeach the motives and attain the character of Mr. Madison, reminds us of the old story about the "siper who gnawed a file" and only broke his own teeth. But how shall we measure the dignity of this proceeding, when we recollect that Mr. Hamilton is governor of a state? The wild policies of the day have certainly reduced the character of man in the United States; and that respect for private opinion which every gentleman once entertained, seems very much lost in the whirl of passion, vented in a courtesie of speech that has a proper place only among the inmates of a cross-roads tavern.

"I know that an effort has been made to show that Virginia, in her celebrated resolutions of '98, either meant nothing by this great right of state interposition, or she meant to assert the naked right of resistance to unlawful power. I say Virginia, for I prefer to speak of that great democratic commonwealth than of Mr. Madison, who happened, accidentally, to be the organ of her public sentiment. She abides, I trust in God, where she did. He has crossed the Potomac, horse, foot and dragons, and thrown himself on the side of the moneyed oligarchy of the North, by espousing all their profitable doctrines of consolidation, and repudiating all those safe principles of construction to which Virginia owes her influence and authority in this confederacy. It is no new fact in the history of the world, that many men have had the intellectual power to strike out great truths, which they had not the moral courage to sustain; and it is unfortunately but too true of Mr. Madison, that there is scarcely a single principle which brought him into power in 1800, that he has not discarded in 1830, and his last opinions testify that most odious and dangerous heresy of consolidation, that long continued violations of the constitution, repeatedly affirmed by a majority, sanction the usurpation. Contrast the letters of this gentleman on the tariff with his speech in the first congress on the navigation, tonnage and duty bill; his exposition of the Virginia resolutions in that great federal journal, the North American Review, with his own report; his speech on the bill to incorporate a national bank, with his recent letter to Mr. Ingersoll, and the justice of these reflections will become sufficiently obvious."

AWFUL! The Charleston Mercury, (chief nullification paper), of the 24th ult. contains the following requisition, under penalty of—

"Let congress repeal the tariff—abandon the principle of protection—abolish internal improvements—enact none but bona fide revenue laws—and let the government be administered fairly and honestly upon the great principle of equal burden and equal benefits, and southern excitement will instantly cease, harmony be restored between the different sections of the country, and new life and vigor infused into the union itself. But unless these things are done—it is unnecessary to say any more."

[What happened in "the days of the Hartford Convention" so inmodest and outrageous as the preceding? Does a southern position give boldness to treasonable suggestions? Are they who most bawled at the "Hartford Conventionists" made of so much better stuff that more extravagant acts in themselves are patriotic?]

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL, patriarch and oracle of the law, arrived in this city on Wednesday last, and has taken lodgings at Mrs. Sworld's. He comes as an invalid, but the medical skill to which he has repaired is equal to what man can accomplish against disease, and will be exerted with the profound interest due to so venerable, useful and celebrated a character. It is the intention, we believe, of the members of the Philadelphia bar to offer him suitable public honors.

[Nat. Gaz., Oct. 1.

MR. CALHOUN, it is said, "in any event" (if living and in health), will be a candidate for the presidency of the United States, at the next election.

NEW YORK. We much fear that this city is paying dearly for its pre-eminence in commercial communications with the old world—not only in becoming the temporary resting place of many foreign vagabonds and villains, but because of their example on the native population. We are shocked with accounts of all sorts of crimes—four burglaries recently happened in one night, acts of violence are common, and pick pockets and petty thieves abound; some high-way robberies also take place, and persons are knocked down without ceremony—and yet the police is one of the best and most efficient, in the detection of rogues, in America. We gather these facts from the proceedings of the judicial tribunals.

The N. Y. Daily Advertiser learns from authentic sources, that during the month of September the people of this city, and strangers visiting it, have been robbed of $5,918 in money, 16 watches, 272 silver spoons and almost an incalculable amount of jewelry, clothes, cloths, household furniture, &c. &c.

MARYLAND. Excessively pressed for room, as we should have been if giving sixty-four pages instead of thirty-two to the present number, though twice our regular quantity, we cannot do more just now than offer a summary view of the results of the general election in Maryland, which took place on Monday last. Particulars hereafter—for reference.

Congress. Messrs. Howard, and Mitchell (Jackson) have been re-elected—Mr. Worthington (J.) supplies the place of Mr. Brown (J.) who was a candidate; and Mr. Thomas (J.) has beaten Mr. Sprigg, also Jackson, the late member, and a candidate—total 4.

Messrs. Semmes and Washington, (Clay), are re-elected—Mr. Jenifer (C.) succeeds Mr. Dorsey (C.) who declined a poll; Mr. Spence (C.) takes the place of Mr. Wilson, (J.) who was not a candidate, and Mr. Kerr (C.) has beaten Mr. Spencer (J.) the late member—total 5. So the vote of the state is for Mr. Clay.

Legislature. We have not all the returns for the house of delegates—but it is supposed that 57 Clay, and 23 Jackson members have been elected—total number 80. Add the senate, 15—and the vote in joint ballot will stand 72 Clay, 23 Jackson—majority 49.

GEORGIA. We present a case in Georgia, page 121, wherein the governor has nullified the decision of the superior court for the western district of that state. It is a novel proceeding, and will cause no small degree of excitement and surprise—if any thing can surprise persons in these strange and troublous times, when every thing, in the heated-south, is on the high-pressure, and a "bursting of the boiler" may be expected, though we know not how, when, or wherefore. But Quem Deus, &c.

Athens, Geo. Sept. 30. At the Gwinnett term of the superior court held last week, the rev. J. J. Trott, rev. Ezra Butler and rev. S. A. Worcester, missionaries to the Cherokee nation, were sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for four years each, for refusing to take the oath to obey the laws of Georgia. At the same term seven other white men residing in the nation, viz: Messrs. Ginn, Delosier, Mayes, Coplin, Eaton and two persons by the name of Thompson, received each the same sentence for the same offence. The old plea, denying the jurisdiction of the court, was the only defence set up.

Augusta, Sept. 26. This morning's mail brings us the following news from Milledgeville: Nine of the convicts above mentioned, have been pardoned by the governor, on giving assurances that they would not again violate the laws. Two of the missionaries, Worcester and Butler, refusing to give such pledges of future good behaviour, were committed to the penitentiary. Mr. Worcester has applied to the supreme court.

Stocking. "It is currently reported, (says the Massachusetts Telegraph of the 24th ult.) in some of the upper counties, that gov. Gilmer's guard have, without the intervention of judge or jury, lately put to death three Indians, by shooting, for digging gold on the Cherokee land." We must hope, for the sake of humanity, the feelings of our people, and the character of the state, that this cannot be true; but, when we reflect how much all these have lately and frequently been outraged, in the same quarter, and by the same men, we cannot help learning the worst. [Augusta Chronicle.]

The rev. Mr. Worcester, at the time of his first arrest, was post-master in the Cherokee country, and, as an officer of the United States, discharged, as not within the operation of the law of Georgia; but as soon as the facts were known at Washington, he was dismissed from the place of post-master, and immediately arrested, a second time, by the military force of the state of Georgia, and has been sent to the penitentiary as a criminal. On this point the Louisville Post makes the following pregnant remarks: "Is it within the reserved rights of a state to refuse any peaceable citizen of the United States a residence within her geographical or chartered limits, unless he will take an oath prescribed by such state? Is it consistent with that guaranty contained in the constitution, that secures to each citizen of any state, all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states? Where, then, does Georgia derive the power to imprison the Cherokee missionaries for not taking such an oath as she prescribes? It is not within her reserved powers to condemn men to incarceration without crime, without conviction, without trial, without even an accusation of crime. Yet all this she is doing with impunity!"

[We have a full account of the trial of the offenders, with the opinion of the court, &c. The case is headed, "THE STATE vs. the MISSIONARIES," and the whole shall be registered.]

INSANITY, produced by wild notions about religion, has recently caused several murders and suicides in the United States; and hence some of late exciting meetings have been severely condemned. There surely is a right-limbed limit even to a zeal to do good—a fitness and a discretion in all things. The brutal deed is easily broken—and when we see that surgeons are oftentimes punished for misadvent operations on the body—are we without remedy against individuals who work upon and destroy both body and mind, by misdirect or ignorant proceedings in religious subjects, which bring forth murder and suicide? It is a delicate matter, and one that should not be lightly interfered with—but we think there have been cases wherein the law ought to have applied to punish evil-doers for outrageous attempts to accomplish what they thought was good. If ignorance does not excuse the surgeon or physician, why should it the clergyman? We cannot see why. And in highly excited cases because of feelings about religion, worthy clergymen would be as cautious to reduce them into soberness, as a faithful physician could be to lessen the fever of his patient, preliminary to a cure of any general disease which might afflict him. The fever, in either case, must be first "broken"—and then a healthful state may be hoped for.

IRELAND. In continuation of the facts and remarks that we presented some time ago concerning the state of Ireland, because that the British government preferred the labor of Englishmen and had established a precedence for it in many respects, we have some additional facts and remarks to offer—that the true system of "politics for working men" may be better understood. The strange operation now exists—that provisions exported from Ireland, to keep down the balance in favor of England, (because of the superior encouragement or protection to labor in the latter), have been purchased at Liverpool, and returned, in charity, to the very places from whence they were exported, in payment of debts! This fact is one of the best of all possible illustrations that can be offered of the importance of the HOME-MARKET. Had the VALUE of the bread-stuffs and meats sent to England from Ireland been exported in manufactures, starvation in the latter, if not wholly prevented, would have had a much less fearful extent. Out of these facts we shall also show the glaring absurdity of what is called "free trade," unless to increase the wealth of one people, by adding to the privations of another! It is impossible, in the present state of society, that it can be mutually advantageous. We mean real "free trade"—not English "free trade," which only means profit to England.

From the London Morning Chronicle—In another column will be found a report of a trial at the Kilkenny assizes, of two Roman Catholic gentlemen, for a conspiracy to compel a clergyman to lower his tithes. The jury were exclusively Protestants. They were convicted; and the judge (Johnson) sentenced them to twelve months' imprisonment, and a fine of £50 each.

The severity of the sentence will strike most of our readers. The Dublin Morning Register says—"These gentlemen appear to be men of high and spotless character. It is proved that the public tranquility owes them a great deal. They offended without knowing what they did. But with the judges of this country, the last consideration is the guilt of the prisoners. They sent about them to see what offences are epidemic at the time, and woe to the prisoner who happens to have committed an epidemic offence or crime. Sheep stealing, for instance, happens to be on the increase; "we must make examples" (say they), and no mercy for sheep stealers that year. Tithes, as our readers well know, are at present a very ticklish property in Ireland. If report is to be believed, the people have generally refused to pay them, and at the sales there are no bidders; so that it has been found necessary, in some cases, to convey the goods taken for tithes to England. Tithe offences are, therefore, at present peculiarly obnoxious; and hence, by way of example, and to cure country gentlemen of their disinclination to pay tithes, this enormously severe sentence. At another time, the same offence might have escaped with a fine of five pounds. If the power of judges in such a case extended to hanging, they would have thought an execution or two beneficial to arrest the progress of the evil.

RUSSIAN LOAN, &c. The house of Hope & Co. of Amsterdam, have opened a loan for Russia, on commission only, not being contractors. The English call it a "Pole-murdering loan," and it gets on badly, though offered at 78 per cent. for a 5 per cent. stock—or, at the start, 22 per cent. under the par. The intended amount is 20 millions of rubles, equal to three millions sterling, but if taken, because of the discount, will produce only £2,300,000! To such a straight is the great autocrat redressed. It was very uncertain if it would be taken up even on the terms proposed.

It appears from the proceeding that the present par of the Russian ruble is 5s. sterling. The silver ruble, we suppose is meant.

THE MADAWASKA TERRITORY. The governor of Maine, under a resolve of the legislature of the state, lately appointed Messrs. Deane and Kavanah, commissioners to visit the disputed territory on the river St. John, to inquire into the condition and disposition of the inhabitants, and to give them information of the proceedings and views of the government and of the state in relation to them. These gentlemen entered on their mission about the middle of the summer, and returned safely near the end of August, having accomplished the objects of their appointment. On their arrival at the Madawaska settlement, notice of it was immediately despatched to the British authorities at Fredericton. They were soon after met by the Warden of the disputed territory, by direction of the provincial government, who inquired of them the objects of their mission. These being frankly explained to him, he protested against their proceedings, and told them that if they persisted, it would be his duty to continue with them. They expressed their regret at giving him the trouble, but told him they were bound to carry their instructions into execution. He continued with them two or three days, but offered no impediment to their proceedings.

(Boston Daily Adv.)

*Reports are in town that difficulties have occurred on the Madawaska between the British soldiers and the United States citizens. The latter, it is said, undertook on the strength of a deed to take possession of lands, which were in the possession of the British citizens, whereupon a quarrel ensued which terminated in the death of seven British soldiers and four United States citizens. We give this report as circulated from sources tolerably authentic; but it is well not to give it too much credence before it is confirmed from the quarter itself."

OFFICE OF THE COLONIZATION SOCIETY, Washington, Sept. 29th, 1851. The managers of the American colonization society have received information that many respectable free persons of color from the lower counties of Virginia and North Carolina, have made earnest application to the agent of the society in Norfolk for a passage to Liberia. Desirous of meeting the wishes of these applicants, the managers, notwithstanding the recent appropriation of 5,000 dollars towards an expedition from the western states, have authorised a committee in Norfolk forthwith to charter a vessel to convey thence from 150 to 200 emigrants, with the necessary supplies, to the colony, and they now invite the aid of auxiliary societies, and their friends generally, for the accomplishment of this object. Another expedition may, perhaps, be despatched from Virginia during the autumn, should the resources of the society justify additional expenditures. Auxiliary societies and agents are requested to transmit such funds as they may have or obtain, as early as convenient, to the treasurer of the parent society. The managers indulge the hope, that the friends of the society will, at this time, use all possible means and endeavors to augment its funds.

R. R. GURLEY, secretary.

COLOMBIA. We are glad to learn that general Paz is using his best exertions to reduce the military and raise up the working classes. He dresses in the plainest manner, and avoids military display as much as possible. May he persevere in this conduct—may he be permitted to promote the arts of peace, and Colombia had repose under the power of the law!

HURRICANE IN THE WEST INDIES. We have long and fearful details of the late hurricane, felt with such terrific force at Barbadoes, and almost as severely at some of the other islands—that just named, however, being rendered "a heap of ruins." The howlings of the wind—the crash of houses, with the shrieks and groans of the people, are "tales of terror," indeed. Not one house in Bridgetown escaped serious injury, and hundreds of persons were buried under their ruins—the very foundations of many being rooted up! Not a street remained passable—the churches were prostrated, but the church yards remained, and twenty or thirty bodies were buried in single pits, time not being allowed to give each one a grave! The country suffered equally with the town—the buildings and the crops all rendering homage to the power of the storm, and many of the late most wealthy planters were reduced to abject poverty, at once! The vessels were all cast ashore or foundered. So at St. Vincent's, with many deaths. At Munctioneal "the commotion of the sea was so great that the whole beach was covered with fish of every description, and a number of shells, known only to inhabit the deepest water, were thrown ashore. The public road was completely washed away; the wharves, both public and private, are all gone, excepting the piles, and a small sloop, the Faithful, is left in the middle of the public road. The damage done is considerable, but only extends to those situated near the sea." And yet the gale, itself, was not much felt there, and a letter from Port Maria says—We were visited with a tremendous heavy sea, and some of the oldest inhabitants do not remember to have seen it so violent. You may judge of its fury, when I state it rendered the road from here to Orebassa impassable, having thrown up immense rocks and trees with which the road was literally strewn!

The loss at St. Vincent's is estimated at £500,000 sterling; that at Barbadoes no one has ventured to calculate—not less than 4,000 persons are supposed to have been killed by the falling houses, &c. Some houses were entirely lifted up, and thrown great distances from their old locations!—large trees and other heavy bodies, were floated in the air, in terrible violence!

The aggregate of the damages sustained at various places must amount to many millions of dollars—probably not less than twelve or fifteen. The growing crops were, in many cases, wholly destroyed.

The people of those islands which escaped the gale, were doing much to relieve the calamities of the sufferers, and partial supplies of provisions and other necessities had been freely transmitted.

BRITISH SOLDIERS. We notice among the recent deaths of English military men some that are not without interest to us.

A colonel Anwyll of the 4th, of whom his biographer speaks in the highest terms, recently died in the Isle of Wight. After distinguishing himself in the peninsula, and particularly at St. Sebastian's, he came over to Canada as brigade major of gen. Robinson, and commanded the light troops of his brigade in an attack on the American pickets at Plattsburgh, and displayed a gallantry, which, if it had been more general, might have made sad work among our undisciplined militiamen, when they were "backside of Albany."

In July last, also died, aged 83, gen. sir Charles Green, bart. colonel of the 37th. He was an officer in the 31st during our revolution, was in several engagements on the frontier, and was wounded in the battle of Freeman's farm, while delivering a message from gen. Philips to gen. Burgoyne. In 1796 he had an appointment of high rank in Canada, and saw service afterwards in different countries.

Colonel James McDermot, of the military college, is another of the veterans of the revolution. He came over when Quebec was relieved, and remained in America till 1787, having been in service the whole intervening period. All these men died in the midst of wealth or honor. The British government has taken good care of its old soldiers. [Albany Daily Advertiser.]

*The damages sustained by the hurricane of the 10th October 1780, were estimated at seven millions of dollars, and at that time 4,326 persons lost their lives. The loss of life and the amount of damage by the late gale, are thought equal to those of 1780. In that year, the force of the wind and waves was so violent, as to remove a 12-pounder cannon, from the south to the north side of a battery, 420 feet!

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York brings Liverpool dates to the 23d August.

FRANCE.

There seems to be no hope that France will interfere in behalf of the Poles, the Perrier policy appearing to prevail still in her councils. There is an article however in the Courier Francais, which mentions that the great powers, including France, have at length decided on acknowledging the independence of Poland. The harvest in France has been abundant and the grain uncommonly fine. The king, in answer to the address of the deputies, returns thanks, and says that the French army will be withdrawn from Belgium the moment that the safety of that country shall be secure from aggression. From the French Budget the credits asked for for 1852, is 1,097,700,000 francs, those of this year were 1,172,000,000, being less by 74,300,000 than those of 1851, to meet which the government have in available resources an excess of income over the necessary expenditures of 63,360,000 francs. Paris was quiet.

ENGLAND.

The reform bill is still progressing slowly, and the opposition have so far succeeded in their views as to load it with sundry objectionable provisions. The crops in England and Scotland were secured, and had proved to be a full average in quantity, and very superior in quality to those of last year. The foreign policy of the ministry is strenuously opposed, and the opposition seems to wish ministers to place themselves in a warlike attitude against France; the latter however coolly maintain themselves against every assault. Some alterations with respect to the army in Ireland, were in contemplation.

RUSSIA AND POLAND.

The main body of the Russian army was marching upon Warsaw, and a decisive battle was again speedily expected. The Poles were in fine spirits and expressed themselves full of hope and confidence. On the 12th of August the Russian commander-in-chief kept the grand army at a distance of 50 miles from Warsaw—the Polish army in sight. It was thought and feared that the plague would be introduced into the Russian army from their Asiatic provinces, where it had broken out with great malignity.

A successful attack had been made by major Anrel, of the Russian army, on the Poles at Osak, 500 were killed and 187, with 9 officers, taken prisoners.

The emperor Nicholas has issued a proclamation in which he enjoins it upon the Poles to return to their duty, and promises pardon to all who may seek it; tells them that he had sent other troops to strengthen his army, and that, if they do not submit, dangerous consequences must ensue.

PORTUGAL.

The Paris Constitutionnel states that Don Pedro, who had written to Don Miguel inviting him to meet him in London, and declaring, in case of refusal, that he should bring his daughter to Lisbon, had received an answer from Miguel, in which he states that, by taking the title of duke of Braganza, Don Pedro had become his vassal, and that as such by writing that letter he had been guilty of a want of respect to his sovereign; that he should be tried for his crime, as also for having assumed a title to which he had no claim, as, by abdication, he had forfeited it to the king's son; that the title of Donna Maria was invalid; that he had been proclaimed king and possessed the affections of the Portuguese, that Don Pedro was a blind tool of ignorant advisers, chosen from the lowest orders of the people; that he had become a second Alca, a complete rebel chief—a disturber of public order, and enemy to the peace of Europe, and an enemy to liberal ideas. Three emissaries had arrived from France with men for the French fleet, to complete their crews. Don Miguel was continuing his military preparations.

A regiment of the king's troops had revolted, killed their officers and marched to the public square, where they disarmed the police and gave their arms to the rabble. They were joined by many of the inhabitants; but were soon surrounded by a force under Don Miguel, who fired into them and killed from 300 to 400, when the survivors surrendered.

BELGIUM.

A correspondent of the London Times, writes from Paris that the greater part of the French army were to be withdrawn from Belgium—peace was therefore looked for. The utmost tranquility prevailed at Brussels, and the most friendly relations existed between the French commander-in-chief, gen. Girard, and the prince of Orange. The duke of Saxe Weimar is said to have insulted Lord William Russell, the English minister, and to have spoken disrespectfully of the king and queen of England.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Wool still bears a high price.—American from 50 to 70 cents per lb.

William Ramsey, esq. long a member of congress from Pennsylvania, and re-elected, died on the 25th ult. after a brief illness of three days.

Harrison G. Ous, esq. the faithful and vigilant mayor of Boston, has declined a re-election, for reasons exclusively of a private nature.

Civilization.—At the last bull fight at Aranjuez, the most celebrated matador in Spain was embowelled on the spot, amidst the loudest applause of the court and the other spectators!

The pendent during the last week had a sharp attack of intermittent fever. He was somewhat indisposed on his return from his visit to Carrollton, and he promptly applied efficacious remedies before the disease assumed the form of the epidemic, which is now prevalent in the city. By thus taking it in anticipation, the fever recurred only twice with violence, and the third chill was entirely prevented. He has been rapidly recovering since, and was able to ride out on Friday. [Globe, Oct. 3.]

A second mutiny, and by a second crew, has taken place on board the revenue cutter Morris, stationed on the coast of Maine.

Tennessee. The legislature of this state commenced its biennial session on the 19th ult. The message of gov. Carroll is confined entirely to matters of state policy, if we except the recommendation of the establishment of the general ticket mode of electing electors of president and vice president of the United States.—This course is recommended in order that the state of Tennessee may have its "full weight in the elections for president and vice president hereafter;" that is, not at the ensuing election, for he says, "it is true that no danger of division is to be apprehended at the approaching election; but in future," &c.

Cabbage. A family in Philadelphia has been poisoned—two of whom died and three were not expected to recover, from eating cabbage, thought to have contained a poisonous worm. A dog and a cat that ate from the dish on which the cabbage had been placed, took sick.

The population of the town of Manchester, England, and its suburbs, is thus given in a late British paper:

Manchester	142,026
Salford, divided by the canal only, and bridge of 150 feet	40,705
Charlton Row (estimated)	21,000
Hulme	9,600
Pendleton	8,435
Ardwick (estimated)	6,000
Cheetham	4,025
Broughton	1,530

All within two miles 233,580

Being an increase of about 75,000 or very nearly 50 per cent. on the returns of 1821.

The foregoing towns all join.

The editor of the Guardian further says, that within 7 or 9 miles of Manchester, the population was estimated to be a million. The goods manufactured in this thickly populated neighborhood, all, or nearly all, are disposed of in Manchester.

A laugh story.—"An old pilot of the Moluccas," says Piquette, "assured me of a verity that they had pigmies there who dwelt in caverns, and had ears so very long that they slept upon one, and covered themselves with the other." No bad hint for brother Jonathan.

"Heads of families." There are now in the employ of George George, esq. clothier of Fries, three men

A land gull. Under this term a Philadelphia paper gives a long description of a certain native of Mexico, whose most common name is Mareno, aged from 60 to 65 years; who has been playing off his swindlings in that city and its neighborhood. We had thought this fellow must have run his course—for it is 15 to 18 years since, affecting to be a piouser patriot, he preyed on many of the people of Baltimore, and among them on ourselves, for about fifty dollars. He is one of the smoothest scoundrels that ever lived.

Nobility. Among the European nobility probably the marquis of Stafford is the wealthiest individual. His income goes beyond £300,000 sterling. The duke of Medina Celi, whose wealth is generally taken as a standard and term of comparison, possesses only 214,000,000 reals, about £115,000, and he is obliged to keep a regal establishment, as he still keeps up his pretensions to the crown of Spain. His household amounts to more than 200 persons.

Subscriptions are now making by the alumni and friends of this college to raise the sum of one hundred thousand dollars to extend its means of instruction, and, at a late meeting of the alumni, thirty thousand dollars were immediately subscribed. It is expected that the whole sum contemplated will soon be obtained.

New Bedford, Sept. 19. Drowned, yesterday, in the diving bell employed near the Hen and Chickens to raise a wreck, capt. Jonathan Blanchard, of Plympton, aged about 40. Every effort was made to recover the body, but in vain. Capt. B. had a wife and five children, to whom this melancholly event will be peculiarly afflictive.

Died, on the 2nd Sept. at Millerstown, Pa. John Reid, esq., in the 86th year of his age. He was one of seven brothers who all joined the army of the revolution, a person of much influence among his neighbors, and highly esteemed.

—in Prallville, N. J. John Prull, aged 74 years—he entered the service of his country in the revolution as a lieutenant, and fought at Brandywine, Monmouth, &c. &c. and at Elizabeth-town was severely wounded. He was an elder of the Presbyterian church for more than 40 years.

William Chapman, who obtained considerable celebrity for curing impediments of speech, died suddenly in July last, in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, and his widow, ten days after, married a fellow who had been for a short time an inmate of the family, who called himself Mina—saying that he was the son of the celebrated general of that name. Mina soon rendered an act of justice to the wanton, by seizing upon all her valuables that were convertible into money, and leaving her to her private reflections. He has since been arrested to the eastward for the forgery of a draft of $1,000, and is demanded by the governor of Pennsylvania to answer a charge of having poisoned Mr. Chapman, whose body has been raised and examined. The woman, his wife, had left the neighborhood, and, it is supposed, has concealed her shame and mortification in Canada. ["Mina" has been brought to Philadelphia. It is not long since he left one of the penitentiaries, on the expiration of his period of service—and, for murder or forgery, will be checked in his career of wrong.]

Drink for horses.—Some of the inn-keepers on the western road, (Eng.) have adopted the practice recommended by a member of the Bath Agricultural Society, of boiling the corn given to horses, and giving them the water to drink. It is most satisfactorily ascertained that three bushels of oats, barley, &c., so prepared, will keep the horses in better condition for working than double the quantity in a crude state.

FREE TRADE CONVENTION.

We designed to have attended this meeting at Philadelphia, which assembled on Friday, the 30th Sept. but could not make it convenient to leave home; and so, perhaps, have lost much information concerning the discovery and location of free trade.

We have a considerable body of articles in relation to the getting-up of this convention. It surely contains many gentlemen of first rate talents and most lofty character—but the manner in which many of them were made delegates, goes to show that the people have had very little feeling in this matter: in general, the primary meetings were exceedingly small. In some cases, and at most important places, hardly exceeding in number that of the delegates appointed by them! We notice that the British subject, Mr. Sarchett (one of the sixteen delegates elected by the meeting of fourteen persons at Philadelphia), is not reported as one of the members—but a certain resolution passed the convention with the apparent view of securing his invaluable services in the cause of "free trade." The delegates appointed at the "private" meeting in Baltimore have not attended—though two gentlemen are reported from Maryland. We have not the pleasure of knowing them, nor from whence they came—never having seen any notice of their appointment.

There were 51 delegates from Virginia; 40 South Carolina, all from Charleston except 15; or 3; 23 New York, all from the city; 13 Massachusetts, chiefly from Boston; 16 North Carolina; 15 Pennsylvania—all from Philadelphia; 11 Alabama; 9 New Jersey; 6 Georgia; 3 Maine; 2 Connecticut; 2 Maryland; 2 Tennessee and 1 Rhode Island, and 1 Mississippi.

The following sketches of the proceedings of the convention take in every matter of interest, reported in the Philadelphia papers, except a list of the names of the delegates, which shall be given hereafter.

Friday, Sept. 30. At 12 o'clock the meeting was called to order by Mr. Joseph R. Evans, of Philadelphia, and col. Richard Bassett, of Virginia, appointed chairman pro tem.

A long discussion then followed as to the manner in which the president of the convention should be chosen. Some would have the choice made by states, others pro capita; either party supporting its opinion with much tenacity. At last, to end the debate, which had become rather animated, Mr. Cheves moved that the convention would simply proceed to elect a president to-morrow; and then the meeting adjourned.

Saturday, Oct. 1. The convention was called to order at 10 o'clock by Mr. Bassett. Mr. Gallatin nominated Mr. P. P. Barbour, of Virginia, for president of the convention, and he was elected by general acclamation. On taking his seat, Mr. Barbour returned thanks for the honor conferred, in a very neat and brief address. Mr. Condy Raguet, of Philadelphia, was then appointed secretary.

Mr. Mitchell, of South Carolina, then rose and introduced to the consideration of the convention certain resolutions offered by Mr. Webster, at a town meeting in Boston in 1820, and made some copious remarks upon them. The substance of these resolutions seem to be as follows, and Mr. M. said that they contained the "universal sentiment of the people of South Carolina"—

"That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are benefitted by the tariff, favor great capitalists rather than personal industry, or the owners of small capacity, and therefore that we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industry.

"That we are equally incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequences of its adoption would be that the farmer must give more than he now does, for all he buys, and receive less for all he sells.

"That the impositions of duties which are enormous and declared by a large portion of the people to be unequal and unjust, is dangerous, as it encourages the practice of smuggling.

"That in the opinion of this meeting, the duties of the tariff should be reduced to the standard of revenue for the support of government."

These resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. Gallatin thought that before bringing specific propositions before the convention, some preliminary steps were necessary for the general arrangement of business. He had learned with great satisfaction that fifteen states were represented in the convention. The members had as yet had but little opportunity for ascertaining each others' sentiments. To promote this object and to facilitate business, he would propose that a committee should be appointed, consisting of two members to be elected by the delegation of each state, or of one member when, from the necessity of the case, there would be no more than one, and that to this federative committee thus formed should be committed the duty of arranging the order of business. The principal object of the convention was of a particular nature. A remonstrance to congress must be prepared. A committee of correspondence to collect facts, may be necessary. An address to the people of the United States, will, perhaps, be thought proper. To prepare business for the consideration of the convention, a general committee seemed necessary, and that this committee might have general powers, he offered a resolution expressed in general terms.

After some remarks from Mr. Jones, of Georgia, Mr. Poindexter, of Miss. Mr. Gallatin, of New York, Mr. Chives, of South Carolina, and Mr. Carpenter, of Maine, as to the rules of business, which, at last, seemed to be left to the "common law of parliament."

It was resolved that there should be a recess of half an hour, to afford the different delegations an opportunity of electing the members of the federative committee, for the general arrangement of business.

When the president had resumed the chair, the different delegations reported that they had elected the following gentlemen, members of the federative committee.

Massachusetts—Theodore Sedgwick, Henry Lee.

Rhode Island—William Hunter.

Connecticut—William J. Forbe, James Donsghe.

New York—Albert Gallatin, John Augustus Smith.

New Jersey—Cornelius H. Hardenburg, H. Vethake.

Pennsylvania—Thomas P. Cope, Clement C. Biddle.

Maryland—William W. Hays, A. E. Jones.

Virginia—James McGarrett, John W. Jones.

North Carolina—James Iredell, William A. Mount.

South Carolina—Chancellor Harper, D. E. Huger.

Georgia—J. McPherson Berrien, Eli S. Shorter.

Alabama—Enoch Parsons, Henry Goldthwaite.

Mississippi—George E. Poindexter.

Tennessee—Willich E. Butler, Alexander Patton.

Mr. Berrien, of Georgia, stated that it was desirable to ascertain the operations of the duties in various parts of the union, and as some parts were not represented on this floor, he would offer a resolution to invest the president to invite persons capable of giving information, to a seat within the bar.

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and the convention adjourned to 12 o'clock on Monday.

Monday, Oct. 3. A number of new delegates appeared. The president announced the names of several gentlemen, (not given in the proceedings), in the discretion allowed him by Mr. Berrien's resolution. The president was invested with power to make accommodation for such ladies as should please to attend. On motions made, it was resolved that chief justice Marshall and Mr. James Brown, of Lou. should be invited to seats within the bar of the convention—and some other minor matters were attended to.

Mr. Gallatin, the chairman of the federative or general committee, reported that the committee were doubtful of the extent of the powers conferred on them—whether they had authority to draft a memorial to congress, and an address to the people, or simply to prepare business for the consideration of the convention. He had been instructed by the committee to ask for information on these points, and also to submit to the convention, a resolution for the appointment of a committee, consisting of one person from each of the states represented in the convention, to prosecute before congress the great objects which they had assembled to promote.

After remarks from several gentlemen, it was agreed that the committee should be authorised to prepare drafts of a memorial, and such other papers as they might deem necessary.

The president laid before the meeting, a document that had been forwarded from Lauderdale county, Alabama. It represented that the citizens of that county were decidedly opposed to the tariff policy, but that it was inconvenient to them to send representatives. They would, however, be bound by the proceedings of the convention, provided they were not of a nullifying character. They also suggested the holding of an annual meeting of the friends of free trade, the delegates to which should be appropriated among the several states according to the number of their representatives in congress.

On motion of Mr. Gallatin it was then resolved, that there should be a recess of an hour, to allow the federative committee an opportunity for deliberation.

When the president resumed the chair, Mr. Gallatin, the chairman of the federative committee, by direction of that committee, reported two resolutions, one directing an address to the people of the United States, the other a memorial to congress, to be prepared, to promote the objects of the convention.

These resolutions were adopted without a dissenting voice.

Mr. Mercien of New York, then offered a resolution requesting the general committee to have the memorial and address prepared, and to submit them to the consideration of the convention.

It would, he believed, be conceded on all hands, that attendance in the convention was very inconvenient to many of the members, and productive of great sacrifices. The sooner we get through the business, the more satisfactory it will be to all. Mr. M. proposed to commit the duty of preparing the memorial and the address to the general committee, because it was already appointed, because it was well qualified, and because, from the manner in which it had been formed, it possessed the means of ascertaining the exact wishes of the different states represented in the convention. An additional reason was, that some interchange of sentiment on the subject of the memorial and of the address, had, he understood, already taken place among the members of the committee.

The motion was adopted, 117 members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. Jones, of Georgia, then offered a resolution, the gist of which was the absolute unconstitutionality of the "American System."

Mr. Charles Q. Clapp, of Maine, proposed a substitute, asserting the opposition of the "American System" to the spirit of the constitution.

On motion of Mr. Bassett, it was resolved to lay the resolution and the substitute on the table.

Mr. Poindexter, of Mississippi, then offered a series of resolutions, expressive of the warmest attachment to the constitution, and a determination to defend it at all hazards from all foes external and internal; but insisting on the principles of strict construction, declaring a constitution to be an instrument limiting the powers of the governors, and that when these limits were transgressed by the governors, the people ought not to submit.

Mr. Poindexter offered to lay the resolutions on the table, and Mr. Vethake, of New Jersey, made a motion to that effect.

Governor Miller, of South Carolina, thought this course would be improper. The resolutions purported to be instructions to the general committee, and if they were to have any effect, they ought to be discussed before the general committee made its report. Laying them on the table, might retard the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. Jones, of Georgia, in an animated speech, declared that the object of his resolution was to instruct the committee, and the object of the resolutions of the gentleman from Mississippi, was the same. If it be proper to give any instructions to the committee, the sooner it is done the better. His object was to elicit the sentiments of the convention, in regard to the unconstitutionality of protecting and prohibitory duties. He had been especially instructed by his constituents to maintain the unconstitutionality as well as inexpediency of the system. He had not known the object for which they were assembled, and it would be to little purpose if they were not to declare that the system was unconstitutional. The inexpediency of it, was, to his constituents, a minor consideration. "We stand on the principle of the unconstitutionality of the system. Bad as our condition now is, bad as our burdens are, they are nothing to what they may be, if the constitutionality of the system be admitted. We had better never have assembled, if by our silence on this point we leave it to be inferred that the act is constitutional, and we are at the mercy of any congress if we only declare it inexpedient."

Col. Butler, of South Carolina, (who spoke with equal animation) said he hoped the resolutions of the gentleman from Mississippi would be referred to the committee, with their report. As far as that report went, he was perfectly satisfied. He feared it did not go far enough. The address and memorial to be drawn up by that committee, would breathe a tone, a spirit, that might satisfy his constituents. But, he observed, there was no allusion made in it to the question of the unconstitutionality of the tariff. My constituents, said Mr. Butler, believe that it is unconstitutional, and believing so, it was a question of vital importance to them. I agree with my friend from Georgia, that it is necessary that this question should be decided on by this body. I will go as far in the spirit of conciliation as any one. I am delighted with the spirit which I see pervades this assembly. I see a disposition to oppose the system of which we complain, and a spirit becoming the occasion. But I cannot go so far as to compromise principles, and to disregard the instructions of those who sent me here. I do not insist on the precise proposition in which it may be said the constitution has been violated. It was enough that the constitution of a people had been violated—whether in spirit or letter was immaterial. I come instructed by constituents who know their rights, and will not consent to any compromise of principle, that will put me in jeopardy, and to yield the constitutionality of the measure might have that effect; and to forbear expressing our opinion on this point, might be construed into acquiescence, although not so intended. This question must be met, and if I refuse to meet it, I will go home to be consumed by the indignation of freemen who have sent me here to assert and maintain their rights.

Mr. Veshake agreed to withdraw his motion to lay the resolutions offered by Mr. Pointexter on the table, to make way for the motion to refer them to the committee, on the distinct understanding that such reference of them in no way implied any instruction on the subject to the committee by the convention. He said he had no intention of expressing an opinion of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the restrictive system; but wished simply to stave off the discussion for the present. The committee, he had no doubt, would be able to meet the wishes, if not of all, of the great majority of the members of the convention. The discussion could be entered upon when the memorial and address were before the convention.

Chancellor Harper, of S. C., moved to commit all the resolutions to the general committee for consideration.

Mr. Cheves said that if the resolutions were to be regarded in the light of instructions, he would give the preference to that of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Jones). The resolutions of the gentleman from Mississippi involved too much—they involved the whole principles of government, some of which it was unnecessary now to discuss. If the resolutions were simply committed to the general committee for consideration, we should be just where we are now: for the resolutions involved no opinions not familiar to all the members of the committee. Two courses presented themselves to the convention. The one was to make an express declaration of principles in distinct resolutions, and be governed thereby in the preparation of memorials and remonstrances. The other was to embody the sense, intelligence, and local information of the members in distinct committees. As the object was to consume the least time, the latter course had been adopted by the convention. It was obvious that there was but one question which could agitate this body, and that was the question of the constitutionality of the restrictive system. This question cannot be evaded. Meet it in some shape, we must. It must be brought forward, if by no other person, by myself (unless I am forcibly silenced) though I should prefer its being brought forward by another. It struck Mr. C. that the best way to bring it forward would be to suffer the committee to report, as discussion now might retard their proceedings.

Chancellor Harper, of South Carolina, was decidedly of opinion that it would be best to defer the discussion till the committee had made their report. The resolution that had been offered might be regarded as mere hints for their consideration.

Mr. Berrien, of Georgia, with a view of ascertaining whether the resolutions contained instructions to the committee, or mere suggestions, requested that they might be read again.

The request was complied with, and then Mr. Berrien stated that the resolutions did not, in his view, contain any thing absolutely binding on the committee or on the convention. He gave the preference to the resolution of his colleague (Mr. Jones), but he would, out of abundant caution, suggest a verbal alteration to his friend in order to meet the wishes of the members generally.

The president stated that the committing of the resolutions would not bind the body. They might decide directly against them, if they saw fit.

The resolutions of Mr. Jones of Georgia, Mr. Clapp of Maine, and Mr. Pointexter of Mississippi, were then committed to the organic committee for consideration.

Mr. Gallatin said that as the commitment of these resolutions imposed on the committee the duty of examining the subject matter referred to therein, he had been instructed to say the committee would not be prepared to report before Wednesday at 12 o'clock.

The convention then adjourned to 12 o'clock on Wednesday.

Wednesday, Oct. 5. We must be brief in our notice of this day's proceedings. The president submitted a communication from James Ronaldson, of Philadelphia, stating that a reduction had recently taken place in the price of iron, and suggesting the appointment of a committee to enquire why the prices of iron, sugar, and other commodities were so much lower now than in former years. [It does not appear that any reference was given to this communication.]

Mr. Mitchell, of S. C. offered a general resolution which had for its object, to abolish all specific or minimum duties, and institute an ad valorem duty on all imported articles. Referred. [In offering this resolution Mr. M. said "he was not a man of business." The proposition itself shews that he entertained a just opinion of himself.]

The general committee not being ready to report, the convention adjourned till 4 o'clock, when the report of an "address to the people of the United States of America" was received and read. From a sketch of the contents of this address, it seems that the tariff laws are pronounced "unconstitutional." The other points made are those generally urged by the opponents of the "American System." It is said to be an "elegant composition" and to have been "elegantly read" by Mr. Berrien. Adjourned.

[Among those who visited the convention this day, were chief justice Marshall, judge Baldwin and Mr. Johnston, a senator of the United States from Louisiana. Not many ladies attended.]

NATIONAL ANTI-MASONIC CONVENTION.

From the Patriot.

Baltimore, Sept. 26, 1831.

At 12 o'clock, M. the delegates to the national anti-masonic convention assembled in the saloon of the Athenaeum, and were called to order by the hon. judge Hurt, of New York, when the hon. John Rutherford was called to the chair, and the following officers being nominated were unanimously chosen:—

JOHN C. SPENCER, of New York, President.
 JOHN RUTHERFORD, New Jersey, 1st V. P.
 JONATHAN SLOAN, Ohio, 2d V. P.
 THOMAS ELDER, Penn., 3d V. P.
 JOHN BAILEY, Mass., 4th V. P.
 BENJAMIN F. HALLER, }
 EDWARD D. BARBER, } secretaries.
 S. C. LEAVITT,
 CALAB EMERY,

On taking the chair, Mr. Spencer addressed the convention as follows:—

Gentlemen—I return you my thanks for the distinguished honor you have conferred in calling upon me to preside over your deliberations. While I distrust my ability to discharge the duties of the chair, I have yet learnt in the school of anti-masonry to decline no duty to which I may be called in the promotion of our great and growing cause. But my reliance, gentlemen, will be on your patriotism and urbanity, to render the duties of the station light and easy. I ask your indulgence for any errors that may be committed, assuring you that nothing offensive to any member shall proceed from the chair, or be permitted in the deliberations of the convention.

On motion of Mr. Phelps, of Mass. voted, that the credentials of the delegates be now received and examined; upon so doing it appeared that there were present,

New Hampshire	1	New York	31
Maine	2	New Jersey	4
Massachusetts	13	Pennsylvania	19
Rhode Island	4	Ohio	5
Connecticut	6	Maryland	1
Vermont	5	Delaware	1

On motion of Mr. Walker, of Mass. voted, that a regular roll of the members of this convention be now made, and that the state, county and town, in which they reside, be fully designated.

On motion of Mr. Morris, of N. Y. voted, that a committee of three be appointed to invite the hon. Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, to take a seat in this convention. Messrs. Rutherford, of N. J. Burt, of N. Y. and Elder, of Pa. were appointed said committee.

Voted, on motion of Mr. Phelps, that a committee of one from each state be appointed to report upon the business of this convention, viz:

Phelps, of Mass.	Terry, of Connecticut,
Ward, N. Y.	Barber, Vermont,
Jones, Penn.	Vanderpool, N. Jersey,
Hallett, B. I.	Sloan, Ohio,
Cram, Maine	Gibbons, Delaware,
Emery, N. H.	Shriver, Maryland.

Voted to adjourn to meet again at 4 P. M. Met agreeably to adjournment. Mr. Phelps from the committee reported on the business to be adopted by the convention, which was unanimously accepted.

On motion of judge Hopkins, of New York, voted, that Messrs. Hopkins, of N. York, Jones, of Pa. and Walker, of Mass. be a committee to wait on his hon. chief justice Marshall, now in this city, and request his attendance on the sitting of this body.

Mr. Ward, from the committee, at the call of the convention, submitted a report which was read and laid upon the table.

The president of the convention announced the appointment of the following committees:

On masonic penalties—Hallett, of R. I. Larned, of Maine, Morris, of N. Y. Grimshaw, of Pa. and Warner, of Ohio.

On judicial proceedings in the case of Morgan—J. C. Spencer, of N. Y. Ogilvie, of Pa. Walker, of Mass. Gibbons, of Del. Russell, of N. York.

On the address to the people—Holly, of N. Y. Denny, of Pa. Leavitt of Connecticut.

On publishing the proceedings—Phelps, of Mass. Hopkins, of N. Y. and Foote, of N. Y.

On finance—Irwin, of Pa. Boynton, of Conn. Beekman, of N. Y. Jenkins, of Ohio, Shriver, of Md.

The committee appointed to wait on judge Marshall, reported by their chairman that they had seen that gentleman, and that, in reply to their invitation, his honor politely stated that he should leave the city at 6 o'clock, to-morrow morning, and therefore be unable to attend, although it would afford him great pleasure to do so.

On motion of Mr. St. John, of N. Y. voted to adjourn (till 10 o'clock, to-morrow morning.

Met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings of yesterday were read by the secretary.

Messrs. Oliver, of Mass. Harvey, Heister, Rogle, Burrows, Waters and Stevens, of Pa. Baker, of Ohio, and Strong of N. Y. appeared and took their seats.

A letter directed to the president of the convention from Samuel Stevens, a delegate from N. York, was presented and read to the convention, and on motion of Mr. Seward, of N. Y. was ordered to be entered at large on the journal of the convention.

Mr. Hopkins, of N. Y. announced that chief justice Marshall having been unexpectedly prevented from leaving the city, would soon be in the hall, to attend the deliberations of the convention.

Mr. Rutherford, of N. J. from the committee appointed to wait on the venerable Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and invite him to be present at the deliberations of the convention, reported, "That the committee have seen the secretary of Mr. Carroll, and are informed that Mr. Carroll left this city in the month of June last, for his country residence on the manor of Carrollton, sixteen miles from Baltimore, and that he is not expected to return until the month of October next; that he is in good health, but is desirous to avoid the fatigue of journeys to and from the city. The committee, therefore, did not proceed to Carrollton yesterday, more especially as the weather was inclement, and the visit and journey would occupy part of two days.

On motion of Mr. Phelps, of Mass.

Voted, That the time appointed to make nominations of president and vice president of the United States, be postponed till to-morrow at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. Davis, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this convention will adjourn without day on Wednesday next, the 28th inst.

Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Hallett, of R. I.

Resolved, That the resolution of this convention inviting the venerable Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, to be present at the proceedings of this convention, together with the report of the committee appointed on that resolution, be transcribed and certified by the officers of this convention, and communicated to Mr. Carroll.

Mr. Burt, of N. Y. called for the reading of the rules and orders of this convention, which were accordingly read.

Chief justice Marshall, introduced by Mr. Hopkins, of N. Y. appeared in the hall, in pursuance of the invitation given him, and took a seat to attend the deliberations of the convention.

Mr. Hallett, from the committee appointed to report on the construction of masonic penalties, &c. made a report, which was read and laid on the table.

The president from the committee appointed to prepare a brief history of judicial proceedings, &c. made a report, which was read and laid on the table.

Convention adjourned to four o'clock, P. M.

Four o'clock, P. M. Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Messrs. Pike and Fowler, from Ohio, appeared and took their seats.

The reports of the committees on the construction of masonic penalties, and on the history of judicial proceedings, being under consideration, a debate ensued in which Messrs. Foote, of N. Y. Hallett, of R. I. Ward, of N. Y. Morris, of N. Y. Seward, of N. Y. Walker, of Mass. and Harvey, of Pa. took part.

Mr. Northrop, of N. J. appeared and took his seat.

The reports on the construction of masonic penalties and on the history of judicial proceedings, were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Jones,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to report on the extent to which the principles of free masonry are political, and opposition to them by an organized political party.

Messrs. Jones, of Pa. Seward, of N. Y. Sloane, of Ohio, Bailey, of Mass. Emery, of N. H. were appointed said committee.

The convention adjourned to nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Wednesday, Sept. 28.

Met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Wm. Vanderpool, of N. J. appeared and took his seat.

Mr. Seward, of N. Y. submitted the following preamble and resolution, which were read and passed.

Whereas, Wm. G. Verplanck, of Ballston, Saratoga county, N. Y. a delegate originally appointed by the state convention of the state of New York, has since the last adjournment, arrived in this city, having been detained by accident on his journey. And

Whereas, The place of said delegate has been supplied as a vacancy.

Resolved, That said Wm. G. Verplanck be admitted to a seat as an honorary member with the privilege of participating in the debates, but not in the votes of this convention.

Mr. Samuel J. Packer, of Pa. was also admitted to a seat in the convention in accordance with the foregoing resolution.

On motion of Mr. Phelps, of Mass.

The resolution relative to the nomination of president, &c. was re-considered and amended, so as to strike out that part requiring the convention to go into committee of the whole for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. Walker, of Mass.

Voted, To proceed to ballot for candidates for the offices of president and vice president of the United States. Messrs. Phelps, of Mass. and Stevens, of Pa. were appointed by the president tellers to receive and count the votes.

The convention then proceeded to ballot for president.

Mr. Hambly, of Pa. being absent, on motion of Mr. Irwin, of Pa. Mr. Packer was admitted to vote in his stead.

Mr. Phelps, one of the tellers, reported as follows:—

Whole number of votes.....	111
Necessary to a choice.....	84
William Wirt, of Maryland.....	108
Blank.....	2

The president announced the result, and declared William Wirt, of Md. duly nominated as the anti-masonic candidate for the presidency of the United States. On motion of Mr. Stevens, of Pa.

Resolved unanimously, That William Wirt, of Md. be nominated as the anti-masonic candidate for the office of president of the United States at the ensuing election.

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed to communicate the preceding resolution to Mr. Wirt, and to request his acceptance of the above nomination. Messrs. Rutherford, of N. J. Sloane, of Ohio, and Elder, of Pa. were appointed said committee.

The convention then proceeded to ballot for vice president.

Mr. Stevens, one of the tellers, reported as follows:

Whole number of votes given.....	110
Necessary to a choice.....	83
Amos Ellmaker, of Penn.....	108
John C. Spencer, of New York.....	1
Blank.....	1

The president announced the result and declared Amos Ellmaker, of Pa. duly nominated as the anti-masonic candidate for vice president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Phelps, of Mass.

Resolved unanimously, That Amos Ellmaker, of Pa. be nominated by the convention, as the anti-masonic candidate for vice president of the United States, at the ensuing election.

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed to communicate the resolution above to Mr. Ellmaker, and request his acceptance of the above nomination. Messrs. Bailey, of Mass. Lyman, of N. Y. and Shriver, of Maryland, were appointed said committee.

On motion of Mr. Morris, of N. Y.

Resolved unanimously, That a committee of three members be appointed to express, by written communication, to the hon. Richard Rush, of Pa. the profound sense of this convention, of the patriotism, principle and firmness which dictated his eloquent exposition of the evils of free masonry, and their high appreciation of the beneficial results which it cannot fail to produce. Messrs. Morris, of N. Y. Denny, of Pa. and Gibbons, of Delaware, were appointed said committee.

Mr. Rutherford, from the committee appointed to wait on Mr. Wirt, &c. reported that the committee had performed that duty, and that he would send a written communication to the convention at 3 o'clock, P. M.

On motion of Mr. Hopkins, of N. Y.
Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this convention be presented to those citizens of Baltimore at whose expense this convention has been accommodated with the use of the splendid hall of the Athenæum, and that this convention have left peculiar pleasure in receiving such a proof of hospitality from the inhabitants of this elegant and polished city, and that the president of this convention be requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to the mayor of this city.

On motion of Mr. Turner, of R. I.

Resolved, That the president of this convention be requested to present a copy of the printed proceedings of this, and of the anti-masonic convention held at Philadelphia last year, to the president and vice president of the United States, to the ex-presidents of the United States, to the heads of the several departments, to the hon. John Marshall, chief justice, and to each of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, to the governors of the several states of the union, to gen. Lafayette, to the venerable Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, to the mayor of the city of Baltimore, to the trustees of the Athenæum of Baltimore, and to such other distinguished individuals of this country, as he may deem expedient.

On the consideration of this resolution a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Turner, of R. I. Vanderpool, of N. J. Hallett, of R. I. Phelps, of Mass. Denny, of Pa. and Miller, of Pa. took part.

Mr. Bailey from the committee to wait on Mr. Ellmaker reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and that Mr. Ellmaker would shortly make a communication to the convention.

Adjourned to 5 o'clock, P. M.

September 28, 5 o'clock, P. M.

Met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Ward, from the committee on resolutions, made a report which was twice read and unanimously adopted. Messrs. Foote, Fuller and Hopkins, of N. Y. Hallett, of R. I. and Stevens, of Pa. severally addressed the convention in support of the resolutions.

Mr. Seward, of N. Y. submitted the following resolutions, which were read and passed unanimously.

Resolved, That the committee of finance be authorized to pay over any surplus funds which may remain in their hands, towards the expenses of the national corresponding committee to be distributed by the publishing committee.

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be returned to the national corresponding committee for the faithful discharge of their duties during the past year, and that this convention entertain a profound conviction that the results of their labors must be eminently beneficial to the cause of anti-masonry.

The report of the national corresponding committee was called up and ordered to be printed.

Adjourned to 8 o'clock this evening.

[The further proceedings of this convention, to its adjournment sine die, were published in the last REGISTER.]

PRESIDENT AND THE NULLIFIERS.

Walterboro, Sept. 17th, 1831.

Mr. Editor: As chairman of the meeting of citizens of Colleton district, at Walterboro, on the 1st ultimo, I forward you for publication the answer of the president of the United States, as the best means of making known his reply to their communication, agreeably to their second resolve. I am, very respectfully, your, obedient servant,
CHARLES WEBB.

(COPY.)

Washington, Sept. 3, 1831.

Sir: I have received your letter of the 22nd ult. enclosing, agreeably to one of the resolutions of the meeting, a copy of the proceedings of the citizens of Colleton district, at Walterboro, on the 1st August, 1831, stating the construction which they say they are compelled to give to my letter of the 14th of June last, to a committee of my fellow-citizens of Charleston; and requesting me to inform them whether they have truly interpreted my language.

I am not satisfied that the language referred to is justly liable to misapprehension; and I do not feel myself authorized to enter into any correspondence for the purpose of explaining or discussing, in reference merely to a supposed emergency, the means which the president may be required to employ in the discharge of his constitutional duty of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed.

I am therefore constrained, with all proper respect for my fellow-citizens who composed the meeting, to decline the explanations required by their resolution. I am, with sentiments of respect, your obedient servant,
ANDREW JACKSON.

To Charles Webb, esq. chairman, &c. Walterboro, South Carolina.

SEIZURE BY THE CUSTOM HOUSE.

From the Boston Patriot of Sept. 17.

Some excitement has been aroused in this city during the present week, by the seizure on the part of the collector of customs in this district, of a cable and hawser on board brig Moscow, of this port, owned by Messrs. Benj. Rich & Son, by the latter of which she was made fast to Central wharf, and by the removal of which, by order of the revenue officers, she went adrift, and was picked up and secured by Benj. T. Reed, jr. esq. who claims salvage for so doing.—The Salem Gazette represents that "there was something like a row in Boston" on this occasion, which was not the case, although several hundred people were assembled on the wharf, and appeared indignant at the transaction, and cheered a master truckman who, being forbidden by the owner to trespass on his property, declared that he would have nothing to do with the matter, if there was any injustice about it, and left the cable on the wharf; but we believe no violence was committed or attempted on the part of the spectators.

The facts in the case we understand are these: that the brig Moscow, capt. John Norris, in the course of her last voyage, was so unfortunate as to get on the Bahama banks, where she remained some time, and in heaving her off, the stream cable was cut, and with the anchor, lost. On his arrival in Russia, capt. Norris procured another of 8 inches, 90 fathoms long, and also a new hawser of 5½ inches, to replace an old one entirely worn out, and parted in several places, having been in service five years.—On her arrival, an inspector reported to the collector that she had more cables than she required, and the collector sent to Messrs. Rich & Son to enter the new ones. These gentlemen called on the collector twice, stated the above facts, and asked him to send some competent person to ascertain if there was any thing more on board the brig than was actually necessary for her safety, or to replace what had been lost and worn out; and if he found it otherwise, they would promptly enter the same. Mr. Henshaw did not heed their request, but expressed his determination of seizing the articles, thus placing the vessel in jeopardy, and obliging her owners to defend her lawful and accustomed tackle, and to incur expense therefore.

Notwithstanding these representations, the collector obstinately persisted in his course. A large number of merchants have visited the vessel, and, we understand agree, without a dissenting voice, that the cable and hawser were absolutely necessary for the use and security of the vessel, and a distinguished merchant being asked by one of the owners if he saw any thing on board to warp the vessel to Hancock's wharf, as they were desirous of doing, replied that there was nothing suitable on board.

Previous to the seizure, which was on Wednesday, 14th inst. the owners wrote to the collector that as misrepresentations had been made respecting the cable and hawser, and that it was his intention to seize them if not entered, they requested of him to appoint either one, two or three competent men, who were judges of what is requisite for vessels' use, to examine the vessel, &c. and if they discovered any thing more than was absolutely necessary for her safety, that they (the owners) would cheerfully enter and pay duties on them. Stating further, that the brig was five years old, and that there was nothing on board except to replace what had been lost or worn out.

By the 45th section of the collection law, a discretionary power is vested in the collectors and naval officers of districts, to ascertain whether or not, in their judgment, a vessel has an excess of sea stores on board, and to charge duties upon such excess as they find. But no power is given to seize an excess of stores, unless it is attempted to smuggle them from the vessel. Neither is any power given to such officers to take from a vessel, except in cases of absolute seizure, a particle of her tackle, apparel, cables, anchors, hawsers or furniture. By the usage and laws of all maritime nations, these articles are held sacredly secure from molestation.

Much credit is due to the owners of the Moscow, for their moderation in a case of such an aggravated nature, and it is very probable that if they had forcibly resisted the seizure, such was the feeling among the spectators, that the collector and revenue officers would have been thrown into the dock.

THE WEST INDIA TRADE.

We ask the attention of our readers to the annexed "British views of the colonial trade," as confirming completely the arguments we have so often presented against Mr. McLane's arrangement, and which the letters of X. Y. so much more forcibly urged. It is here admitted, that while the trade was indirect, the navigation was in our hands, and that the object of the British government in concluding the much vaunted treaty with us, "was to force the trade from American hands into those of British ship owners." This we believe, most firmly; and do not doubt moreover, of their success. Another avowed object on the part of the British was to impose such additional duties on the direct trade to the West Indies, (with certain exceptions), as "in effect to be prohibitory;" and thus force our produce into the contiguous British colonies, whence it can be transported into British bottoms both duty free to the West Indies, thus aiming a blow, at the navigation of the nation, and at the prosperity of the state of New York, so far as it is to be affected by a diminution of its revenue from the canal. [N. Y. Am.

Fas est ab hoste doceri.

[From the New Brunswick Herald.]

BRITISH VIEWS OF THE COLONIAL TRADE.—The information contained in the following article has been afforded us by an intelligent merchant of this town, who has taken great pains to become thoroughly acquainted with the provisions of the act alluded to; the statements will, we expect, be found generally correct, and well worthy of the attention of our commercial readers.

West India trade.—An act of parliament regulating the colonial trade, having recently come into operation here, our attention and inquiries will naturally direct themselves to the advantages likely to be derived therefrom, by the provinces, but more especially, the effect it will have on the trade of our own port. Under the operation of a new system, and with this view, we offer the following remarks, which possibly may not be altogether uninteresting to some of our commercial readers. For the sake of contrast, it may be well in the first place, to bear in mind that during the late interdiction of direct intercourse between the British West India possessions and the United States, the former were chiefly supplied with provisions of every kind, through the medium of the neutral islands, whence they were distributed to our colonies in vessels of a small class, and consequently limiting our tonnage and navigation in that quarter, to mere trips of three and four days. It is an acknowledged fact, that only a small proportion of American produce was transhipped through the warehousing ports in those provinces; flour and staves only, receiving a partial benefit thereby, and even this, was generally consumed by the additional freight and other attendant expenses.

Although the new act does not go to the extent which was at first generally anticipated, by suffering all articles of American produce to pass through the provinces into the West Indies duty free, and imposing additional duties on the direct carriage from the United States, still its provisions are ample, and places our navigation on a more advantageous footing than before.

An attentive perusal of the act referred to, will evince, that corn, grain (of every description), meal, rye flour, biscuit, rice and live stock, can be imported direct from the United States into the West India colonies, duty free, and this is certainly its most extraordinary feature. On the other hand, wheat, flour, beef, hams, bacon, lumber, and staves, are totally exempt from import, in the West Indies, if transhipped through a warehousing port in the provinces—the old rate of duties being continued, when imported direct, with an increase on the two last mentioned articles.

The most important point secured, by this new arrangement, is the carrying trade. British vessels may now proceed from any part of H. M. dominions, direct to the United States, there load a full cargo either for the West Indies direct, or via the provinces, as the nature of the cargo may invite, thus completing the whole voyage, a portion of which only, American vessels would be eligible to perform. This also embraces the privilege of importing denature goods, which could not take place in American vessels, they being confined to the produce of their states alone.

The object of our government has been plainly, and avowedly, to force the trade from American hands into those of British ship owners—to continue and impose such additional duties on their direct carriage to the West Indies, (with the exception above named) as will in effect be prohibitory, and moreover, to obtain a market for their surplus West India produce, which they did not before possess.

As the article of fish is totally excluded from the United States in the British West Indies, it still remains our exclusive monopoly, and coupled with the exports of lumber, shingles, and articles of American produce, which must fall in our market, under the act referred to, we trust we shall continue to enjoy an active West India trade.

From the Boston Courier of Sept. 12.

Some weeks ago we presumed to ask of the Eastern Argus what number of vessels had cleared from Portland for the British West Indies, since the vaunted recovery of that important and profitable branch of the commerce of that place—the trade to the British West India Islands—had been accomplished by the present administration. Our presumption has been answered only by silence, if such a Hibernianism may be allowed. We respectfully repeat the inquiry, and, moreover, would presume still further to ask, if a single vessel, of any description, has been cleared at the Portland custom house for any British West India port, since the opening of those ports? If there has been one, or more, how many? If the Argus thinks us too troublesome and should not be in the vein to answer, we hope that gen. Chandler may be permitted to see this paper, and that his well known urbanity and obliging disposition will prompt him to reply.

We perceive in the Portland Advertiser of Friday, the following communication, which the editors say is from unquestionable authority and may be relied on as correct. It has some bearing on the question stated above.

One voyage to the British West India Islands, at last.—Capt. Oliver Perkins, of Biddeford, sailed from the port of Saco in February last, master of the schooner Boston packet, owned by Amos Chase of Saco, Moses Bradbury of Biddeford, and John Hill of Portsmouth, with a cargo of about 80 thousand of boards for the British West India islands. He went to the islands of Barbadoes, St. Vincent's and Dominico, but could not dispose of his cargo without a loss. He was offered no more than $16 per M. for his boards to be paid in molasses at 20 cents a gallon, which, after deducting port charges, duties, and custom house fees, he supposed would leave him less for his boards than they were worth before he started. The British told him they "didn't want the Americans to bring them any of their lumber, their own vessels could do that business for them now—that his (the American) government were a set of d—d fools to be sure for making such a bargain, but they must stick to it." Captain Perkins finding he could do nothing at the British islands, went to St. Martin's, a French island, sold his boards at $18 per M. and took a return cargo consisting mostly of molasses, which he bought for 15 cents a gallon. The whole import and export duties he had to pay at St. Martin's and all custom house charges amounted to $110 only. I had this account from the mouth of capt. Perkins himself, who says no other vessel from the port of Saco has, to his knowledge, been to the British West India islands since the mis-named opening of their ports, that he will never go there again, and consents that I should have this statement published.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

At the general triennial meeting of the stockholders of the bank of the United States, held at their hall, in the city of Philadelphia, on Thursday, the first day of September, 1831, at ten o'clock, A. M.

Stephen Girard, esq. of the city of Philadelphia, was called to preside, and John Potter, esq. of South Carolina, appointed secretary.

Nicholas Biddle, esq. the president of the bank, on behalf of the board of directors, submitted the following

REPORT:

The board of directors of the bank of the United States, in compliance with the 13th article of the 11th section of the charter of the bank, which declares, that "once in every three years the directors shall lay before the stockholders, at a general meeting, for their information, an exact and particular statement of the debts which shall have remained unpaid after the expiration of the original credit, for a period of treble the term of that credit, and of the surplus of the profits, if any, after deducting losses and dividends," have now the honor to submit to the stockholders the statements therein required.

As, however, these documents present only an imperfect view of the situation of the bank, the board of directors gladly avail themselves of the presence of so many respectable gentlemen interested in its prosperity, to explain minutely the whole state of its affairs. To this they will accordingly proceed.

The capital of the bank consists of 350,000 shares, of which 70,000 are owned by the government of the United States. The government originally provided for its subscription, by giving to the bank a stock bearing interest at five per cent. This stock has been for some time in a course of redemption, and in July last the whole of it was reimbursed, so that the government has now fully paid for its shares.

In receiving the individual subscriptions for the 280,000 shares by so many commissioners, and at so many distant points, there arose some errors, which caused a deficiency of a few thousand dollars in the capital. After rectifying these errors as far as practicable, it was deemed proper in July last to supply the deficiency, amounting then to $3,730 37, from the general funds—so that the capital of thirty-five millions of dollars is now entire. This capital is divided among the stockholders as follows:—

The progress of this division of the stock, will be perceived in the following sketch:

In 1817 there were	31,349 stockholders.
1818	4,142
1819	3,544
1820	2,720
1821	2,747

1828	3,686
1829	3,853
1831	4,145

It will here be perceived, that the original subscriptions were divided among a great number of persons, in order to secure the amount of stock desired; but became afterwards concentrated in the names of the real owners. The whole number of stockholders was, in 1820, 2,720. From that period the number has risen to 4,145. The extent of this diffusion will be seen in the following table:—

From these the following results may be gathered: 1st. That out of the 3,679 domestic stockholders, 766 are holders of shares of and under $500, amounting to $243,800; that 1,447 are stockholders who own sums of and under $1,000, amounting to $812,300; that 2,865 are stockholders of and under $5,000, amounting to $4,601,600; being nearly one-fourth of the whole domestic stock.

It further appears that the sum of 54,286 shares, being much more than one-fourth of the whole domestic stock, is owned by females, trustees and executors, and by religious, benevolent, and other associations.

The capital thus owned is divided for the purposes of business between the bank and the following twenty-five offices:

Portland,	Fayetteville,
Portsmouth,	Charleston,
Boston,	Savannah,
Providence,	Mobile,
Hartford,	Natchez,
Burlington,	New Orleans,
New York,	St. Louis,
Utica,	Nashville,
Buffalo,	Louisville,
Baltimore,	Lexington,
Washington,	Cincinnati,
Richmond,	Pittsburg,
Norfolk,

The number of offices established in 1817 was 18; since then two offices have been discontinued—Middletown, in Connecticut, and Chillicothe, in Ohio, and nine others have been established—Portland, in Maine, Burlington in Vermont, Hartford in Connecticut, Utica and Buffalo in New York, St. Louis in Missouri, Nashville in Tennessee, Natchez in Mississippi, Mobile in Alabama; making an addition of seven offices within the last fourteen years.

These points were selected out of applications from thirty-eight places. There are now under consideration applications for the establishment of branches from more than thirty places in various parts of the United States.

The employment of the capital will be seen in the following statement of the condition of the bank on the 1st of August:

82,165,578 89

Two only of these items require special observation:—

The contingent fund and the real estate.

1st. The contingent fund.—

The total amount of the suspended debt, including cash deficiencies, overdrafts and the debt of the bank of Columbia, is

7,851,281 82

Of this the part estimated as desperate, and therefore considered as lost, is 3,452,976 16

And on the remaining

4,398,305 66

The estimated loss after a rigid examination, is

1,851,034 42

Now, the contingent fund to meet this loss, is 5,613,173 15

The total of the actual and estimated losses, is 5,304,010 58

Leaving an excess of provision, over the estimate, of 309,162 57

That this sum will be fully adequate for the purpose will be apparent from the facts,

1st. That amongst the estimates of loss is $236,829 77, for the losses of the agency at Cincinnati, which will in all probability be entirely retrieved by the increasing value of the real estate there.

2d. That the arrears of interest on the debts at the four western offices are expressly appropriated to the increase of the fund. And

3d. That something may yet be received from the mass of debts now considered hopeless, and from the arrears of interest on the whole mass of suspended debt, now amounting to $1,433,761 34.

2d. The real estate.—

The total amount of real estate received in payment of debts up to August 30th, 1822, was

$587,102 58

It has since received in like manner 2,942,828 23

And sold what had cost

1,038,037 62

1,901,790 61

Making the present amount

2,491,892 99

This amount is the price at which the real estate has been taken, and experience warrants the expectation, that it will be sold for more than its cost.

The general result of the condition of the bank is,

That the whole of the bonus of 1,600,000 dollars paid for the charter, and the premium of 205,880 dollars given for the five per cent. stock, purchased in 1821 from the government is now extinguished.

That the fund to meet losses exceeds by 309,000 dollars, the estimate of those losses.

That there is a surplus fund of profits amounting to 1,750,000 dollars, being five per cent. on the capital.

And that with these provisions against casualty, its profits, after defraying its expenses and making an annual reservation of 120,000 dollars to extinguish the cost of the banking houses, yield a dividend of seven per cent. a year.

But gratifying as the prosperity of the bank may be to the stockholders, it is an object of more general concern as being the result of measures in the success of which the community has a deep and permanent interest. The importance of these will justify a few words of explanation in regard to them.

The bank of the United States was established for the purpose of restoring specie payments, which had for a long time been suspended throughout a great part of the country,—of furnishing a sound circulating medium, and of giving more uniformity to the exchanges between distant sections of the union. By importing more than seven millions of specie, and by a free issue of notes immediately after its establishment, the bank with great sacrifices succeeded for a time in attaining these objects; but it seems to have been afterwards considered that its powers were exhausted by the effort, and that the continuance of it would be entirely impracticable. The essential difficulty was presumed to lie in the provision of the charter, making the notes universally receivable for debts to the government, which by obliging the bank to provide payment for the same note at various places, would require it to retain a greater amount of specie than it could issue of notes; thus diminishing rather than increasing the sound circulation. The consequence was, the bank issued its own notes sparingly; more especially in the southern and western states, where it often preferred the re-issue of the notes of the state banks; being unwilling to issue freely its notes which it might be compelled to pay at some one of many places remote from the point of issuing them. However imperious the necessity which enforced the system, it was apparent that its continuance would tend to defeat the object of establishing the bank, since by declining the issue of its notes it could not furnish the circulating medium expected from it; and by re-issuing the notes of state banks, it surrendered its most efficient means of control over the currency. Its whole circulation on the 1st of January, 1823, was only 4,589,000 dollars.

Having, in compliance with the directions of the stockholders in 1822, applied without success to congress for a modification of this disabling provision in the charter, it became necessary for the board of directors to re-examine the constitution of the bank, in order to discover whether there was really any organic defect which prevented it from performing the functions to which it was destined, or whether some different combination of its powers might not overcome its difficulties.

The experiment was interesting and hazardous. It was to try how far the institution could succeed in doing that which had never yet succeeded elsewhere, in diffusing over so wide a surface of country a currency of large amount and of uniform value at all places and under all circumstances; and also whether it could bring down to its extreme limit the necessary expense of commercial intercourse between distant sections of country, whose exchangeable productions were of such various and unequal values.

To accomplish these two objects two things seemed necessary.

1st. To make all the local currencies equivalent to specie at the place of their emission. This, by rendering them competent for local purposes, would require a less amount of general currency, and at the same time tend to reduce the exchanges between distant places to the real commercial expense of transferring equal values of coin.

2d. To make the bank itself the great channel of those commercial exchanges.

If the bank is bound to transfer the whole public revenue throughout the union, and to furnish a currency payable in various and distant places, it must obviously provide funds in those places, and these can of course be obtained only by purchasing bills of exchange payable at the points to which the course of trade naturally directs the notes. There these bills, having reached their maturity, await the coming of that portion of the notes which, having performed for a time the functions of a circulating medium, are carried by the demand for duties out of the immediate sphere of their issue. The greater proportion of its funds, therefore, which the bank can employ in these operations, the more readily can it sustain the notes issued in the course of them. It is indeed thus, and thus alone, that a circle of sound banking operations, founded on sound commercial operations, contains within itself the means of its own defence at home, and of providing for its notes which the demand for duties may carry to a distance. These operations, too, are fortunately of the highest benefit to the community; they give the most direct encouragement to industry, by facilitating the purchase and interchange of all its products, they bring the producers and consumers into more immediate contact, by diminishing the obstacles which separate them, and they specially adapt the bank to the wants and interests of each section of the union, by making it alternately a large purchaser among the sellers of bills, and a large seller among the purchasers.

A participation also in the foreign exchanges forms an essential part of the system, not merely as auxiliary to the transfer of funds by which the circulating medium is accompanied and protected, but as the best defence of that currency from external influences. It is the peculiarity of our monied system, that in many parts of the country the precious metals are excluded from the minor channels of circulation by a small paper currency, in consequence of which the greater portion of these metals is accumulated in masses at the points of most convenient exportation. Now, with a widely diffused metallic currency, the occasional demands for exportation are more gradually felt, the portion exported bearing a small relation to the whole, occasions less inconvenience, and the excesses of exportation can be more readily corrected without injury. But when the great mass of the precious metals of the community lie thus accessible in the banks of the Atlantic cities, liable to be immediately demanded on notes previously issued in the confidence of a continuance of the same state of things which caused the abundant issue of them; at the first turn in the tide of the foreign exchanges—when the supply of foreign exchange is unequal to the daily demand, the vaults of the banks may be exhausted before any precautions can prevent it. These very precautions, too, consisting as they do almost exclusively of curtailments in their loans, made suddenly—mostly without concert, and always under the influence of anxiety, if not alarm, may fall with oppressive weight on the community, by the pressure on which alone can be produced the necessary re-action. This re-action, moreover, is necessarily slow, since our distance from Europe makes it less easy to restore the equilibrium than between adjoining countries in the same hemisphere. As this defect in our monied system depends on the legislature, the bank has no power to remove it, and can only strive to guard against its dangers. Its tendency is to produce abrupt transitions, and violent shocks injurious to private credit, and which might prove subversive of the currency. It belongs then to the conservative power over the circulating medium which devolves on the bank, not to be a passive observer of these movements, but to take an ample share in all that concerns the foreign exchanges. It may thus foresee, and either avert or diminish an approaching danger—it can thus break the force of a sudden shock, and supplying from its own accumulations or its own credits in Europe the more pressing demands, enable the state institutions to provide for their own safety, and thus produce the necessary alteration in the state of the exchanges with the least possible pressure upon the banks or the community.

In addition to the ordinary causes of fluctuation in the metallic currency, there was another of great importance in the character of the trade to China and India, which, requiring annually many millions of the precious metals, very frequently caused abrupt and inconvenient changes in the amount of the currency and of private credit, by forcing the state banks to sudden curtailments as an act of necessary self defence. To abate the pressure of this demand, the bank offered as a substitute for the shipments of coin, to supply its own bills on Europe, which in the India and China markets were often more valuable than the coin itself. This experiment proved successful, alike to the merchants and to the community, who were thus less incommoded by sudden diminutions of the currency. Owing to the operation of general causes, that trade has within a few years greatly declined; but, should it revive, the bills of the bank will doubtless constitute a considerable portion of the remittances from this country. Even in its present comparatively inactive state, the amount of bills furnished by the bank within the past year for the trade of India, China, and South America, amounts to $883,500.

By this combination of the soundness of the local currencies, and a thorough identification of the bank with the real business and exchanges of the country, it was hoped to accomplish the purposes for which it was established. With this view, it began by giving to its whole funds an active and business character, for which purpose all the stock of the bank which had been forfeited was sold, and the proceeds applied to the commercial operations of the country. The bank and the branches then issued freely and exclusively their own notes, taking care to protect and provide for them by the discount of bills of exchange; and they received freely the notes of the solvent state banks, with whom periodical and convenient, but certain settlements of accounts were made.

This system has now been in operation for several years. It was at first experimental, and of doubtful issue, and as the consequences were equally important to the bank and the community, its progress has been watched with deep solicitude. Its success therefore has been seen with proportionate satisfaction. Time and experience have now demonstrated that the bank has been able to accomplish all the purposes for which it was created, to rectify the disorders of the currency, to sustain a large and sound circulation, and to reduce the commercial exchanges within the most economical limits, and this by means in themselves highly advantageous to the community, not in any degree injurious to the state institutions, and at the same time profitable to the bank itself. The evidences of this can be best observed by comparing the past and present situation of the currency, the exchanges, the country and the bank.

1. Before the establishment of the bank, the circulating medium of the middle, western, and southern states, consisted exclusively of an inconvertible paper money; every part of that country suffered under the most oppressive of all taxes on industry, a depreciated currency; the commercial exchanges between different states and even different neighborhoods, were burdened with the fluctuations of their respective representatives of money, while the government itself, unable to make its funds, received in one section available for its expenditures in another, was embarrassed in the midst of its nominal excesses of revenue. These disorders are now remedied. The local currencies generally are equivalent to specie within their respective spheres of circulation; and a large mass of general currency is superadded for general circulation. That this effect was produced directly by the operations of the bank, requires no demonstration. The extent of its contribution to the general currency will be seen in the facts—

1st, That since January 1, 1825, it has furnished to the mint to be converted into American coin, but-lion to the amount of $12,046,415 35

2d, That the gross circulation of the bank on the 1st of Jan. 1823, was 4,539,446 90
And on the 1st of August, 1831, 22,399,447 52
making an increase of - 17,810,000 62

From both periods a deduction is to be made of the notes in their passage between the bank and the branches. The total amount known to be in actual circulation on the 1st of August was $19,377,910.

This circulation is in all respects equal, and in most respects superior, in value, to any metallic currency of the same amount. Indeed, there is not now, and probably never has been, in any other extensive country, a paper currency comparable to this for the union of all the qualities of a good circulating medium—perfect security—easy convertibility into the metals—and general uniformity of value.

The notes of the bank, moreover, not only afford a sound currency themselves, but they sustain and purify the much larger mass of circulating medium into which they are infused. By receiving freely the notes of the state banks within convenient reach of the bank and its branches, and by frequent settlements with them, these institutions are kept in the habitual presence of an accountability, which naturally induces them so to apportion their issues to their means, as to secure the soundness of their currency. Of the manner in which they have executed this extremely delicate part of their duty, which connects them with the state institutions, it is not for the board of directors to speak. But they bear a willing testimony in favor of the uprightness and intelligence which generally characterize the administration of those institutions and the support which they have always yielded to any measures calculated to maintain the soundness of the currency.

On the few occasions where it has become necessary to insist on the performance of their obligations, from which either a want of judgment, or the pressure of urgent necessity, had induced them to depart, the bank has endeavored to perform its own duty with all the forbearance consistent with the thorough execution of it, and those institutions themselves have generally found, in the increased credit arising from fidelity to their engagements, a full compensation for all the temporary inconvenience which that fidelity required. It is indeed confidently believed that the solvent state institutions, recognize in the bank, its true character, as a common friend, not a jealous competitor; and that the good feelings uniformly entertained for them by the bank, are reciprocated. They know that the duties of its position make it only a more prominent agent in preserving the soundness of the currency, on which their own stability and prosperity equally depend; and that if its competition sometimes appears to prevent more abundant profits, they find an indemnity in the general security of property which its operations are designed to protect. Undoubtedly these operations have been so far beneficial to them, that if its own notes are equivalent to specie, it has contributed to make those of the state institutions equally valuable within their respective spheres, and that many of these institutions earn larger profits than the bank itself.

2d. The reduction in the exchanges effected by the bank from the extravagant charges on internal trade to the present moderate limits need not now be particularised. A single fact will be sufficient to illustrate it. Before the bank was organized the differences of exchange in favor of, or against Philadelphia, in its relations with the other commercial cities, was as follows:

With Boston 17 per cent.; with New York, 94 per cent.; with Baltimore, 44 per cent.; with Washington, 7 per cent.; with Charleston, 64 per cent.

At present these exchanges are generally either at par, or at the utmost one half of one per cent.

This has naturally followed the rectification of the currency. As long as the general circulation of the United States consists of specie or its equivalents, the rates of exchange between any two places in it can never much, nor permanently vary from the expenses of their transportation from one place to another; and a reduction to nearly that rate was the inevitable consequence of the resumption of specie payments. The bank has, however, been able to do more than this. The large mass of its operations in exchanges, by giving to it funds in various parts of the Union which the course of its own business, as well as that of the government, requires to be transferred, furnishes it with the means of transferring at the same time the property of individuals at a very reduced expense. Accordingly, funds are transferred to the remotest points of the Union, sometimes at no expense whatever, and always with charges so moderate as to afford facilities of interior communication, probably not equalled by those of any other country.

The following table exhibits the amount of domestic and foreign exchange purchased at the bank, and the several branches, the amount of the drafts furnished by them on each other respectively, and the amount of transfers made on account of the government, during the year ending on the 1st of July last.

From this it will appear, that the purchases of bills of exchange, amount to more than forty-four millions, the drafts issued by the bank and the branches on each other exceed forty-two millions, and the transfers on account of the government were upwards of twelve millions. If to these be added the amount of bills not purchased in the first instance by the bank but collected through its agency, the aggregate will represent an actual movement in the business of the union, much exceeding one hundred millions of dollars. This has been conducted at a very moderate expense, and with a facility which has caused so large a displacement of funds, to be almost imperceptible in any of the interests of the community. More experience and a greater mass of operations may enable the bank to reduce still further, even these slight charges; but should it be able only to retain them at their present rates, it will have accomplished all that is necessary or perhaps desirable.

3d. The influence of these measures on the country has been in every stage of them eminently salutary. The substitution of a sound currency for a depreciated and irresponsible circulation, which was hastening to involve in confusion all public and private interests, is of itself an advantage, which can scarcely be over-estimated, conferring as it does, stability on property, and security on all the rewards of industry; while the interior commerce of the whole union is relieved from the oppressions of a multiarious and fluctuating paper money, requiring at each step some new sacrifice which, however disguised, fell ultimately as a charge on the productive industry of the country. The means, moreover, by which these objects have been attained, the restraint on the over issues of other institutions—the extensive operations in domestic and foreign exchange—the bringing of the institution into immediate contact and sympathy with the real business of all parts of the country, are in themselves direct and positive benefits to the community. They form too the natural occupation of a bank of the United States, which, divested of all local influences and interests, finds its appropriate sphere in facilitating the commerce of the states with each other and with foreign nations. Accordingly, it may be assumed with safety, that there has never been in the history of this country, any period when its moneyed concerns were more steady and equal—its interior trade transacted with more economy and convenience, and the necessary fluctuations incident to its foreign commerce less sensibly felt, than during the last eight years. This term is sufficiently long and various to test the efficacy of the system. It embraced a period, when, in addition to its habitual causes of fluctuation the moneyed system was disturbed by the reimbursement of many millions of the public debt, a great portion of which was to be remitted to Europe, and more especially it included the year 1825, one of the most critical in our own history, and probably the most disastrous to the banking system of England.

4th. Having explained the effects of this system on the currency, the exchanges, the state banks, and the community, it remains to show that these purposes have been accomplished without any sacrifice of the interests of the stockholders, but that the bank itself has shared in the benefits it communicates. This will be perceived by contrasting the present state of the institution, with its condition at the triennial meeting of 1822. Its situation at these respective periods was as follows:

The analysis of these statements will present the following differences in the situation of the bank at these respective periods:

1st. In regard to the comparative activity of its business:
In August, 1822, of the whole amount of loans amounting to	$3,218,876 68
There was suspended	10,426,306 56
Leaving as active	$21,792,370 12
In August, 1831, of the same class of loans amounting to	$36,793,986 49
There was suspended	3,633,750 84
Leaving as active	$53,160,235 65
In August, 1822, of the loans of	$2,218,876 68
There were on bank stock	5,974,725 80
In August, 1831, out of the loans of	$56,793,936 49
There were on bank stock	779,458 07
In regard to the exchanges:
The amount of domestic bills purchased in 1822, was	7,475,640 00
That purchased within the year ending July 1st, 1831, was	40,371,556 25

2d. In regard to its resources and investments, there will be seen,

- 1st. That the bonus and premium on the loan of 1821, amounting then to $1,180,880 00 has been extinguished.
2. That there is an increase of the contingent fund to repair losses, of $1,869,374 15 making that fund exceed by $309,000, the loss it is to cover.
- 3d. An increase of the surplus fund, of $1,698,102 93
- 4th. An increase of the capital, of 7,860 37
- 5th. An increase of the circulation, of 16,942,555 62
- 6th. An increase of the deposits, of 9,591,493 15
- 7th. An increase of the investments as follows:

Loans	28,290,207 20
Real estate	1,904,790 61
In banking houses	325,533 39
In state bank and other debts	3,052,579 34
In specie	8,198,682 29

And a decrease of the funded debt, of 9,522,788 21

Making the actual increase 32,249,004 62

The 3d and last consideration is the comparative productiveness of the operations of the bank at these periods:

The nett profits of the year ending July, 1822, were 1,469,444 91

The nett profits of the year ending July, 1831, were 2,935,021 19

Making an increase of $1,465,576 28

This state of things is calculated to justify the expectation, that a continuance of the same prosperity will at length indemnify the stockholders for the privations of profit to which they have been so long subjected. Hitherto their compensation has been comparatively inadequate. Owing to the large expenses incident to the establishment of the bank, and to the great losses growing out of its early misfortunes, the whole amount of dividend, from Jan. 1817, to July 1831, a period of fourteen years and a half, has been only $72.85, or a small fraction beyond five per cent. a year, on the original subscriptions of one hundred dollars. The dividend during the last three years and a half, has amounted to 7 per cent. a year; and it would require a continuance of the same dividend for eleven years and a half more to make the annual dividend, from the establishment of the bank, equal to 6 per cent. a year.

If, however, the stockholders have been less benefited by their investment than was anticipated, they may derive consolation for their diminished profits, in the general prosperity of the country at large, to which the operations of the bank have contributed.

It is, indeed, the main design of presenting these details, to show the practicability of continuing these advantages without a sacrifice of the personal interests of the stockholders. The experiment, for such it undoubtedly was, of sustaining a large and sound and uniform currency, and of reducing the exchanges of the country to the most economical limits, has been fairly and fully made-upon systematic principles. It has now for many years succeeded, and it may be presumed that the same efforts will continue to produce similar results. But in any event, the board of directors have the satisfaction of knowing that their exertions have thus far rendered the bank not unproductive of benefit to the country; and that if any unforeseen causes should hereafter prevent or diminish the beneficial operations of the institution, it shall not fail from any want of zealous devotion to the great interests which they have been appointed to administer. By order of the board,

N. BIDDLE, president.

On motion of Horace Binney, esq. seconded by Robert Ralston, esq. it was

Resolved, That the communication made by the board of directors to this meeting, be referred to a committee of seven, to report thereon; and that the same committee be authorised to report upon such other matters as they may deem to be interesting to the stockholders.

Whereupon the chairman appointed the following gentlemen, viz:

HORACE BINNEY, MANUEL EYRE,
ROBERT RALSTON, JOSEPH HEMPHILL,
R. L. COLT, JAMES RONALDSON,
PAUL BECK, jr.

On motion of Charles J. Ingersoll, esq.

Resolved, That this meeting now adjourn, till 4 o'clock this afternoon, for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee.

Four o'clock, P. M.

The stockholders met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Binney, on behalf of the committee appointed at the meeting held this morning, produced and read the following report, which with the resolutions it recommended, were unanimously adopted.

The committee to whom was referred the communication from the board of directors,

REPORT,

That they have verified by a comparison with the tabular statements of the bank the material facts reported in this interesting paper, and find them to be correct. The reasoning by which the board of directors has deduced from them the connexion between the bank and the present prosperity of our country, and has sustained the principles which have regulated the administration of its concerns for many years, requires no comment. All who read the communication, which, it is presumed, will be given to the public, will discern for themselves not merely the actual prosperity of this institution, greater and more stable than at any former epoch, but the manner in which its great public and private trusts have been performed—its public trust towards the government and the people of the United States, and its immediate private trust towards the stockholders, and those who have confided to it their funds and their credit. The perfect harmony of these interests under the operations of the bank organized as the bank of the United States has been by law, and administered as it now is, is believed to be demonstrated; and it would be mere waste and superfluity in the committee to attempt to add either to the cogency or the variety of the considerations, by which the board of directors has completed the demonstration. The committee will not however deny themselves the satisfaction of submitting to the stockholders a few of the inferences, which the communication, taken in connexion with the past and known history of the United States and the bank, appears to justify.

1st. That the bank at its origin, and at a great cost and sacrifice, effectually promoted the restoration of specie payments; and that its able administration for several years past, has finally established a currency, as universally sound within the United States as can ever be expected, or as is essential to the general welfare: and that this has occurred in a community whose currency for a part of the time has felt the influence of active, though temporary causes of derangement, and is at all times exposed to danger by the number and variety of its banking institutions.

2d. That the bank through the whole course of its operations has effectually assisted the treasury in the collection and distribution of the public revenue; and that of late years it has been signally efficient in preventing the discharge of the public debt from disturbing the operations of commerce, or the course and value of pecuniary investments.

3d. That the bank by its judicious intervention in the business of domestic exchange, has given such facility and regularity to this indispensable instrument of internal trade, that neither the want nor the cost of it any longer exists, to embarrass any operation whatever.

4th. That by its extensive operations in foreign exchange, the bank has for several years held in its hands, and has at times used with striking effect, the power of arresting all sudden and violent fluctuations in this branch of commerce; and promises by the same means greatly to economise the use of the precious metals in the future trade of the United States with China and India.

5th. That these public services of the bank of the United States, are the peculiar result of an institution organized and administered as this has been; that the organization of any bank or body whatever, essentially different, would fail in the attainment of most or all of the great objects adverted to; and that an efficient administration is alone necessary to develop the powers and public uses of the bank in its existing form.

6th. That while the bank has been administered for several years upon those principles which are demonstrably the best, both for the public and the stockholders, yet that adverse circumstances, at an earlier day, and among them, chiefly, the cost and sacrifice attending the restoration of an unsound currency, by which an immense loss, that would otherwise have fallen upon the treasury and people of the United States, was assumed by the bank, have prevented the stockholders from deriving the usual returns of money invested at the lowest rate of interest—the original subscribers not having realized an interest equal to five per cent. per annum, paid semi-annually, and subsequent purchasers of the stock at an advance, having generally received less.

7th. That the stock of this bank is distributed, in such amounts, to such variety of persons, and for such different purposes and trusts, that all charge or allegation of monopoly by any body of men whatever, is shown to be without foundation; whereas the same circumstances prove the deep and critical interest which widows, orphans, charitable societies, and other trusts, have in the prosperity and continuance of the bank.

8th. That the welfare of this bank is now identified with that of the people of the United States, from those who wield the largest operations of commerce, to him whose interest in the currency does not go beyond the just compensation of his daily labor.

These inferences your committee believe to be sound, and that no partial interest which they may have as stockholders ought to prevent them from using their privilege as citizens in stating them.—Their proof may be made manifest to all who know the history of the bank and the country, by perusing the communication of the board of directors.

There is one other subject within range of the reference to the committee, upon which they deem it their duty to report.

The charter of this bank will expire by its present limitation on the 3d March, 1836, and there will consequently be but one triennial meeting after the present, and that at a point of time too near the expiration of the present charter, to authorise measures in regard to its renewal. It is fit, in the opinion of your committee, that before that meeting power should be given to the board of directors, to prosecute them if they thought proper. This power should be large and definitive, not merely to solicit a renewal, but to abide, if they think right, by the terms which congress may impose. A board of directors who have administered the bank in the manner detailed in their recent communication, are safe depositories of the entire power of the stockholders on the subject of the renewal of the charter.

With these remarks the committee terminate their duty by offering to the adoption of the meeting the following resolutions:

Resolved, That an administration by which the interests of the stockholders and public are successfully blended, is that system which is properly characteristic of the bank of the United States; and that to the present able administration of the bank, the stockholders and the public are indebted for the full, efficient, and profitable development of such a system.

Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be presented to the board of directors, for their comprehensive and lucid report upon the operations and present condition of the bank, with an assurance that the stockholders place an unabating confidence in their wisdom and fidelity in the further administration of its concerns.

Resolved, That the confidence of the stockholders continues to be due to the able and faithful president of the institution, and that their thanks be given to him for the enlarged and liberal views which have distinguished his administration of the bank, and for the skill with which he has united in its operations, a regard to the public welfare with a steady support of the rights and interests of the stockholders.

Resolved, That if at any time before the next triennial meeting of the stockholders, it shall be deemed expedient by the president and directors to apply to congress for a renewal of the charter of the bank, they are hereby authorised to make such application in the name and behalf of the stockholders, and to accept such terms of renewal as they may consider just and proper. Bank of the United States, Sept. 1st, 1831.

On motion of Isaac Lawrence, esq. of New York, the proceedings of the stockholders, with the reports adopted by them, were ordered to be published.

The meeting then adjourned sine die.

CUSTOM HOUSE BONDS.

From the Charleston Courier of September 24.

To gratify the wishes of the public, we applied for and were politely favored with the luminous opinion of Judge Lee, pronounced in the late case of the custom house bonds, and which we present to our readers this morning.

The court was so crowded during the whole period of the trial, that many who felt the deepest interest in the proceedings, were prevented from witnessing them. It may be proper, therefore, that the decision should be accompanied with a brief reference to the course of the argument.

We are indebted to a legal friend for the following report:

The suits were brought on two bonds, each for $68 92 cents, given to the United States by Messrs. Holmes, Mazyck and Godden, for the duties on goods imported by them from Liverpool, in November last. The importation was made for the single purpose of trying the constitutionality of the tariff act of 1828.

On the opening of the court, Mr. Gilchrist, the district attorney, moved for judgment, under the 65th section of the revenue act of 1789, as the defendants had failed to bring themselves within the provisions of that section, by alleging that there had been an error in the assessment of the duties, of which the collector had had previous notice. The motion was met by another, submitted by Mr. J. G. Holmes, the attorney for defendants that the defendants have leave to plead. The argument was then opened on the state of the case.

Mr. Gilchrist contended that the course proposed by him was not only supported by the plain meaning of the act, but by the uniform practice under it, in this court, since 1802. That the authority to call in the revenues of the government, was a branch of the taxing power, and that the practice of every civilized country would justify their collection in the most summary manner. That with regard to direct taxes, the power was not only exercised in every state, but almost in every city of the union. That even with respect to duties under the duty act of this state, in 1785, the importers were allowed credits on giving their notes for the amount, liable to be collected as they became payable, by summary execution. These propositions were ably sustained by the decisions, not only of the United States courts, but the courts of this state. It was clearly shewn that the credit system adopted by the United States, was more favorable to the importer, than that which obtained in any other country; and the district attorney concluded with a striking view of the inconveniences and embarrassments that might ensue on a departure from the act.

Mr. Holmes, for the defendants, insisted that they had a right to put in any plea that the defence should require. That in any other view, to serve the defendants with a writ, was worse than mockery.—That the very institution of a proceeding by suit, carried with it the incidents of a suit, and that pleading was one of those incidents. That the exception in the act of '99, had reference solely to a motion for continuance, and that any other construction would be an infringement of the right of jury trial.

Mr. McDuffie followed, on the same side, repeating and enforcing the objections urged by Mr. Holmes, and claiming the right of going to the jury, as the only satisfactory mode of deciding the constitutional question.

Mr. Petigru, for the United States, replied to the defendant's counsel, and contended that the provisions of the act were fair and equitable—that it could work no injury. He admitted that the defendants were entitled to file any plea that would present an issue of fact for the jury; but that it was too obvious to admit of doubt, that the design was under the show of pleading to transfer the real point in dispute from the judge to the jury; which could not be permitted. His honor the judge, having decided that the defendants were at liberty to plead, they immediately filed the plea of non est factum; on which issue was joined, and the cause submitted to the jury.

The district attorney then proved the execution of the bonds. The defendants then called a witness, and asked him the question, whether the bonds had not been given for duties imposed by the tariff of 1828? This question elicited the main argument on both sides.

The United States counsel objected that the testimony could not be admitted under that plea. The objection was urged by Mr. Petigru, and sustained by the most luminous view of the subject, aided by the decided cases in England and this country. Mr. McDuffie replied at considerable length. His honor ruled that the testimony was not admissible.

The defendant's counsel then varied their motion in form, by asking leave to go into evidence of the want of consideration for the bonds; on the ground of having given notice of such defence before trial; but the court thought that this motion could not be distinguished from that which had been previously decided.

After the conclusion of the argument, the court, in its charge to the jury, briefly stated to them that it was a suit on a bond—that the execution of the bond had been duly proved—and that there was no evidence before the court and jury to invalidate the bond.

The jury found for the United States the amount of both bonds. An appeal has been taken, which will be heard by the circuit court at Columbia, in November next.

On Tuesday, judge Lee, delivered the following opinion:

The question upon which I am now to decide, is a preliminary one, which the defendants deem of much importance to their cause; it arises under the 65th section of the revenue act, and the amendment to the constitution of the United States, art. 7.

By the section above alluded to, it is provided that "where suit shall be instituted on any bond, for the recovery of duties due to the U. States, it shall be the duty of the court where the same may be pending, to grant judgment at the return term upon motion, unless the defendant shall in open court, the United States attorney being present, make oath or affirmation that an error had been committed in the liquidation of the duties demanded upon such bond, specifying the errors alleged to have been committed, and that the same have been notified in writing to the collector of the district, prior to the commencement of the return term aforesaid; whereupon, if the court be satisfied that a continuance, until the next succeeding term is necessary for the attainment of justice, and not otherwise a continuance may be granted until next succeeding term and no longer."

It must be evident to every one who reads this section, that congress intended to provide in the most expeditious and summary manner for the recovery of all bonds given for duties. They do not appear to have foreseen any difficulties in the way of the recovery of such bonds—they seem not to have thought that any bar to that recovery could be set up. The only case which occurred to them as necessary to be provided for, was that of an error which might be committed by their officer, the collector, in the liquidation of the duties. The section already adverted to, declares, "unless the defendant shall in open court, the United States attorney being present, make oath or affirmation that an error has been committed in the liquidation of the duties demanded upon such bond, specifying the errors alleged to have been committed, and that the same have been notified in writing, to the collector of the district, prior to the commencement of the return term aforesaid; whereupon, if the court be satisfied that a continuance, until the next succeeding term, is necessary for the attainment of justice, and not otherwise, a continuance may be granted until next term, and no longer. In such a case a delay of a term is allowed, if the court should deem it necessary for the attainment of justice."

Two questions present themselves to the mind of the court, which have been made, and naturally arise in this case:

1st, Whether under the terms of the 65th section, the defendant is precluded from going into any defence, except that which is indicated in the latter part of the section, which grants a continuance, on his making oath of a miscalculation of the duties.

2d, If so prohibited by the act, whether the same is not a violation of the 7th article of the amendment to the constitution of the United States, which declares that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, &c.

It has been contended on the part of the United States, that in all suits brought under this section of the act, the judgment or decision must be by the court, that is to say by the judge, without the intervention of a jury. Its language is, it shall be the court to grant judgment at the return term upon motion. What was the meaning of the legislature in this act, when they use the term court? Ex ri termini, "the court" when used in this sentence, and in common judicial parlance, would be considered in most cases to mean the judge. But are we certain that congress meant to confine the jurisdiction over such cases to the district judge alone? Will not a liberal and enlarged construction warrant the opinion that by the term court was meant to be included both judge and jury? Let us examine the law, and discover if we can, whether congress did or could have intended to preclude the debtor from any defence which he might have, and from a trial of that defence before a jury. In construing this and all other laws, it seems but common justice to the legislature making them, to put such an interpretation upon them, if the language used will reasonably admit of it, as will relieve the legislature from the imputation of having intended to do any act of injustice, by depriving a citizen of a right that he might possess. It ought not to be lightly presumed that the representatives of the people, whose duty it is, in their legislative capacity, to watch over the rights of their constituents and to protect them, would invade those rights. The presumption, in a free representative government like ours, must be the other way. In getting at the intention of the legislature in this case, it is proper to inquire, whether by confining the jurisdiction over duty bonds to the judge, and restricting him to the consideration of but one point, viz: the error in the calculation of the duties, an injustice might not be done to the citizen; and if it should appear that such effect would or might follow, then to ask whether such could have been the intention of congress.

Suppose the case put by the defendants, that the bond upon which they were sued was indeed not their bond, but one in which their names had been forged, or the other case, of payment to the collector after the bond was put in suit, or suppose that the suits were brought against the executor or administrator of a deceased debtor, ought they in such case to be prevented from pleading, by which they would be enabled to state such facts and establish such a defence?

If, then, the construction of this law, as contended for by the counsel of the United States, were to prevail, would not the judge or court be compelled to disallow any plea, and might not such a construction in some cases work an injustice, and if such injustice might be done by such a construction of the law, shall we, without very strong reasons, come to the conclusion that the legislature intended to do such wrong? Certainly not. In the case of the executor or administrator having no assets in his hands, unless he were all owed to plead plene administravit, would not injustice be done to him. If the judgment were to go against him without plea, would he not be liable de bonis propriis. By the section under which the suit was brought, the court as has already been shown, may grant a continuance until the next term, if the defendant makes oath, &c. It is thence inferred, that the defendant could make no other defence than that which arises from a miscalculation of duties, &c. Is this the inevitable inference from that part of the clause? A more reasonable one seems to be, that no continuance should be granted, except for that reason. This part of the clause relates only to the delay of a term, and if strictly construed, would forbid such a delay, except on the ground there stated—but can it be made to uphold the opinion, that no defence should be allowed at the return term, or after the continuance has expired? Are we compelled by the terms of the law to believe, that the miscalculation of the duties, which is a mere matter of evidence, was intended by the act to be decided by the judge without a jury? It might happen, and it is no very unreasonable supposition that it would happen, that a judge might be totally incompetent to examine and detect an error in the liquidation of the duties—When the law, therefore, requires the court to grant judgment, &c. it may, perhaps, without any great violence to the legal phraseology, mean the jury as well as the judge.

Fortunately for the court, it is not without an authority, which has a very important bearing on this case. Its strong analogy to the present case, will be readily perceived in the course of the observations which I shall make upon it. The case ex parte Woon, reported in 9 WHEATON, presented questions very much like those which have been made here. They arose under the patent act of congress, and were first tried before the district judge for the southern district of New York, and carried up to the supreme court, under a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to the said district court. The circumstances were these—the 10th section of the patent act, of 21st February, 1793, declares, that upon oath or affirmation being made, before the judge of the district court, where the patentee, his executors, &c. reside, that any patent which shall be issued in pursuance of this act, was obtained surreptitiously, or upon false suggestion, and motion made to the said court, within three years after issuing said patent, but not afterwards, it shall and may be lawful for the judge of the said district court, if the matter alleged shall appear to him to be sufficient, to grant a rule that the patentee, or his executor, &c. show cause why process should not issue against him to repeal such patent; and if sufficient cause shall not be shown to the contrary, the rule shall be made absolute. And, thereupon, the judge shall order process to be issued against such patentee or his executors, &c. with costs of suit. And in case no sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary, or if it shall appear that the patent was not the true inventor or discoverer, judgment shall be rendered by such court for the repeal of the said patent. And if the party at whose complaint the process issued shall have judgment given against him, he shall pay all such costs as the defendant shall be put to in defending the suit, to be taxed by the court, and recovered in due course of law. Here it will be perceived, that upon oath or affirmation being made before the judge of the district court, &c. it became lawful for him to grant a rule that the patentee or his executors, &c. should show cause why process should not issue, &c. and if sufficient cause were not shewn, that judgment shall be rendered by such court for the repeal of the said patent. Under this clause of the patent act, a rule did issue to the patentee, requiring him to shew cause, &c. Upon the return of the rule, a motion was made on the part of the patentee to have an issue made up to try the validity of the patent. The court i. e. the district judge, denied the motion upon the ground that the proceedings were summary, &c. and were not to be submitted to a jury. From this decision an appeal was made to the supreme court why a mandamus should not issue, &c. How do these cases resemble each other, and how does the case just commented upon apply to that before the court? The strong features of resemblance are the terms used in both acts—district judge and court. In the present case the 65th section of the revenue law, makes it the duty of the court, to grant judgment at the return term. In the case arising under the patent law, the judge of the district court on the return of the rule, if not satisfied with the cause shewn, is authorised to make the rule absolute, and order process to issue against the patentee, with costs, &c.

In the same clause the word court is also used. There was the same ambiguity in both acts. The district judge in New York, believing that the remedy provided by the patent act was intended to be summary, refused to have an issue made up. Upon the return of the rule and cause shewn, and after a full hearing before the supreme court, that tribunal ordered a mandamus to issue to the district judge, requiring him to cause an issue to be made up, and the trial to be had before a jury.

I will not say that the cases are altogether parallel, but it must be evident to all who have followed me in the comparison, that the question was in that as in this case, whether a suit involving the rights of the citizens, should under the ambiguous terms of the law, be subject to the final decision of a judge without a jury. Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, adverted to the articles of the constitution, which secures to the citizen the trial by jury, in suits at common law, &c. The supreme court do not appear by the report of that case, to have founded their decision on the article amending the constitution—they seem to have relied more upon a liberal construction of the law, and to have been much influenced by the consideration that such construction should be given to it as would be most congenial to our institutions, and most convenient in the administration of justice.

Having considered this case, arising under the patent law of 1793, and shewn by a comparison of it with the case before the court, that there was a very strong similitude, so much so perhaps, as would have justified me in coming to a similar conclusion, I will now proceed to consider the question upon other grounds.

We will now enquire if the law (the revenue law) did not admit of such an interpretation, it would not be in violation of the constitution of the United States, and in direct repugnancy to the 9th section of the judiciary act, passed in 1789, in pursuance of that constitution.

The 7th article of the amendments to the constitution of the United States, to which I have already adverted, is in the following words:—"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

It is worthy of remark in this place, that so jealous were the people of the United States on the subject of the trial by jury, that they were not satisfied with the constitution of the United States as passed by the convention, because there was not found in that instrument a specific provision recognizing the trial by jury, in suits at common law in civil cases. It was deemed by them of sufficient importance to require an amendment of that instrument. What did they mean by the language suits at common law? Did they not mean under those comprehensive words, to embrace all suits which did not fall within the jurisdiction of the courts of equity and admiralty? They were used in contradistinction to suits in those courts. Chancellor Kent, in the first book of his commentaries, in treating of the jurisdiction of the federal court in relation to the common law, observes, "The expression trials at common law, used in the section of the judiciary act, was not applicable to prosecution for crimes. It applied to civil suits as contradistinguished from criminal prosecutions, and to suits at common law, as contradistinguished from those which came before the court sitting as a court of equity and admiralty." His meaning of the terms (suits at common law), has very recently been settled by the highest judicial authorities in the United States, I mean the supreme court in the case of Parkinson vs. Bedford et al. reported in 3 Peters, page 446. The court in that case thus express themselves: "The trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy. The right to such a trial is, it is believed, incorporated into, and secured in every state constitution in the union, and it is found in the constitution of Louisiana."—"One of the strongest objections originally taken against the constitution of the United States, was the want of an express provision securing the right of trial by jury in civil cases. As soon as the constitution was adopted, this right was secured by the 7th amendment of the constitution proposed by congress, and which received an assent of the people so generally as to establish its importance as a fundamental guarantee of the rights and liberties of the people. This amendment declares that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact once tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examinable in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law." At this time there were no states in the union, the basis of whose jurisprudence was not essentially that of the common law in its widest meaning; and probably no states were contemplated, in which it would not exist. The phrase "common law" found in this clause, is used in contradistinction to equity, and admiralty and maritime jurisprudence. The constitution had declared in the third article, "That the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority," &c. and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It is well known, that in civil causes, in courts of equity and admiralty, juries do not intervene, and that courts of equity use the trial by jury only in extraordinary cases, to inform the conscience of the court. When, therefore, we find that the amendment requires that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in suits at common law, the natural conclusion is, that this distinction was present to the minds of the framers of the amendment.—By common law, they meant what the constitution denominated in the third article "law;" not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized, and equitable remedies were administered; or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law, and of maritime law and equity was often found in the same suit. Probably there were few, if any states in the union, in which some new legal remedies differing from the old common law forms were not in use; but in which, however, the trial by jury intervened, and the general regulations in other respects were according to the course of the common law, (proceedings in cases of partition, and of foreign and domestic attachment, might be cited as examples variously adopted and modified.) In a just sense, the amendment then may well be construed to embrace all suits which are not of equity and admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form which they may assume to settle legal rights, and congress seems to have acted with reference to this exposition in the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, (which was cotemporaneous with the proposal of this amendment); for in the ninth section it is provided, that the trial of issues in facts in the district courts, in all cases except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury, and in the 12th section it is provided, that "the trial of issues in fact in the circuit courts, shall in all suits, except those of equity and of admiralty and of maritime jurisdiction, be by jury;" and again in the thirteenth section, it is provided that "the trial of issues in fact in the supreme court in all actions at law against citizens of the United States, shall be by jury." "The true signification of the words suits at common law, is thus definitively settled, and embrace all suits which do not fall within the jurisdiction of the courts of equity and admiralty."—"The amendment to the constitution providing for a trial by jury in such cases, was passed in March, 1789, and in September of the same year, the judiciary act under which this court holds its authority was passed by congress, only five months after the constitution was amended on this point. We will now examine the judiciary act, and see whether it does not recognize the 7th article of the amendments to the constitution. The ninth section of the judiciary act establishes the jurisdiction of this court, and after vesting authority in this court over certain matters relating to the revenue and the admiralty, holds this language, "and shall also have cognizance concurrent as last mentioned, of all suits at common law, where the United States sue, and the matter in dispute amounts, exclusively of costs, to the sum or value of one hundred dollars," and concludes in the following words: "and the trial of issues in fact in the district courts in all causes except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury."—Here we see the requisition of the constitution complied with, and the trials of issues in fact in all causes, expressly enjoined on the district court, in all causes, that is to say in all suits at common law where the United States sue. To show conclusively that such cases as the present were intended to be embraced by the words "suits at common law," where the United States sue, it is only necessary to enquire who are the suitors in this court. It will be found that with the solitary exception of suits against consuls or vice consuls, there are no other suitors in this court in civil cases (not of admiralty jurisdiction) than the United States. What suits, then, were intended by the words "suits at common law, where the United States sue?" The answer must be, all suits brought by the government on duty or other bonds. Can it mean any other suits? It cannot for this plain and obvious reason, that the only suitors in this court, the only plaintiffs, are the United States. It is a kind of exchequer court, in which the debts due to the government are recovered. Neither aliens nor citizens can sue here. This court has no jurisdiction in any other cases. When the 9th sec. therefore, which establishes this court, declares that it shall have cognizance of all suits at common law, where the United States sue, it must intend to embrace cases like the present, or it can mean nothing. If, then, it meant to comprehend these cases, how are they to be tried? Being suits at common law, they must be governed by the amendment to the constitution, which directs such suits to be tried by a jury. This seems to me to be an inevitable conclusion. My mind has been much assisted too, in forming an opinion on this question, by adverting to an act of congress passed on the 3d March, 1797. By this law, it is declared "that where suits shall be instituted against any person or persons indebted to the United States, as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the court where the same may be pending, to grant judgment at the return term, upon motion, unless the defendant shall, in open court, (the United States attorney being present) make oath or affirmation, that he is equitably entitled to credits which had been, previous to the commencement of the suit, submitted to the consideration of the accounting officers of the treasury, and rejected, specifying each particular claim so rejected, in the affidavit, and that he cannot then come safely to trial. Oath or affirmation to this effect being made, subscribed and filed, if the court be thereupon satisfied, a continuance, until the next succeeding term may be granted, but not otherwise, unless as provided in the preceding section."

It will be seen, by a comparison of this clause with the 65th section of the act of 1789, under which these suits were brought, that the same language is found in both acts—in both, the term court is used. The court in both cases, is required to grant judgment the first term, &c. Indeed, it is evident to me that the legislature, when they passed the act of 1789, had this very act of 1797 before them, for they have used the same phraseology, verbatim. The construetion of the two laws ought therefore to be the same. Laws in pari materis ought to be considered together, and where the object of both laws is the same, to wit, the recovery of the public dues, the construction should also be the same. Now, what has been the practice under this act of 1787? Since I have presided in this court, a number of suits have been brought by the United States under this law, against defaulting public officers, such as deputy post masters, pay masters, &c. and I have never known an instance in which the defendants have been prevented from pleading. In every case an issue has been made up and the facts have been submitted to a jury. It may be said that the cases are different, that in the case before the court, the sum due is liquidated and fixed, and in the cases arising under the act of 1787, the debt due is uncertain. Not so. The amount due to the government is certain in both cases, for in the cases of pay masters and post masters, the statement of the department, certified by the proper officer, and authenticated under his seal, is admitted as evidence, and is conclusive. Here we have a case very strongly in point, under a law word for word, like the 65th section under which this suit is brought, the trial by jury has always been allowed.

What are the inconveniences to the government which can arise from such cases going to a jury? Can there be a delay even of a term in the recovery of such bonds, unless the defendant alleges and swears to a miscalculation of the duties? There cannot be. Cannot congress, if they find that the delay incident to such trials, will operate injuriously to the government, remedy the evil by requiring the duties to be paid in cash, before the permit is delivered for the goods imported. They most assuredly can, but will it be necessary to do so? I cannot conceive that it will. The example of this case will probably not be followed. No merchant will venture to stand suit on his bond. What will be the effect to him? Loss of commercial character and credit with the government—who, on all future occasions, would require the payment of the duties in cash. The consequence, therefore, cannot be of a serious nature to the government. I do exceedingly regret the circumstance, that all this excitement, that all these long and learned discussions, are likely to produce so little fruit. No law can be settled in these cases. From any decision which I may make, an appeal can only be had to the circuit court, which will be shortly held at Columbia, by my brother Johnson, and whether he confirms or reverses my decision, the law will be still unsettled. Both his decision and mine will be visi prius, and inconclusive. The smallness of the sum in dispute will prevent its being carried up to the supreme court, where alone it could be decided in the last resort. It might reasonably be asked, then, why agitate this question when no possible good can result from it? It is not an accidental case, it is one avowedly made for the purpose of calling in question the constitutionality of the tariff act of 1828. Cui bono? when the defendants, who are professional men, consent of the law, know that a final decision on the law could not be had in the case. Let a verdict in the case be one way or the other, it must be evident to all who hear me, that it will be unimportant, inconclusive, settling no point.

From the view which I have taken of the question, both under the law and the constitution, I am bound to say, that the defendants have a right to plead in this case. Let it, however, be clearly understood, that while I admit their right to plead, I decide nothing as to the nature of their pleas, or their effect.

The court on the second day, decided that under the plea of non est factum, the defendant could not go into any evidence to impeach the bond—that this could have been done only by a special plea. We do not know whether the opinion of the court on that point will or will not be published.

The presence of Mr. McDuffie, to argue the constitutionality of the tariff laws, as operating on the payment of the bond above alluded to, has caused a correspondent of the "Charleston Courier" to bring out the following extract from the essays of "One of the people." [Mr. McDuffie against the "radicals" of 1821.]

"Suppose congress should pass a law to 'lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises,' and that a state legislature should pass another, declaring the object for which it was intended unconstitutional, and therefore prohibiting the officers of the general government, by severe penalties, from collecting the 'taxes, duties, imposts and excises.' Suppose congress should pass a law to 'raise an army for a national war,' and a state legislature pass another, declaring the war 'wicked, unrighteous and unconstitutional,' and therefore prohibiting the officers of the general government, under heavy penalties, from recruiting soldiers within the limits of the state."

"I need not multiply cases; for, if you will duly consider those, you will find enough to satiate your keenest relish for anarchy and disorder." In all the above cases you will say "each party has a right to judge for itself," and of course to enforce its judgment. "You might then behold a revenue officer of the U. States confined in a state dungeon for obeying the revenue laws of congress." You might see a gallant officer of the army, covered with the glorious scars of many a hard fought battle, bearing the scourge of a state constable at a whipping post, for attempting under a law of congress, to recruit soldiers to fight the battles of his country." And all this would unavoidably result in giving the state rulers the right to resist the general government, or in a civil war, to establish its legitimate authority; consequences either of which is incompatible with the very notion of government."

"To suppose that the general government have a constitutional right to exercise certain powers, which must operate upon the people of the states, and yet that the government of each state has the right to fix and determine its own relative powers, and by necessary consequence, to limit the powers of the general government, is to suppose the existence of two contradictory and inconsistent rights."

"In all governments there must be some one supreme power, in other words, every question that can arise as to the constitutional extent of the powers of different classes of functionaries, must be susceptible of a legal and peaceable determination by some tribunal of acknowledged authority, or force must be the inevitable consequence. And where force begins, government ends."

"And it is the more astonishing that you have assumed positions involving such tremendous consequences, when we consider that they are in direct opposition to the 'strict letter' of the constitution, your favorite test of delegated authority or powers. It is therein provided, that 'the constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.' And again, 'the judicial powers, (of the United States), shall extend to all cases, in law and in equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority.' Nothing can be more plain than that the 'strict letter' of the constitution does make the laws of congress supreme, enjoining obedience upon the state functionaries; and making void the laws of a state, if contrary thereto. And to give this definition or provision a sanction of a nature peculiarly impressive, 'the members of the several state legislatures, all executive and judicial officers, both of the U. States and of the several states, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support the constitution of the United States. It is not less evident that it belongs to the national judiciary, to pronounce upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the laws of the national legislature."

Fellow-citizens—before you, is the language of the author of that celebrated production of our talented and respectable citizen, Mr. Geo. McDuffie, who now appears to oppose the very principles which he formerly so strenuously urged, as "one of the people." But ten years have elapsed, and you behold him, instead of endeavoring to allay the present unhappy excitement that exists in our state, adding fuel to the flame, under the influence of some most mysterious, if not "natural delusion." All that he can say now, cannot shake your confidence in his former efforts to sustain the true principles of our republican institutions, in support of that barrier which is the bulwark of our safety, and the palladium of our liberty, the good old constitution.

DON'T GIVE UP THE SHIP.

The decision of the district court has occasioned some excitement in Charleston. A meeting of the state rights and free trade party was called on the evening of the 22d, the day after the decision, for the purpose of rendering the thanks of the party to Mr. McDuffie. The meeting, though convened in tempestuous weather, is said by the Charleston Mercury to have been the largest assemblage of the party which has yet taken place. Resolutions highly complimentary to the talents and services of Mr. McDuffie, were offered and adopted. Another set of resolutions respecting the decision of the court, offered by Stephen Elliot, and adopted by the meeting, we copy.

"Resolved, That Isaac E. Holmes and Alexander Mazzyk, esquires, are entitled to the thanks of their fellow citizens, for their disinterested and patriotic efforts to bring before a jury in the federal district court, the constitutionality of the tariff act of 1828, an act passed avowedly for the protection of domestic manufactures.

"Resolved, That the refusal of the district judge to admit, under the plea of "non est factum," any evidence except such as related to the mere execution of the bond of Messrs. Holmes and Mazzyk, and his judicial opinion that the unconstitutional character of the tariff act of 1828 can in no way be carried before a jury in the federal court, are deeply to be deplored, since they have deprived his fellow citizens of the long desired opportunity of submitting to a jury of their country the absorbing question of the constitutionality of that oppressive act, under which they have long and so dreadfully suffered.

"Resolved, That from the whole course of the proceedings in the case of Messrs. Holmes and Mazzyk, the state rights and free trade party of Charleston, are constrained to announce to the state rights and free trade party throughout the state, that all hope of redress from the federal court is destroyed—the known opinion of its judges as to the constitutionality of the tariff, and the fraudulent title of the set itself rendering any reference of the question to their decision but an idle mockery."

Mr. McDuffie, in compliance with the desire of the meeting expressed in a resolution, made his appearance, accompanied by the committee sent to wait on him, gov. Hamilton and gen. Hayne. He addressed the meeting with great eloquence and effect, according to the Charleston paper, on the subjects of the tariff, nullification, the custom house bonds, and other subjects of complaint, and the proper mode of obtaining redress.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, N. Y.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

The United States of America vs.

One package of broadcloth—
Abel Shaw, claimant.

The judge stated to the jury, that the information they were to try, was founded upon the 4th section of the act of May 28, 1830.

The object of this act was more effectually to enforce the law of May 19th, 1828, increasing the duties on cloths, &c. and commonly known as the tariff law: and the precise point in question was whether the present importation had been made in violation of those acts.

This case being the first that has been brought to open trial under these laws, it was proper a deliberate consideration should be bestowed upon it.

The facts laid before the jury by the public prosecutor are, that this package contained thirty-four pieces of cloth. The invoice looked up the whole amount of yards at 74½ and represented the cost at 7s. per yard, less 5 per cent. discounted for ready cash. This would leave the price at 6s. 7d. or 6s. 8d. per yard.

The collector supposing the charges too low, ordered the package to be inspected and appraised.

The appraisers reported the piece lowest in value, to be worth 6s. 9d. and the one highest in value to be worth 8s. 6d. per yard. The other pieces varying from 7s. to 8s. per yard.

At the prices stated upon the invoice, the goods would have fallen within the dollar minimum of duties, and at the appraisement the greater proportion would exceed that minimum. The duties to be paid according to the appraisement exceed those chargeable upon the invoice, above $650. The difference between the lowest and highest appraisement is 43 cents per yard; between the highest and the invoice price 33 cents per yard, which is 23 per cent. and the difference between the whole amount of the invoice and the whole amount of the appraisement is 15 per cent.

Upon these facts the collector seized the goods as forfeited under the act of 1830.

The provisions of the 4th section of the act are, that the collector shall order certain portions of every importation to be inspected, &c. &c. "And if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice or to be falsely charged in such invoice, the collector shall order forthwith, all the goods contained in the same entry to be inspected; and if such goods be subject to ad valorem duty, the same shall be appraised, and if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation or extension or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited, &c. &c.

Upon these facts it is submitted to the jury to determine, whether this package or invoice was made up with intent to evade or defraud the revenue.

It is enough to justify the seizure if there were reasonable grounds of suspicion that an evasion of, or fraud upon, the revenue was intended. Government is not required to produce that full proof which will place the guilt of the party beyond all reasonable doubt. The same rule of evidence does not apply in prosecutions for an infraction of the revenue laws that obtains in criminal trials.

In prosecutions of this character the United States need only make out a prima facie case or probable cause for condemnation. It is then cast upon the claimant to establish the integrity of the transaction, and if he fails to explain away the difficulties of the case, a condemnation must follow because of the defect of testimony on his part.

This rule of evidence is established by express acts of congress, and enforced by decisions of the supreme court.

It is not necessary that there should be direct proof of a fraudulent intent. When the facts in evidence raise a presumption, or afford grounds of reasonable inference, that such intent existed, the point will be deemed sufficiently established, until the evidence on the part of the claimant clearly counteracts the effect of that proof. The law imposes on a claimant the necessity of proving the innocence of the suspected transaction, because he is presumed to have papers, or other evidence in his possession or under his control, which would explain its true character, whilst the United States have no means of ascertaining where such proofs may be found, or to enforce their production.

Without the aid of a rule of evidence which exerts from those coming forward to reclaim goods, seized for being brought into the country under circumstances of suspicion, proof that no violation of law was intended, no system of imposts could be enforced. If every deviation from the law by importers, was to be presumed unintentional and innocent, until the contrary was proved beyond all reasonable doubt, it is manifest that the government could rarely, if ever, convict any one of a violation of the laws; and both the fair importer and the home interests intended to be protected, would be subjected to unceasing wrongs and losses. Nothing but downright smuggling, or cases of the most gross character could be punished or restrained.

Neither need the prosecution prove that the claimant himself participated in the offence, or had any knowledge that it was contemplated. It is enough to show the act done by any one having the legal possession or control of the goods.

The penalty is attached to the false preparation of the package or invoice without regard to the party by whose illegal intent it may be made up.

The offence pointed out by the statute and the one which the information charges to have been committed in respect to this package, is the making up the package or invoice with intent to evade or defraud the revenue. The punishment is, forfeiture of the goods. The policy and object of the law is to prevent this specific mode of attempting a fraud and when the attempt is detected the forfeiture cannot be avoided by shewing that the real owner was innocent or ignorant of the improper design, unless it also appears that the attempt was made by mere strangers over whom the owner had no control.

The ignorance of the owner might be a strong circumstance in an application to the proper authority for the remission of the forfeiture, but cannot avail to exonerate the property from the operation of the law.

Had the master of the vessel attempted to smuggle in this package without the knowledge of the owner, the property would have been forfeited, notwithstanding the owner was personally in no fault: and so also will he have to bear the consequences of the illegal conduct of his agent or vender, although he may be free from all blame in respect to it.

Should the testimony on the part of the prosecution have failed to make out reasonable grounds of suspicion or doubt as to the integrity of this transaction, then the jury will acquit the property without going into an examination of the case made by the claimant; but if they believe probable cause has been shewn for this seizure, it then becomes necessary to consider the matters of defence brought forward by the claimant.

The forfeiture is understood to be resisted,—1. Because the law attempted to be enforced, is unconstitutional. 2. Because the appraisers did not conform to the provisions of the act, having made the appraisement according to the value of the goods at Marsden, the place of purchase, and not at Liverpool, the place of shipment; and if these points of law are not decided in his favor, then he insists upon the various matters of fact in proof, on his part, as countervailing the evidence given by the prosecution.

Any party whose interests are affected by a statute has the right, in a proper mode, to call the constitutionality of the law in question.

This right may be exercised by aliens equally with citizens, and it is the duty of a court, when the objection is brought before it, to consider and dispose of it.

Although the counsel for the claimant took the objection formally, yet he declined arguing it, further than by alluding to the state of public sentiment in relation to this law, known to prevail in another section of the country. The court therefore, is compelled to decide the point upon general impressions, without the aid, it would have reason to expect in so grave a matter, from a well matured discussion on the part of counsel.

In the estimation of the court, there is very little in the circumstance that excitations exist with respect to this law, and that it is denounced as unconstitutional by individuals and public bodies, conducing to demonstrate it to be unconstitutional. Movements of that character, should, indeed, have no influence over the judgments of a court and jury.

It is to be apprehended that the propensity, greatly on the increase, to stigmatize every unpopular or impolitic act of government as a violation of the constitution, may tend to produce an indifference or heedlessness in public sentiment in respect to that objection, even when there is the most urgent occasion for resort to it.

At all events, if the courts should shrink from enforcing a law because respectable individuals, intelligent magistrates and state legislatures have pronounced it unconstitutional, how many cardinal powers of government would have been paralyzed? How many vital acts of legislation would have remained dead letters upon the statute book in the short period of our political history? Among others which might be named, the acts establishing a bank—excise and internal duty acts—non-intercourse and embargo acts, and even acts calling the militia into service in times of actual war and invasion, would have stood in this predicament, none of which are now doubted to be within the authority of congress to pass.

Before, then, the court and jury can disregard a solemn act of legislation, they must be furnished with higher reasons for so doing, than declarations and resolutions against their constitutionality, emanating even from the most worthy and intelligent of our citizens or states.

In stating its conclusion upon this subject, the court will not attempt any answer to the arguments usually advanced against this particular law: if they are not all resolvable into arraignments of its expediency only, they are too theoretical and speculative to be useful guides in solving the proposition now submitted. A few words will explain the view the court takes of the subject.

The act lays an impost duty on woollen cloths brought into this country from any foreign one.

The constitution in terms authorizes congress to lay and collect imposts, with but one qualification, that they shall be uniform. No one will question that congress may, by virtue of this clause, impose duties to some extent on imports of every description; nor but that those imposts, when collected, become a portion of public money, to be expended in any way congress is empowered to disburse the national funds.

Certainly it is not the prerogative of the judiciary to deny congress the use of a power explicitly given by the constitution, because it may be improvidently exercised; nor to declare a law void, passed under a clear power, because the object of the power may not be observed or justly effectuated; nor can it appertain to the judiciary to stay the operation of a law passed under such power, although proved to have an unequal or injurious bearing upon the community, or because it might be founded in motives of advantage to one interest or class of citizens, and prejudice to another; or because there is no notorious and urgent occasion for the revenue it proposes to raise.

Upon what principle of constitutional interpretation can the judiciary execute a law levying one rate of duty and pronounce it void, when it imposes a higher? How is 45 per cent. duty on cloths, less an impost than 5 per cent.

What sound and plain rule of exposition will enable the court to mark the line of discrimination between duties that are legitimate and those that are illegal—the power to impose some degree of duty being incontestable? It would seem exceedingly manifest, both from the nature of this power and the manner in which it is conferred, that the occasions on which it should be exercised, equally with the degree or extent of its exercise, were left to the discretion of the legislature.

In such case there is no check provided upon the improvident use of the power, and none could be brought in—compatibly with the spirit of our institutions, other than the responsibility of all public functionaries to their constituents.

Public opinion, enforcing itself by means of changes of the legislative bodies, supplies the only legitimate check to, and remedy for, improvident and impolitic legislation of this character.

If the people think the tariff system oppressive or impolitic, it will be easily rectified in that manner.

The court is accordingly prepared to decide, without bringing into view another power granted to congress, (more comprehensive than this, and bearing upon the subject—the power to regulate commerce, &c.) that this act is within the constitutional authority of congress, and that it must be executed conformably to its terms.

2d. The second point of law will be disposed of in a few words.

It supposes the place of exportation must be the one which governs the appraisers in fixing the value of goods, and that the place of exportation necessarily is limited to the port of shipment. By reference to the acts of congress on this subject, it will, however, be found that the place of exportation is sometimes intended to embrace the country from which the export is made, as in the case of goods carried from the country in which they are produced to another for shipment; and there is certainly nothing in this section of the act of 1830, which restricts the appraisers to the port of shipment as the market which is to govern their appraisement.

So also the act of 1823 has direct reference to the place where the goods were purchased or procured, as that which shall supply the criterion of value; and the 4th section of the act of 1830 is to be construed in connexion with the act of 1823, with which the subject matter stands immediately connected.

Nor is it believed that in the ordinary acceptance of the term in mercantile language, the place of exportation means merely that of shipment. A cargo purchased and packed at Sheffield or Manchester, though shipped at Bristol, would with strict propriety of expression, be said to be exported from the place of purchase.

If the goods are picked up in general market in London or Liverpool, and there shipped, the port would in the full sense be the place of exportation; nor does the court mean to decide that if no general market value of the commodities in question can be ascertained at the place of manufacture or purchase, the appraisers may not adopt that of the port of shipment as the one upon which to found their appraisement.

This objection is accordingly overruled. Upon the facts in proof on this part, it is insisted for the claimant (1.) that he is innocent of all fraud or improper design in this importation. (2.) That the appraisement is not entitled to credit as fixing the value of the goods: much less does it afford any reasonable ground to infer a fraudulent intention in the exportation. (3.) That the vendor or agent abroad could have no possible interest in defrauding or evading the revenue, and that therefore the circumstance of excess in value would not justify imputing such intent to him.

The observations of the court before submitted have indicated the rule of evidence with respect to the first proposition—that it is unimportant as to the result of this prosecution, whether the claimant be personally innocent or guilty of the supposed fraud.

If a fraud was intended, and he participated in it, less regret would undoubtedly be felt at confiscating his property—yet the law equally subjects the goods to forfeiture, whether the illegal act was done by the owner or any other person having the possession and control of them under his authority. The penalty being affixed to the goods, it is not discharged by showing that one will have to bear the consequences who was not concerned in the perpetration of the offence.

2. To satisfy the jury that no confidence can be placed in this appraisement, evidence has been gone into to show that persons of equal skill in valuing cloths, and of equal opportunities for knowing their worth in market, will differ in their estimates nearly as much as this appraisement differs from the invoice. If this is so at home, where the variations of the market can be readily ascertained, it is inferred that there will be still more uncertainty in fixing a value here, that shall correspond with the true one abroad. This testimony, however, must be compared with the evidence on the other side, very much circumscribing the degree of difference these circumstances would create. There is also evidence that manufacturers are in the habit of charging packages of goods which cost alike to them at a common price to the purchaser, although it is impossible but that there should be very considerable differences in the value of the respective pieces. The expense of materials and labor for the production of a lot of goods may be the same upon the yard, with respect to each piece, whilst superior workmanship, or circumstances merely accidental may create a difference of several per cent. on the yard, in the market value of the cloths.

There may be a difference likewise, arising from the fancy or caprice of buyers, which will enhance one piece many per cent. above others of the same quality.

These are particulars, very difficult if not impossible to estimate with any correctness in an appraisal of cloths, and it is therefore urged, that such valuation ought always to be received with great caution, particularly as it is to furnish the material fact upon which a forfeiture is demanded.

And, moreover, it may occur to the jury, that the appraisal could be resorted to, as an invariable criterion of the worth of goods, yet that the necessities of the vender, the superior address of the buyer, and the chance fluctuations in market, each contribute to create wide differences between the cost of a lot of goods and the current value, so that it may be a common occurrence for purchasers to obtain goods bona fide, for less than they would be valued at on appraisal.

It is besides contended, that the difference has been greatly exaggerated, as in truth the average is only 62-3 per cent above the invoice, instead of 15 per cent. as stated by the witnesses for the prosecution.

The latter estimate, however, takes the dollar minimum for the base, and not the actual value of the cloth. So that the 62-3 per cent. average is so much above 1 dol. per square yard. The testimony does not state what that per cent. would be upon the running yards, nor does it undertake to point out any error in the valuation of the cloths, and the differences calculated upon that.

There would be great force in the facts and arguments produced by the claimant, if it would be enough for him to make out that the case on the part of the prosecution was doubtful. But this is not so. The law required of him to countervail the appraisal by higher proofs. The appraisal fixed the value of the goods as to him until that was done. For that purpose it afforded him the privilege of a re-appraisal, and by merchants, one of whom he might select himself; or he might have done what would have been more direct and satisfactory, proved the actual cost of the goods.

Having failed to use the means in his power, and to produce that evidence which would leave no doubt of the fairness of this transaction, every presumption instead of operating in his favor, must be turned most strongly against him. The goods must be taken to be worth and to have cost the sum at which they are valued by the appraisers.

By this rule of evidence, the merchant will not be deprived of any advantage he might derive from his capital or superior skill in business, in making his purchases, or even his speculations. He need only pay duties upon the actual cost of his goods, if he will prove what the cost was. His invoice will not be accepted as such proof, when it is palpably below the price at which the commodities are usually obtained in market. Although the law may thus occasionally throw delays and impediments in the way of the business of the correct and upright dealer, yet probably there is no other method by which the public can be secured against other contrivances and fraudulent practices of those who mean to evade the payment of the duties they know their goods are subject to.

3. The third point is, that the vender had no interest in the goods, and no motive for committing the fraud.

The only observation occurring to the court as necessary to be made upon this branch of the defence is, that to exonerate the goods upon this ground, the evidence must be satisfactory—that the vender or agent abroad had no possible interest in giving a false valuation to them.

It is by no means enough to shew that the prosecution has not proved him to have an interest. If the case raises just doubts or suspicions with respect to his interest and intent, the law calls for evidence at his hands, disproving that he could derive any benefit from the matter.

There is no proof shewing the relationship in which these parties stand to each other; nor but that there may be a full community of interest either in the goods or the profits to be derived from them.

The whole subject in respect to the facts and inferences is referred to the judgment of the jury. It belongs to them to examine all the evidence; to consider every fair and legitimate conclusion derivable from the state of the proofs; to give its just weight to the circumstances connected with the transaction; and from the whole, to decide whether or not this package or invoice, was made up with intent to evade or defraud the revenue.

In the one case the verdict will be for the claimant; in the other for the United States, and a condemnation of the goods must be the consequence.

The jury found a verdict for the United States, and judgment of forfeiture was pronounced against the goods.

REVENUE LAW CASE.

[Reported for the N. Y. Evening Journal.]

District court of the United States for the southern district of New York.—September term, 1851.

United States } This action came on for trial before vs. } Judge Bitts, 14th of September.

Isaac K. Smith. } This was an action of debt, founded on part of section fifty-four, of the act of congress, second of March, '99, whereby "the master, or other person having the charge, or command of any vessel, shall, during the night time, open, break or remove, any locks, or other fastening, affixed by an inspector of the customs to any part of the vessel, having communication with the hold, shall forfeit, and pay five hundred dollars." It was in evidence, that the defendant arrived in this port, as master of a small vessel, from the Bahamas, laden with pine apples, and hauled in at Burling slip—an inspector of the customs was put on board, who one afternoon, told captain Smith he should put a fastening on the cabin door. Smith remonstrated, said he had no right so to do, and said if he had no other place to sleep, he should enter the cabin. The inspector put on what he called a fastening, which was a small piece of red tape—during the night the fastening was broken. A sailor before the mast, swore he broke it accidentally—Mr. Lewis, the owner, or part owner of the vessel, swore that the same afternoon Smith gave up the command of the vessel, and he consented to it. The inspector said the next day after, Smith was on board and appeared to act as master; and it was conceded, that Smith did a few days after, sail as master of said vessel, up the North river. There was introduced considerable contradictory testimony, as to the fact, whether there was any communication with the cabin and hold. And the district attorney swore, that two or three days after, he had received instructions to prosecute Smith, Smith called at his office, but did not deny or confess that he had broken the fastenings, but denied that any thing was done contrary to law.

The judge charged the jury—if they believed that there was a communication with the cabin and hold, and that Smith was master of the vessel at the time the fastening was broken, notwithstanding the sailor might have broken it, as he states, yet they must find for the United States, and that fastening made in the manner as stated by the inspector, was a sufficient fastening in law. Verdict for defendant.

J. Hamilton, for United States—W. Q. Morton, for defendant.

CHEROKEE GOLD MINES.

From the Georgia Journal.

☞ We deeply regret the collision that has occurred between the executive and judicial departments of the government. The superior court of the western circuit, in the discharge of what is believed to be its duty, has made a decision in relation to the Indian right to dig for gold, affirming that right, as we understand. We have not seen the report of the decision, but the grounds of it, we presume, are correctly, though briefly, set forth in the following article from the Athenian:

"As a considerable interest has been excited by the case of Canato, a Cherokee Indian, confined in Walton jail under the charge of digging gold in his own nation, which by the last legislature was made a penitentiary offence, we lay before our readers the following information derived from a source which may be relied on.

The Indian was taken by the state guard, and carried to Gwinnett, the county having jurisdiction of the case, and upon examination he was committed to Walton jail, there being no jail in Gwinnett. During the session of the superior court of Walton county, he was brought up by habeas corpus, and his discharge was moved for upon three grounds. 1st. That the warrant and commitment were defective. 2nd. That the act of the last legislature itself, did not contemplate punishing the Indians for digging gold on their own lands, but was intended for intruders and other persons; and, 3rd, that if it did, it was unconstitutional on the ground that it violated numerous treaties made with them, expressly guarantying the undisturbed possession and occupancy of all their lands not ceded to the whites. After much argument, the court [judge CLAYTON], said it was a very important question, and required the utmost deliberation. Respect for the legislature demanded it. As, however, it did not believe the person could be discharged upon the two first grounds, it would in candor say, his best prospect was on the last; and, as the court would take time to consider so grave a question, it would release him from his confinement upon his own recognizance, to appear and answer to the charge at Gwinnett superior court, when and where its opinion would be delivered, it in the mean time its mind could be fully satisfied on the point. The court stated that it would endeavor to have its opinion ready by Jackson court, which is just past; but such has been the nature of its other pressing engagements, as well as the great magnitude of the question, that it has not been done, and will not be done, until every source of information, both legal and political, is consulted, which can possibly shed light upon a subject involving so seriously, the liberty of an unfortunate people, as well as the character of the state.

Since the question of the Indians digging gold has been agitated, many persons have expressed an opinion that if they are allowed to do it, they can employ any person they please to do the same thing. Such an opinion is very erroneous; for we have it from judge Clayton himself, that, even if he were to decide that the Indians had the right, the law would be binding against every other person, and the doctrine that, "what a man does by another, he does by himself," will not apply to criminal cases. It is only applicable to civil contracts, and every man stands upon his own responsibility, in committing acts that are made criminal by law."

So far the court goes.

Now the governor, differing from the court, we understand, believes the act prohibiting the Indians and all others from digging for gold, to be constitutional, and will therefore, in the discharge of what he believes to be his duty, carry it strictly into execution.

Executive department, Milledgeville, Sept. 20, 1831.

Sir—I have just learned that the judge of the western circuit has decided that the law for the protection of the mines in the territory occupied by the Cherokees is void, and has discharged an Indian from confinement who had been arrested by the guard for its violation. As the effect of this decision will be to create the opinion among the Indians, that they are now licensed to plunder the state of this valuable property, I have thought it proper to give you express instructions to defend it, that you may be justified in pursuing that course.

I have no doubt but that the legislature has the authority to take possession of the mines, and the constitutional right to pass laws to protect them from trespass. By the law which has been passed, the governor is directed to take possession of the mines, and to cause all persons to be arrested who may attempt to violate that possession. The special object of your appointment, and the organization of the guard under your command, was to enable the governor to obey these requirements. You are not an officer connected with the judiciary department, but the agent whom the legislature has authorized the executive to employ, to perform a public service which was imposed by law upon that department.

You will therefore arrest every person who may be found attempting to take away any gold from the mines. You will give general information in the Cherokee country of the determination of the executive department to enforce the laws so as to prevent if possible the necessity of making any arrests.

The peaceful acquisition of our Indian territory, and the preservation of the rights of the state may depend essentially upon your prudence and firmness in executing the duty which has been assigned you. Very respectfully, yours, &c. GEORGE R. GILMER.

Col. John W. A. Sanford.

AMERICAN SLAVES IN THE BAHAMAS.

The following case has caused no small degree of excitement. The vessel referred to (on her passage from one of the Atlantic ports of the United States to New Orleans) was wrecked on Abaco—and it appears that the British governor designs to condemn her cargo of slaves, as being illegally introduced.

From the Bahama Argus.

We understand that col. Morse, of New Orleans, arrived in this town a few days since, and that he is the agent for the owners of the one hundred and sixty-five American slaves, brought into this port from the wreck of the brig Comet, on Abaco. We are also informed that a correspondence has been commenced between this gentleman and his excellency the governor—the result of which has not as yet, transpired; but, were we disposed to hazard a conjecture, knowing, as we but too well know, the extent of influence exercised by the saintly hypocrites of England over her ill-fated colonies, we should not hesitate in saying, that his excellency will still persist in the illegal and unjust detention of the slaves in question from their rightful owners.

Hence, it seems a national question, to be settled between the United States and England—non nostrum tantum componere lites. Without aspiring to be much learned in the profession, we are inclined to believe it will puzzle all the lawyers in England, and lord Goderich at their head, to find any law or statute of Great Britain, or any of their colonies, that will warrant either the condemnation, emancipation, or further detention, of these slaves, under the circumstance of necessity and distress in which they were brought into this port.

An American vessel, engaged in a legal trade, sailing from one port of the United States to another, is wrecked, the slaves taken off a reef of rocks and brought into this port by British vessels, for the purpose of saving their lives, and procuring the means of transporting them to their port of destination; they are here seized by the crown officers, libelled, and tried under the abolition law—and fully acquitted by the judgment of a competent court; the whole provincial assembly of the island, and every respectable and intelligent man in this community, soliciting his excellency to restore them to their owners.

Why are they not restored? we again ask. Shew us the law of king, lords, and commons, under which they are detained. We do not want the private instructions of lord viscount Goderich, or the opinions of the abolition society; these may serve to oppress, and in the end, ruin our own colonies, but we cannot recognize in them any legal authority to deprive subjects of another nation at peace with England, of their lawful property.

We are not disposed to attribute to his excellency any personal motive or interest in the extraordinary course he has pursued, in relation to these slaves—although we are not ignorant of the fact, that some of them are now in his employment, and one in the capacity of head cook at the government house, and that the names of these, and the rest, appear in a certain memorial to the government, humbly soliciting the continuance of his excellency, as governor of the Bahama islands. If it be really true, that it has come to this, we would recommend to his excellency a much more expeditious mode of raising such recruits for such a service. Let him, like his namesake, gen. Smith, during the last American war, issue a proclamation, beginning in this way:—

"Come yellow, come blacky, come ragged and bare, Come filthy, come lousy, come just as you are."

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 7—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, OCT. 15, 1831.

[VOL. XLI. Whole No. 1,047]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ We had laid aside prepared copy enough for the present number to fill two sheets—but only publish one, closely filled, however.

☞ In further demonstration of the entire fidelity that we intend to observe in all such things, we copy from the "Globe" a new arraignment of the vice president for an alleged plot against the president of the United States—though apprehending that it may furnish a very unpleasant supply of new matter, concerning subjects which have so much burthened our pages, and with which, we think, that the public is entirely wearied. We also insert a statement from the "Haleigh Register," published at the request of Mr. Branch, which will excite considerable interest in those who have read Mr. Eaton's "reply." It corrects an important mistake. We are prepared to receive yet new matters for controversy, and expect two of a very explosive character—but not immediately, we hope—out of regard to our oppressed pages!

☞ The general convention of the friends of domestic industry, to be held at New York on the 26th inst. promises to be very numerous and respectable. Maryland will be fully represented.

☞ The New York Whig of the 4th instant published the "Address of the National Anti-masonic convention," lately held at Baltimore. It makes nearly nine columns of that paper. We shall make room for it speedily.

☞ The editor of a small weekly journal, published in the western country, has commenced the "Calhoun correspondence," and promises to give all the papers that shall appear to it! The editor of another paper calculates that this will be a two year's job—supposing that the correspondence should end with major Eaton's reply. But from what we see and hear, there is no present hope of a termination to it. Many quires of ink-depaver are yet to rush into controversy! We shall endeavor to "go the whole."

☞ The "free trade convention," which met at Philadelphia on the 30th Sept. adjourned on Friday evening last, the 7th Oct. sine die—leaving much of its business in charge of a residuary committee. We have brought up the journal of proceedings and inserted the "address to the people of the United States," reported by Mr. Herrien and adopted without amendment, 158 to 29. The address is an ingenious paper, well calculated for effect—but not powerful, we think, because of its arguments or facts. Its distinguishing characteristic is—the unconstitutionality of the protecting laws; which was never suspected until the federal government was more than thirty years old and hundreds of acts had been unwittingly passed, which remain as standing monuments against the new doctrines of the south. And even yet, it seems, that a ship of the line may be sent to the furthest verge of the ocean to protect the cargo of an American shallop venturing so far, and that the army of the United States may be collected and stationed at certain points to protect property in slaves and keep it in order, both which we think "necessary and proper;"—but still, no law can be passed, or regulation made, which has for its purpose the protection of the farmers and other free laboring persons in the United States, unless also engaged in foreign commerce, or in some way interested or connected with the condition and proceedings of the slave population. Why may not navigation and commerce, and property in slaves, as well be left to "regulate themselves," as the growth of wheat and manufacture of blankets?

VOL. XLI.—No. 10.

The yeas and nays on the unconstitutionality of the tariff laws are not given—but Virginia, the Carolinas and Alabama had 115 votes in the convention—and, at the head of them stood a judge of the United States, VOLUNTEERING an opinion that the national legislature had violated the constitution! In ordinary times, this proceeding would not escape severe reprehension. We are glad, however, that the question is brought to a tangible point—which indeed, is the only one worth special notice in the address, for it is common enough in its remarks on "things in general"—and we shall now understand that the 30 per cent. duty extended to the makers and manufacturers of leather, furs and skins, wood, various metals and earths, and to mechanics in general, as well as the duties upon wool and woollens, &c. are all unconstitutional and must be abolished, or else—a small minority of the people will put the large majority "to rights;" and this is the only "free trade" which has yet been expounded for the public use, by this "free trade convention!" We shall see the end on't. The majority will not submit a revision of the tariff to those who stand pledged to destroy it. If amended, it must be so only by the hands of friends. Much may be yielded in a spirit of harmony, but nothing to force; and hence we think that the convention has done much to prevent what it ostensibly met to accomplish—and to strengthen those whom it was designed to weaken; and give to the friends of protection a most powerful weapon, seeing that the original construction of the constitution is decidedly with them, and has never yet been set aside, but sanctioned, by repeated acts and decisions of the legislative, judicial and executive authorities of the country, for a period of more than forty years; and surely something much stronger than the simple opinion of a meeting of persons, constituted as the "free trade convention" was, may be required to do away principles so long established and unhesitatingly acted upon. We shall hereafter give a list of the names of the delegates, and, as far as practicable, affix the places of their residence, that the force of this movement may be the better understood.

Mr. Sarehet, we see, made a communication to the convention concerning iron. It would have looked quite as well if that body had preferred the testimony of an American citizen. We expect, however, to publish his communication with the proceedings of the residuary committee.

Much remark is invited on several matters pertaining to this address—but we have not room to indulge it. The editors of the "National Intelligencer," as if in maliciousness, have just published an entire copy of the first petition to congress to protect manufactures, adopted at Baltimore and presented 11th April, 1789; among the signers of which was Sumner Smith, at present one of the senators from Maryland. It "gives the whole."

*In New York, it seems, they have the names of the delegates from that city who voted on this question—as follows:

For striking out the argumentative part of the address relative to the unconstitutionality of the tariff.

Yeas—Messrs. Goodhue, Gallatin, Mercen, Stevens, Carow, Boorman, Griswold, Swan, Ring, Trimble, Lorillard, King, Russell, Bronson, Heard, Stillwell—10.

Noes—Messrs. Fish, Leonard, Bergh, Kueceland—4.

On the final passage of the address—

Yeas—Messrs. Lorillard, Leonard, Fish, Bergh, Bronson, Goodhue, Heard, Kueceland—8.

Noes—Messrs. Mercen, Stevens, Carow, Boorman, Griswold, Swan, Ring, Trimble, Gallatin, King, Russell, Stillwell—12.

It is thought that the minority violated the instruction of the meeting, at which they were appointed—which confined their domgs to a "modification" of the tariff.

THE CONSTITUTION. The "Pennsylvania Whig" says that a protecting tariff has been pronounced constitutional by George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson, (being the whole line of presidents of the United States); by Benjamin Franklin and Alexander Hamilton; by the two distinguished chief justices of the United States, John Jay and John Marshall; by Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Daniel Webster, William Wirt, Henry Baldwin, Richard Rush and Albert Gallatin. But what a list of names might be added, if disposed to array them!—such as De Witt Clinton, Simon Snyder and Oliver Wolcott, first rate practical statesmen, and William Lander, one of the ablest and best of men. Indeed, we might introduce the name of every distinguished person who had a part in framing or adopting the constitution, or was a member of congress at any time between 1789 and 1822, when the notion of unconstitutionality was, we believe first started. Nay, we suspect that the cautious Marion Van Buren stands fully "committed" on this subject, and even the ultra—the late William B. Giles, and present errand minister for St. Petersburg, John Randolph, are not free from an admission of the principle. Indeed, we suppose that no leading statesman or prominent politician, unless he has jumped into importance in the last ten years, stands "uncommitted," no matter in what part of the United States he may be found, against this "free trade convention!" O, that we had a file of the "Richmond Enquirer" from 1806 to 1814, and since! But, perhaps, a file may be accessible in Richmond—and if so, we shall much thank our friend the editor of the "Whig," if he will look to an account of a celebration of the 4th of July in that city, in 1807, 8 or 9, most probably, at which a cert. in governor of Virginia, (if we are not much mistaken), exposed himself without a coat, that the people might see and rejoice in the beautiful SHIRT that he wore of American manufacture! Let us have the whole—with all the patriotic remarks of Mr. Ritchie on that "momentous crisis."*

THE SLAVE QUESTION. It cannot be disguised that the great question concerning persons of color, in all the states south of the Susquehanna, is rapidly forcing itself upon the public consideration. The late awful tragedy enacted in Virginia,† and the detection of an extensive and organized plan to bring about desolation and massacre in North Carolina—where, it may be awfully believed, was not altogether confined to slaves in that state—has infected the minds of tens of thousands of persons with a quivering sensibility on the subject, and destroyed the peace of those who lived in seeming security on the brink of a dark and reckless volcano, ready to burst upon and overwhelm them with a lava of blood. In this exaltation of the fanciful sublimity of the white population, what must follow? The already small comparative numbers of such in the "tide-water counties" will be quickly reduced, in the prompt removal of most individuals not interested in slave-property, and

*A "republican" address was issued at Richmond in 1808, signed by William H. Cabell, William Wirt, William Fouché, sen. Peyton Randolph and Thomas Ritchie, earnestly calling the attention of the people to domestic manufactures. We make one extract by way of a specimen:

"Perhaps it is no wild supposition to conceive, that even if the present attacks on our trade should blow over, congress may adopt the policy of encouraging our own manufactures, by rather higher duties on the imported articles of Europe. To keep ourselves from being altogether dependent on Europe for clothing, congress MAY adopt this course, if they should discover from the experience of the intermediate time that we have really the inclination and the power to clothe ourselves." BRAVISSIMO—MURRAY!

Here is no doubt expressed of the want of constitutional power!—on the contrary, it is directly assumed!

†What may not be expected if another like occurrence shall take place! It is fearful to think of the beginning or ending of it.

especially of the white laboring classes—those who every where must bear "the burthen and the heat of the day." These cannot be spared!—the prejudice against such labor has much thinned their ranks, severe military duty will be added, and a general departure will ensue, when to these strong inducements is superadded the overwhelming consideration of personal safety. The various censuses teach an important lesson in this respect, and, with regard to the districts of country referred to and the next numbering of the people resident in them, will unfold new and awful causes for alarm, unless, and with a strong hand, the evil is grasped—and, in some way, relieved. Free labor and slave labor cannot abide together. In preferring the latter, as a governor of North Carolina has publicly done, the former seeks a new location in which it is protected or honored; and hence the one becomes stronger and stronger as the other becomes weaker and weaker—and danger increasing as the means of recasting it are diminished. Such is the truth—and it will reach the heart and home of every one interested, through sober reflection, or in twilight necessity. Thousands of our fellow citizens are now around—harassed with watchings and excited by every idle rumor that fear puts forth—and thousands of mothers, while trembling for their own safety, press their infants more closely to their bosoms, feeling that what happened in Southampton may happen to themselves. The character of that transaction, (more than its extent, though the slaughter was horrible), will remain impressed on the heart long after time shall have cicatrized the wounds inflicted by the massacre of unoffending women and children; and have a powerful tendency to furnish additional causes for fresh atrocities—for that those proceedings of the slaves in Virginia and North Carolina, will bring about a more severe treatment of the people of color, must needs be expected: they will be denied many little privileges and perquisites which they enjoyed, and the elements of discontent will be increased by unaccustomed restraint, and a knowledge of the fact that their power is lessened—while, of all things, should be concealed from them. Such is the natural progress of events. It is with unalloyed regret that we notice this—but, as before observed, the great question is forcing itself on the public consideration, and effects will follow—no matter how revolting it is to contemplate them. Let then the soundest heads and best hearts of the nation, be engaged to build up some practicable project which shall, at once, afford the hope of security to white persons and extend the prospect of an ameliorated condition to the slaves—and give the latter new motives to do well, in lieu of that which, it is to be apprehended, they will be pretty generally deprived of—the opportunity of religious instruction; which, though it may have afforded fitting seasons for bad men to do mischief, has, probably, had a powerful effect to soften asperities of temper, and better reconcile thousands to present suffering in the hope of a happy future. This is no time for the pressure of speculative opinions, with threats of "nullification" supported "as arms"—for there is a really existing evil which requires the united energy of all, to extinguish or keep in check—and to which we are assured that those not immediately interested will contribute their full proportion of means—sorrowing for the occasion, but gladly extending even to "nullifiers" the best evidence of a kind and generous national feeling, and a sacred regard for the welfare of the whole American people—which we desire may always be the "American system."

While reflecting on these matters, we received a letter from a distinguished gentleman of North Carolina (of a late date), from which we take leave to give an extract, as follows:

"I regret exceedingly that people of the south—many of our most intelligent men, should be so far carried away with mere sound and declamation against the protective system, as to condemn it without that patient investigation which the subject deserves. It would seem that the curse of slavery has blinded our eyes to the true interest of our country. If any question of policy can be so tortured as to have a bearing inmost to slavery, it would seem that there was a determination to oppose it, right or wrong. We are, sir, in this section of our country, in an unenviable situation. By the ex-cusive encouragement extended to slave labor,* laboring white men are driven away from our towns; and, when the insurrectionary spirit of slaves manifests itself, we feel our want of them—and, as a consequence, the general government is called upon for assistance. I am one of those who do not believe we stand in need of any foreign aid as yet; but I cannot say, that, if the present policy is pursued much further, the day will not come when we shall need it. The subject of slavery is a delicate one for a southerner to touch upon; but it is one that we must sooner or later come to. I am therefore fully of opinion, that the sooner we begin to discuss it, the better for ourselves. It is true, the present generation may not expect to be relieved from this burthen; but, if we act wisely, our posterity may escape the curse. It is necessary that the southern states adopt a gradual scale of emancipation of their slaves; and, effectually to free us of them, the arm of the general government should be extended, to assist in removing them as they become free. I am convinced that a temperate discussion of this subject would lead to beneficial results. Your Register holds a conspicuous place among the publications of our country; and if you were to advocate this subject, I am of the belief that you would be useful to the cause of humanity and justice."

Such are the opinions of a friend in North Carolina—a gentleman who, as we believe, has a large stake in the matter referred to. We would gladly deserve the compliment paid us, and will cheerfully co-operate by all the means that we have—but to take a lead in such subjects, belongs to giant minds and lofty influences over public opinion. There are men whose voices would be heard—whose sound sense and established patriotism would reach many of the most obdurate and compel them to reflect, under an awful assurance of events that must flow from an adherence to the present state of things. But still, certain "would not believe though one arose from the dead," to admonish them—for there are some who must feel before they will reason.

In making these general remarks we do not wish to be understood as in any manner interfering with what are called "southern interests." We wish the south to take the lead in this matter, feeling willing to follow in any reasonable plan that may be devised, to protect and secure the safety of our brethren; and, on that account, heartily approve of the late orders for the removal of certain companies of the army of the United States southward—PROTECTION being a paramount duty in the general government, whether applied to the persons or property of the republic.

ADVERTISEMENTS. The lower part of the state of Delaware and the adjacent parts of the Eastern shore of Maryland, have been much agitated by apprehensions of a servile insurrection, and a good many persons of color were arrested—many expresses sent off for arms and men, and awful reports were heaped upon one another by fear! There does not appear to have been the least foundation for this excitement—but the ease with which it was worked up shews a most unhappy state of society. The manufacturers of news killed one whole family—who, it seems, were amazed at finding themselves dead—in the papers.

*As a case in point we shall mention the following. A young and industrious mechanic, with his wife, not long since proceeded to a small town in the south, with the hope of bettering his condition. His wife, a good looking and thrifty young woman, agreeably to her domestic habits, took her bucket to the pump or well for water. It was observed, and she was told that she must not do so—it was a business only fitting for negroes; but she had no servant, nor did she think that the condition of her husband justified her in employing another to do what she could do herself; but, to make a long story short, the result was—that certain ladies, jealous of the honor of their sex and color, so arranged this important matter, that the water she needed was always brought into her house by a slave, and the exposure of her person, as a working woman, thus avoided! This is a plain representation of an event which really happened. It is worth a volume of speculation.

MORE OF IT. A plot has been discovered among the slaves of the island of Tortola, to fire the town and make an indiscriminate slaughter of all the white inhabitants. A want of concert among themselves seems have caused a disclosure of their terrible project. Relief had been sent from St. Thomas, though Tortola is a British island.

PENNSYLVANIA. The election in Philadelphia city and county has resulted in the success of what is called the "Democratic ticket" by a considerable majority. There is some new division or organization of parties that we do not understand. The Democratic ticket in the city is headed by Joseph Hemphill, and prevailed by a majority of about 1,000 votes, and a large majority for the "Jackson and Wolf" ticket was obtained in the county; on the result of which the "American Sentinel," late "official," claims a splendid victory over the "Inquirer," which is the present "official," and, besides, there were working men's tickets.

DELAWARE. The late election in this state has resulted as usual, except with an increased majority of votes in favor of the "National Republican" party.

JUDOR MARSHALL. Many marks of kindness and respect have been extended to the venerable chief justice of the United States since he arrived at Philadelphia, of some of which we shall preserve an account in humble tribute to his worth. When he visited the "Free Trade convention," the delegates rose en masse to receive him—multifaceted, anti-25th-section-men, and all!

MR. RANDELPH. The minister extraordinary, JONAS RANDELPH, who was sent with a roving commission to St. Petersburg, has returned in the Island. As he has not been near his post since the cholera has prevailed in Russia, he will not, we presume, be subjected to quarantine.

[N. Y. American.]

MR. WIRT. The newspapers teem with speculations and remarks on the nomination of this gentleman for the presidency, by the "National Anti-Masonic convention," which lately met in Baltimore; and we have thought that, if room could be allowed, much amusement, and some instruction, might be afforded in presenting a fair selection of the various and conflicting views offered to the public consideration; but we fear to open our pages to discussions of such illimitable extent as this subject promises. We were surprised at the nomination of Mr. Wirt—at his acceptance of the nomination—at the manner and matter of that acceptance, and more especially at its ratification by the convention. We have a high personal respect for Mr. Wirt—but do not think that his opinions concerning internal improvements and domestic industry are exactly those entertained by the friends of the "American System"—we see, however, that, in that great manufactory of "democrats" and "federalists"—the "Albany Argus," (the head of which, as we long since heard, was once crowned with a "black-cockade"), he has been called an "old school federalist," and "in Virginia was arranged against the democracy in those days when JEFFERSON was at the head of the republican party." Now, if this be a sin, Mr. Wirt, surely, is one of the last men that will have to account for it! He was intimate in the family of Mr. Jefferson, in youthful life—and no one surpassed him in the private and public esteem which he entertained for the character and services of the author of the declaration of independence. If the term may be used without disrespect to Mr. Wirt—he was one of Mr. Jefferson's "favorite pets," because of his early development of talent, and ardent devotion to the "democracy of those days,"—which he powerfully defended by speaking and writing, being eminent in both.

"BALANCE OF TRADE." We made a few remarks about money in our last paper. We much fear the statement is true, that the revenue from importations will amount to 30 millions for the present year. This amount of revenue, because of the quantity of free articles, must represent a consumption, (or in other words, an excess of importations of foreign goods over the exportations of them), of at least 100 millions of dollars—the value of the domestic articles exported last year was only 59 millions, and if the profits on labor, subsistence and capital employed in navigation, be added—the aggregate value cannot have exceeded 70 millions; so that, if the exports of the present year shall not be greater than the last, there will be a general deficiency of 30 millions—and how shall that mighty sum be settled? In part, by losses on forced sales of goods, because of their surplus quantity—in part by bankruptcies, and the remainder in coin.

WOOL. We mentioned in our last, that the price of American wool ranged from 50 to 70 cents per lb. but have since observed that the quotations in Baltimore, (which, however, is not a great wool market) are from 35 to 58—the quality, perhaps, being generally inferior to the product of the more northern states. From the large quantities that we see advertised, a further decline in price must be expected. The speculations which we spoke of last spring, have had the re-action which every prudent man, (out of the vortex of their operation), plainly foresaw must take place—and this has been aided by heavy importations, notwithstanding the efficient duty on wool. Such things are always injurious. But we hope that the wool-growers, generally, thought as we did, and realized the highest price for their crops, by early sales. To assist the further reduction in price, money has become "scarce"—and no small proportion of the excessive quantity of British woollens recently imported must be "hammered-off at auction," to "raise the wind," and pay British debts. The price of foreign and domestic cloths has much declined.

ANCIENT PRICES IN ENGLAND. In the year 1352, 25th Edward III, wages paid to haymakers was 1d. per day; a mower of meadows 3d. a day, or 5d. an acre; reapers of corn in the first week of August, 2d. in the second, 3d. per day, and so on till the end of August, without meat, drink, or other allowance, finding their own tools; for threshing a quarter of wheat or rye, 2½d.; a quarter of barley, beans, peas or oats, 1½d.; a master carpenter 3d. a day; other carpenters 2d.; a master mason 4d. per day; other masons 3d. and their servants 1½d. per day; tilers 3d. and their "knives" 1½d.; thatchers 3d. per day, and their knives 1½d.; plasterers, and other workers of mud walls, and their knives in like manner, without meat or drink, and this from Easter to Michaelmas; and from that time less, according to the direction of the justices.

In Wilkins's Leges Saxon, as quoted by Dr. Henry, we have prices of various articles in England in the reign of Ethelred, about the year 997, which the learned doctor has calculated with great correctness in money of the present time.

Price of a man or slave	£2 16 3 sterling.
a horse	1 15 2
a mare or colt	1 3 5
an ass or mule	0 14 1
an ox	0 7 0½
a cow	0 6 2
a swine	0 1 10½
a goat	0 0 4½

We think it will be agreed, if such were the present prices of men and other property, or of labor, in England, the people of the United States could not endure a "free trade" with England, seeing that negro-slaves are worth from 70 to 100d. sterling each, and a day's labor, with us, cannot be put down at less than 3s. The principle holds good, ~~that the difference is reduced, not less than~~ a million of PAUPERS are turned out in England, for a sufficient supply of the coarsest food. Shall the free-laborers of the United States be brought into competition with them? Our "free traders" say so—but the English "free traders" will not admit the principle, in respect to bread. We have plenty of land—England prohibits our flour and grain; England has plenty of labor, and grows its about our restrictions, because we do not freely admit its productions! How vast is the difference between mine and thine! If England had the climate and the land to grow COTTON—a "free trader" would be as scarce in South Carolina as a knee buckle ever was in the highlands of Scotland.

"WORKING MEN." The celebrated company of volunteers, which marched from Baltimore and served in Canada in the late war, had 110 rank and file—and the whole company, two excepted, were mechanics—men who stand dishonored because they labor, in some parts of the country, though always among the first called upon to defend the soil.

"FREE TRADE!" The Greenville S. C. Mountaineer states, that a great number of horses have been driven through that place this season; and that on one day there were twelve hundred horses and mules from Kentucky and Tennessee in that village. The editor marvels how so many can be disposed of in that state these hard times, and conjectures that some of those so greatly opposed to buying Kentucky cattle three years since, have relaxed a little.

EXPORTS FROM CHARLESTON for the year ending Oct. 1, 1831—

Sea island cotton—bales	20,317
Upland	184,981
	205,298
Same time 1830—
Sea island	17,463
Upland	192,304
	209,767

Less in the latter year 4,469 bales.

If the value of foreign export shows the wealth of a country or state, South Carolina, with all her complaints about hard times, is one of the richest countries or states in the world, regard being had to the number of her citizens.

RAIL ROADS. The Albany Argus contains notices of intended applications to the legislature of the state of New York at the session of the ensuing winter, for rail roads, the aggregate capitals of which amount to twenty-two millions of dollars. All of these projects are for roads between Albany and Buffalo—two of them to run through: the third, from Buffalo to the Cayuga lake, and the fourth, from Utica to the Cayuga lake.

WASHINGTON. The corporation of this city has purchased the uncompleted canal, and resolved to finish it on an enlarged and improved scale. It will form a continuation of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, be 150 feet wide and 8 feet deep, and terminate on the Eastern Branch, an excellent harbor, and well fitted to all the purposes of an extensive navigation. By means of this canal, the Potomac, as it were, will pass through the city, and vessels of considerable burthen discharge their cargoes at the stores on the streets. Such a work, independent of its connexion with the great canal, must add much to the business and wealth of the growing metropolis of the union—which, in spite of various adverse circumstances, is rapidly increasing in population—and, because of its beautiful and advantageous location, abundant supply of pure water and general healthiness, must proceed in improvement, and become a great city—the depot of a large interior and exterior trade, and grow in means with the growth of our country, united and prosperous—and abound with industrious and thrifty men, profitably employed in supplying their own mutual wants, and those of the vast number of strangers which resort to the seat of the national government.

We never visit this city without seeing some new thing that pleases—but have for some years thought that we observed a change in the habits of the people, themselves, which was most agreeable, in an increased attention to their several branches of business. A numerous and powerful body of producers are growing up—the mechanic arts flourish, and the manufacturing are beginning to follow, with a market at hand for the various fruits of their industry. These two chiefly make up the wealth of cities, commerce being the "hand-maid" of both.

TROUBLE A-HEAD! The following is from the honorable Isaac Hill's "New Hampshire Patriot," and has reference to major Mordecai Manasseh Noah's paper, the "New York Courier and Enquirer." The U. S. senator-editor and the U. S. surveyor-editor will probably go to war—

"We regret to see the predictions of the New York Standard every day verified, in regard to the transfer of interest in a prominent democratic newspaper establishment, and the consequent change of conduct in regard to the U. S. bank."

MAIL ROBBERY. A certain Henry Johnson, employed to carry the mail from New York to Elizabethtown, N. J. has been arrested for robbing it. It is supposed that he had utilized about 3,000 dollars of other persons' money.

"THE SUBLINE AND BEAUTIFUL." From the Washington Globe. "Adams can't raise a leg since he was distanced—Clay is already broken down in Kentucky, which ends his efforts east and west. Calhoun has run through the girth, and McLean cannot venture on a race in which all the rest have been thrown out."

BISHOP OF OHIO. Bishop Chase of the P. E. church having resigned the bishopric of Ohio, the rev. Mr. Melville, of New York, lately of Georgetown, Col. has been elected in his place, and also to become, ex officio, president of Kenyon college—some difference about the management of which appears to have caused the resignation of Dr. Chase. Mr. Melville is very highly spoken of as a learned, pious and liberal gentleman.

LIBERIA. The following account of the difficulties and loss of life that attended the settlement of Virginia, has been published to shew the greater comparative progress that has been made in building up the colony in Africa—which latter may now be regarded as being established, if a moderate degree of protection and care shall be extended towards it. Let the healthiness of its location be settled—and the desire of emigration to it will far exceed the means furnished to gratify it.

Origin of the ancient dominion. The first attempt to plant a colony in the United States was made under the auspices of sir Walter Raleigh, to whom queen Elizabeth had granted a charter for that purpose. The first party consisting of a hundred and ten persons, landed on the island of Roanoke in 1585. They were found by sir Francis Drake in the following year, reduced to the lowest state of distress, and by him, at their request, carried back to England. In 1587, Raleigh sent out a great number of colonists, and when in 1590, three ships were sent out, not a vestige of them was to be found. Raleigh, after expending £40,000, abandoned the enterprise in despair. Whether the colonists were murdered, or incorporated with the savages, has never been known.

Under the auspices of an association to colonize America, on the 13th of May, 1607, one hundred and five men were settled at Jamestown. Before the month of September, fifty of the company were buried. They were soon reduced to thirty-eight persons, determined to abandon a country so unfavorable to human life. Soon, however, one hundred and fifty persons arrived under captain Newport, and the number of the colony was soon reduced to sixty persons, and were actually taken on board his squadron, and set sail for England, when they were met by lord Delaware, who persuaded them to return.

In the year 1624, after more than 150,000 had been expended, and more than 9,000 persons had been sent from England, its population did not exceed 1,300 persons.

{Compare the above with the condition already attained by our African colony, and the materials of which it has been formed, and it must be admitted that the progress and prospects of the latter are eminently encouraging.

THE SHEARING OF THE FLOCK. We find the following in a London paper—"The right rev. William Knox, lord bishop of Derry, is dead; it is the richest see in the world, and the right of appointing to it devolves on the crown, or on lord Grey. To this bishop, belongs 96,000 acres of land, and the right of appointing to 52 parishes, varying in value from £300 to £2,000 per annum. The annual rent of the see is not less than £25,000. It is a principality in point of wealth, power and influence. The London Morning Post, foretells that lord Grey will give it either to hon. Richard Ponsonby, his brother-in-law, or to Dr. Grey, dean of Hereford, his brother."

The prognostic of the London Post is confirmed. By late advices in the London papers, we perceive that earl Grey, the whig premier, has given the see to his brother, the dean.

"He that provideth not for his own family, is worse than an infidel," in this season of "reform"—the practice of Washington to the contrary, (in respect to such proceedings), notwithstanding. For six or seven of a family, to fatten at the public crib, is nothing uncommon—now o'days. The "shearing of the flock" by the bishop of Derry—one man, is many times more valuable than all the trumpeted charities bestowed on the starving population of Ireland. We trust that the end of all such operations is nigh.]

INDIAN AFFAIRS. The Tuscaloosa Intelligencer says, that "G. S. Gaines, of Demopolis, has been appointed special agent of the war department, to superintend the collection of the emigrating Choctaws, and their removal and subsistence as far as the west bank of the Mississippi river, from whence captain Clarke of the United States army, who has in readiness a number of wagons and teams for the purpose, will convey them to their new country west of the territory of Arkansas. The government, it is said has offered a bounty in money of ten dollars per head, for each man, woman and child, who may prefer to go in their own way, without further aid from the government, than ferrisages and provisions when passing depots, payable after their arriving in the new country. It is believed that most of those who possess the means of removing themselves, will embrace this offer."

The last Milledgeville Journal contains a correspondence between gov. Gilmer and Mr. Cass, the secretary of war, from which it appears that the president has appointed Mr. Curry as U. S. agent, for opening an enrolment register for such Cherokees within the chartered limits of Georgia, as may be disposed to emigrate beyond the Mississippi. The measure is to be pressed with as much alacrity as possible.

THE AMERICANS. We remark in Kotzebue's "New Voyage around the World"—a jejune book on the whole—the following passage—

"Between Falkland islands and the west of Patagonia, we sailed within speaking distance of a North American whaler. The dirty ship, and the crew smeared with blubber, had, indeed, a disgusting appearance; but if we consider to what toils and dangers these men are exposed during their voyages, which commonly last several years, in the most tempestuous seas, sometimes sailing about for months without seeing a fish, and suffering in the meanwhile from the want of wholesome food, yet pursuing their object with invincible perseverance, it is impossible to deny them compassion, and even commendation. The North Americans display an industry and perseverance in their commercial undertakings, which is not exceeded even by the English; they are to be met with upon every sea, and in the most unrequited regions, disdaining nothing, however trivial, from which they can derive profit."

In his second volume, captain Kotzebue observes—"The North Americans are such clever sailors, that even when drunk they are capable of managing a ship"—an ambidextrous compliment.

Mrs. MARY THOMPSON, sister of the famous CHARLES THOMPSON, secretary of the revolutionary congress, died at the house of her nephew, John Thompson, esq. at Newark, Delaware, on the 20th ult. aged 93 years. There were five brothers and one sister of this family—the youngest died at 79, the oldest, Charles, at 95—the sum of their ages being 531 years, or an average of 88½ years.

A Miss CLIFTON, educated at Emmitsburg, Maryland, and only 17 years old, has burst upon the play-going public of New York, (and they are, or at least ought to be, good judges of theatrical excellence) like a meteor, in the highest walks of tragedy. Her performance of the strong and difficult part of Lady Macbeth, is loudly and earnestly applauded.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. G. A. Montmain, to be surveyor and inspector of the revenue for the port of Bayou, St. John, in the state of Louisiana, vice Levesque, resigned.

John Smith, to be surveyor and inspector of the revenue for the port of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, vice James W. Moss, resigned.

Joseph B. Lancaster, to be collector of the customs for the district of St. Johns, and inspector of the revenue for the port of Jacksonville, in the territory of Florida, vice James Bell, deceased.

Joel M. Smith, to be surveyor and inspector of the revenue for the port of Nashville, in the state of Tennessee, vice Basil Shaw, resigned.

Samuel Gwin, to be register of the land office, for the district of lands subject to sale at Mount Salus, in the state of Mississippi, vice Stockly D. Hays, deceased.

Ogden D. Longstaff, to be collector of the customs for the district of Teche, and inspector of the revenue for the port of Franklin in the state of Louisiana, vice Donelson Caffery, resigned.

{We have not seen it officially stated that Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, has been appointed minister to Russia, in place of the late "wandering" Randolph—but the "official paper," the "Globe," gives an account of a visit of the mail contractors at Washington to the president, and says that "the hon. James Buchanan, recently appointed minister to Russia," marched in the procession of contractors.}

THE ENGLISH REFORM BILL has been so much embarrassed and loaded by various combinations of interests, that great fear is entertained of its ultimate passage—and, with its failure, many sober-minded men look for a terrible convulsion—the present state of privation seeming only borne by the poorer classes of the people in the hope of better times. With the loss of that bill, hope will bid England farewell, except in an appeal to force. This would appear to be a general opinion—and Earl Gray has become unpopular, (and most justly, if the fact stated is true), because that he has already put members of his family into different places worth not less than one hundred thousand pounds a year—say half a million of dollars.

BRITISH COLONIES. Documents laid before parliament. From the very voluminous and valuable papers prepared by Mr. Hume for his motion to give representatives to the colonies, we have the following information:—The British colonies amount in number to thirty-seven, exclusive of the British possessions in India. Of these there have been captured eleven, ceded four, obtained by settlement nineteen. The population of these colonies is, in North America, 911,229; British Guiana and the West Indies, whites, 40,485, free colored people, 60,863, slaves, 694,530—total, 836,527; crown colonies, whites, 238,388, free colored people, 977,407, slaves, including, of course, convicts, 146,892—total 1,322,409. The imports from the whole in 1829, in official value, were, £11,508,943; official value of exports, £10,777,244. Ships inwards, 2,798, tonnage, 755,375; ships outwards, 2,977, tonnage, 1,067,243. These are important data whereby to estimate the value of our colonies. [London paper.]

THE CHOLERA. A letter dated St. Petersburg Aug. 2, says,—"The sickness at St. Petersburg, I am happy to say, was very much better yesterday than ever. There were but 40 or 60 cases, and we think in a few days it will cease entirely."

ANNIVERSARY OF THE "THREE DAYS." As every thing relating to the "good Lafayette" is interesting to Americans, we translate the following from the Paris National:

"The common opinion was that general LAFAYETTE, on such a day (July 27th) would occupy a place corresponding to the conspicuous part he had in our glorious revolution; but this expectation proved erroneous, as the general contented himself with joining his colleagues, who attended the ceremony in large numbers.

"The general, who in entering the pantheon, had been received with shouts of "vive Lafayette," was, on his return, again the object of the same joyous exclamations.

"National guards, students, workmen, all hastened around his carriage, which would have been drawn by the people, the horses having been taken out instantaneously, had not the general's most earnest entreaties caused the latter to be replaced. A multitude of citizens of every age and condition formed the cortege of the illustrious veteran, and accompanied him to his dwelling, every one anxious to see him—to hear his voice—to shake hands with him.

"In passing the artillery of the national guard, a salute was fired. The general appeared to be profoundly touched by the unequivocal testimony of affection of which he was continuously the object, and all his expressions bore evidently the marks of his deep emotions. The utmost order prevailed throughout the day."

COMMERCE. We have received from our correspondent at Washington, the report of the secretary of the treasury, relative to the commerce and navigation of the United States during the year ending 30th Sept. 1830. The imports during the year amounted to $70,876,920: of which, $66,035,739 were imported in American vessels, and 4,841,181 in foreign. The exports amounted to $73,849,503; of which, $59,463,029 were of domestic, and $14,387,479 of foreign articles: of the domestic articles, $51,106,189 were exported in American vessels, and $8,355,840 in foreign vessels; of the foreign articles, $12,776,529 were exported in American vessels, and $1,610,950 in foreign vessels; 967,227 tons of American shipping entered, and 971,760 cleared from the ports of the United States; 151,900 tons of foreign shipping entered, and 133,436 tons cleared, during the same period.

The registered tonnage, as corrected at the register's office, for the 31st December, 1829, is stated at 650,142; the enrolled and licensed tonnage at 508,858, and the fishing vessels at 100,796. There were employed in the whole fishery 57,284. Total 1,360,797.

CHECKS—of the offices of the bank of the United States. The greater part of what are called five and ten dollar notes of this bank, are really only checks drawn by the offices of the several branches on the parent bank. The following is from the "Baltimore Republican."

We mentioned sometime since, that a question had been raised in the state courts of Ohio, as to the legality of the issues of five and ten dollar notes, drawn by the branches of the bank of the U. States upon the bank at Philadelphia.

A person named Cunningham was tried "for having in possession certain counterfeit notes, purporting to be notes of the president, directors and company of the U. States bank—knowing the same to be forged and with intent to utter." The counsel for the prisoner contended that the indictment ought to be quashed, inasmuch as the document produced in evidence was not a note purporting to be of the United States bank, but a mere check, drawn by the president of the branch bank at Louisville, countersigned by the cashier—upon the principal cashier of the bank residing in Philadelphia. It was agreed, however, that the case should be referred to the jury, and the man was convicted. His counsel then gave notice that they would move for arrest of judgment—and the case lay over till the 28th ult. when, as we learn, by a letter published in the Globe, the motion was made, and the point argued, and it was decided by the court that the indictment had not been sustained, and the prisoner was liberated.

The arguments used were, that the bank had not legal authority for putting into circulation as bank notes, those checks—that no note under one hundred dollars could be legally made payable to order—that the bank had at two different sessions of congress made application for authority to appoint two additional officers to sign notes, as the president and cashier could not sign a sufficient number of notes for the currency of the country—that the request was relined on the ground, that by multiplying the signers of notes, facilities would be given to forgeries—that notwithstanding congress had refused to allow two additional signers, yet the bank had increased the number to twenty-five—by the presidents of the twenty-four branches being authorized by the directors to sign notes—that this was an illegal stretch of power, unauthorized by the charter, or any other law—and finally, that there is no law of the state of Ohio for punishing any one for having forged checks in possession.

The decision is of considerable importance to the bank and the public.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Liverpool dates have been received at New York on the 2nd of Sept. inclusive. The French premier M. Perier, had submitted to the chamber of deputies, a project of a law abolishing hereditary prerogative, and making it eligible for the chambers, by two successive acts of legislation, to renew it. He asks for an increase of the army of France to 500,000 men, which involves the imposition of more taxes. The French army has commenced its return from Belgium.

The reform bill is still pending in the British parliament, and it is estimated that it will take three months to get through its remaining 40 clauses, at the rate at which it proceeds. There is a rumor that the king of Belgium had made a requisition on the king of the French to let 12,000 of his army remain in that country. This Earl Grey declared could not be permitted. The Poles, if report be true, (but for the love of liberty we feel disposed to doubt it), are in a most perilous situation. The reports are, that Warsaw had been in the hands of the mob; that the command of the army had been taken from the brave Schryznicki; that many persons had been hung up at the lamp posts by order of certain jacobin clubs; that prisoners were murdered in the jails; that anarchy, confusion and distrust, were the order of the day; and in the midst of all these untoward circumstances, the Polish army had retreated before the Russians, who had advanced within five miles of Warsaw. These rumors are supposed to be greatly exaggerated, if not without foundation; we, however, fear the fate of the Poles, as the induction of France had failed. It is again rumored that the emperor of Russia was ill. The cholera morbus raged in many parts of Russia and Poland.

Austria it was said had again determined to invade Italy to suppress the spirit of disaffection, and that France would not interfere. Greece was about to issue a paper currency—her situation is truly unenviable.

A difference had arisen between the officers of the Kensington frigate, built in this country, and those of a British man of war, on a matter of etiquette. A message had passed, but had not been answered; and the Americans, on a second consideration, offered to withdraw it; but their letter had in the meantime been handed over to the admiralty.

Imprisonment, outrage, and tyranny, still proceeds in Portugal.

NAVAL REGISTER—OFFICIAL.

FREE TRADE CONVENTION.

Thursday, Oct. 6. After the usual routine of opening the business of the day was gone through,

Mr. Peindexter, of Mississippi, presented a partial report from the general committee, containing a resolution that it be recommended to this body to appoint a committee of six to meet a convention which is to be held at New York on the twenty-sixth instant, for the purposes of conference and conciliation.

Ordered to be laid on the table.

In consequence of the printed copies of the report of the committee not being ready for delivery to the members of the convention, an adjournment took place till one o'clock.

On the chair being resumed, the president announced that a communication had been received, signed by Mr. Sarchet, in reply to the communication which was yesterday received from Mr. Ronaldson, which he would cause to be read to the house.

The document stated that, in the time mentioned by Mr. Ron Idson, during which a considerable diminution had taken place in iron in the United States, a much greater fall had taken place in foreign markets. In Great Britain the price was reduced one half, whilst in this country the reduction did not much exceed seven and a half per cent. He contended, therefore, that a specific duty, instead of diminishing the price of the article, had actually operated against a diminution of price.

Along with the communication he sent some specimens of English and American cast-iron the English being of a superior quality, and the price lower.

It was moved that this communication be printed.

An amendment was proposed, that the communication of Mr. Ronaldson, and that of Mr. Sarchet be printed together.

This was opposed, upon the ground that if the convention commenced the printing of documents of that description, it was not known to what extent their printing might be extended.

Motion negatived.

It was stated that some difficulty had arisen in the printing of the report of the committee. The printers of newspapers not being willing to undertake it, another printer was to be sought out.

A gentleman from Georgia, observed, that if the report were printed and delivered at the time, gentlemen would not have time to read it and consider its import so as to go into debate upon its contents. But, as the copies had not yet arrived, he thought it advisable for the house to take a recess till five o'clock, by which time the report would, in all probability be ready, and moved accordingly.

An amendment was moved, that the adjournment be till four o'clock, and another gentleman proposed ten to-morrow.

A conversation here ensued upon a point of form. The president stated, that it was irregular to move for an adjournment to any particular time; the motion to adjourn till ten to-morrow could only be taken as a motion to adjourn, which motion took precedence of any other. The convention had not fixed any stated hour at which to commence its sittings from day to day, and therefore, in putting the question the chair had said to resume at ten to-morrow. It was desirable that the convention should have a stated time for its regular sittings.

A motion was accordingly put and carried, that the convention, in adjourning from day to day, should resume at ten in the morning.

The motion to adjourn was negatived.

The motion for a recess till four o'clock was then put and negatived.

A gentleman from Alabama moved that the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole convention, to consider the report clause by clause.

Mr. Pointdexter objected, upon the ground that gentlemen were not prepared. No copies of the report had yet arrived, and gentlemen really ought not only to be furnished with the report, but be allowed time to read it and reflect upon it.

The gentlemen from Alabama, after some remarks upon time being lost through procrastinations arising from different causes, renewed his resolution that the house resolve itself into a committee, which was carried.

The president then appointed Mr. Scdwick, of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, but that gentleman not being present, Mr. Banks, of Virginia, was appointed, and took the chair accordingly.

In the course of the proceedings, a few printed copies of the report of the committee were brought in, and distributed amongst the members of the convention.

Mr. Pointdexter was confident that no progress would be made by proceeding to business immediately. Very few gentlemen had yet received copies of the report, and in discussing it clause by clause, so unfurnished, they would be subjected to much inconvenience. He was confident that time would be saved by postponing the consideration of the report, till gentlemen were better prepared. He moved therefore, that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion being negatived, the chairman commenced the reading of the report, and had proceeded for some minutes, when

Judge Berrien entered the hall. He said, when the order was given to print the report, his idea was, and it coincided with the opinions of other gentlemen, with whom he had conferred on the subject, that the intention of having it printed was, to give gentlemen who had only heard it once read, an opportunity of reading it, and of reflecting upon what it contained. He had been employed in superintending the printing and reading the proof sheet; he was aware that a small number only had been handed in to the convention, and he was surprised, upon his return, to find the house resolved into a committee, and engaged in discussing the report, clause by clause. Gentlemen ought to have time to read the report, to take it with them, and examine it in their closets. He brought the meeting to postpone the consideration until gentlemen had an opportunity of being better prepared. By going too hastily into it, erroneous opinions might be taken up, and lead to disastrous results. For his own part, he could scarcely trust himself in the discussion, in the present state of his feelings, with respect to the questions involved, unless the convention were better prepared, than in his opinion they could be, under the circumstances. He concluded by renewing the former motion to adjourn, &c. which resolution was carried.

The president having resumed the chair, Mr. Banks, chairman of the committee, moved for leave for the committee to sit again; which motion being carried, the house adjourned at two o'clock.

The following is the paper read by Mr. Berrien, from the federative committee to the free trade convention:

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A portion of your fellow citizens, resident in different states of the union, who are numerous, respectable and intelligent, who like yourselves, are attached to the principles of free government, and ardently devoted to the great constitutional charter, which consecrates and upholds them—who ask only an equal participation in the benefits, and are ready to bear an equal share of the burthens of the government—who are willing, moreover, to concede to others a perfect right to the full enjoyment of whatever they ask for themselves; such a portion of your fellow citizens, whose condition, character, motives and views are thus faithfully delineated, have deputed us to represent them on an occasion deeply interesting to their feelings as men, and vitally important to their interests as citizens of this great confederated republic. They have called upon us to unite our counsels for the redress of the grievances under which they labour; and have enjoined it upon us, as a duty, to omit no means for the accomplishment of this object, which may consist with our obligations as citizens, and with their own faithful and ardent devotion to the bond of our common union. In the performance of a duty like this we cannot be insensible to the propriety of a frank and respectful communication with our fellow citizens at large. We are members of the same great political family. Our interests are common, and so also are our duties; and it cannot be that any portion of our brethren can desire to withhold from us our just share of the benefits, or to subject us to an undue proportion of the burthens, which flow from the government under which we live. We have equal confidence in their justice and intelligence; and assure ourselves that it is only necessary to bring home to their understandings the conviction of the evils under which we suffer, to secure their cordial co-operation in prompt and effectual measures for their removal. We would commune with you, then, in the spirit of these feelings. We must speak with frankness. It may be that our language will borrow strength from the conviction of our wrongs, but we will not forget the just respect which is due to those who differ from us in opinion, and cannot be unmindful of the affection which we bear, and which we earnestly desire to cherish towards our brethren throughout the union.

The representatives of portions of our fellow citizens, belonging to different states of this confederacy, have assembled in the city of Philadelphia, to consider the grievances which they suffer under the existing tariff of duties, and to devise, if happily they may do so, some constitutional and peaceful mode of redress. Speaking generally, they have come together as strangers to each other, with all the variety of opinions on most subjects, which spring from different habits and pursuits, and is perhaps inevitably incident to the imperfection of our common nature. On one engrossing question, that which constitutes the subject of this address, looking as well to its principles as its details, they have found a concurrence of opinion, which, as they believe, entitles them to ask for that opinion, and for the reasons on which it is founded, the attentive and dispassionate consideration of the American people.

Among the evils which flow from the tariff system, as at present established by law, the widest and determined opposition to that system, which exists in various parts of the union,—the deep and settled discontent which is felt, and has been manifested by a numerous, patriotic, and intelligent portion of our fellow citizens,—cannot fail to awaken the liveliest solicitude of every lover of his country. Let it be remembered that this is no transient feeling—the offspring of momentary excitement—one which may be expected to pass away under the influence of a more calm and dispassionate reflection.

tion. No—the system of which we complain is not of recent origin, and the feeling of discontent, which was coeval with its institution, time and experience have only served to strengthen and increase. Let those who sincerely desire to perpetuate the political blessings which we enjoy, look to this consideration with the attention which it demands. This is emphatically a government of opinion. The vigor of the laws is a moral force. The bond which unites us is in the sense of our common interest—the conviction of our equal rights—the assurance of our capacity to assert, and the feeling that we actually enjoy them. Take from any considerable portion of the American people the consciousness that they are in the full possession of their rights as freemen; substitute for it the spirit of discontent, which springs from the conviction of wrongs inflicted, not inadvertently, but with deliberation, which are not temporary, but enduring; and you array against the government a force which is of like character with that which sustains it—you awaken a feeling of resentment, which is goaded into activity by a sense of oppression, and embittered by the recollection that it is the hand of a brother which inflicts it. Such is the feeling which pervades a numerous and respectable portion of the American people. It cannot be defied, and may not be disregarded, without putting to hazard the safety of the confederacy.

Do you doubt its existence, its nature, or degree? Look to the character of this assembly—to the circumstances under which it is convened. Give your attention to the history of the past, and be admonished of the novel and extraordinary spectacle which is presented to your view. Do not close your eyes to the fact, that this assembly is altogether without parallel since the foundation of the government—that we are freemen, and the representatives of freemen who speak to you of our violated rights—that we have come from different and distant parts of the union, to join in demanding their restoration—that a consciousness of strength is the offspring of united counsels—and that our purpose is not the less firm, because it is announced to you peacefully, and in the spirit of conciliation.

A numerous and respectable portion of the American people do not merely complain that this system is unjust, but they question the right to establish it. They do not doubt—they utterly deny—the constitutional power of congress to enact it. In justice to that body, we invite your candid attention to a brief consideration of the views on this subject. The constitutional validity or invalidity of an act of congress does not necessarily depend upon the question whether the judicial department of the government would affirm the one or the other of these propositions. It may be that an act will in its operation and effect be subversive of the principles of the constitution, and yet on its face be superior to all just exception on that ground. Laterally and in terms it may be in execution of an expressly granted power—in its operation and effect it may not only transcend that power, but may directly contravene it. Under the pretence of supplying a revenue, congress may raise money beyond the purposes to which it can be legitimately applied, or may increase the duties to an amount which will be prohibitory of importation, and consequently destructive of all revenue to be derived from that source. Still such an act would purport to be in the execution of the power to lay and collect taxes; and courts of justice judging of it by its terms, and by what is apparent on its face, would not affirm its invalidity. But the constitution is equally obligatory on every department of the government—on the legislature who enacts, as well as on the judge who interprets a law. If the former shall so veil his unlawful purpose as to defend it from the security of the latter, is it less a violation of his constitutional obligation? If it be such a violation, can it be constitutionally valid?

If instead of the absence of any express grant of power to protect manufacturers, the constitution had contained an express clause of inhibition, an act of congress, imposing duties beyond the purposes of revenue, and thereby operating as a bounty on the manufacturer, would, they insist, be admitted to be in violation of the constitution, and yet the repugnance would not be manifest upon its face, and would therefore elude the judicial power.

A numerous and intelligent portion of the American people believe that this view is applicable to the tariff of 1828. They admit the power of congress to lay and collect such duties as they may deem necessary for the purposes of revenue, and within these limits so to arrange those duties as incidentally, and to that extent, to give protection to the manufacturer. They deny the right to convert what they denominate the incidental into the principal power, and transending the limits of revenue to impose an additional duty substantially and exclusively for the purpose of affording that protection. They admit that congress may countervail the regulations of a foreign power which may be hostile to our commerce, but they deny their authority permanently to prohibit all importation for the purpose of securing the home market exclusively to the domestic manufacturer, thereby destroying the commerce they were entrusted to regulate, and fostering an interest with which they have no constitutional power to interfere. That portion of our fellow citizens of whom we speak, do not therefore hesitate to affirm, that if the right to enact the tariff law of 1828 be referred to the authority to lay and collect duties, &c. it is a palpable abuse of the taxing power, which was conferred for the purpose of revenue;—if to the authority to regulate commerce, it is as obvious a perversion of that power, since it may be extended to an utter annihilation of the objects which it was intended to protect. Waving however this discussion, we concur in the opinion, that if the aggrieved party is deprived of the protection which the judicial department might otherwise afford, it would strengthen his appeal to the American people to unite with him in correcting the evil by peaceable and constitutional means.

But there is a view of this subject which may claim the concurrence of all those who are prepared to admit that the tariff is unequal in its operation, oppressive and unjust. The constitution of the United States had its origin in a spirit of compromise. Its object is the security of those rights which are committed to its protection—its principle that of an equal participation in the benefits and in the burdens of the government. A system of taxation which is unequal in its operation, which oppresses the many for the benefit of the few, is therefore unjust, not merely with reference to the great and immutable principles of right which are applicable to human conduct, but is moreover in direct collision with that constitutional equality of right, which this instrument was thus confessedly intended to secure. A distinguished jurist of Massachusetts, one who is advantageously known as such to the people of the union, has said of the system of which we complain, that it is calculated "to destroy many of the great objects for which the constitution of the United States was originally framed and adopted." Who will affirm that such a system can consist with the spirit of the constitution? Its enactments may be so veiled as to elude the judicial power, and may therefore be obligatory upon the other departments of the government—but as between constituent and agent, between the people and their rulers, the charter will in such case have been violated, and it will belong to them to correct the evil. Why should we fear to enunciate this principle? Is it because of the danger of those interests which have grown up under the system? A just consideration of the subject will lead to a directly opposite result. If it be conceded that the system is oppressive, unequal and unjust, can those who profit by it deceive themselves with the expectation of its permanency? Is it prudent to close their eyes to the consequences, to which, sooner or later, this conviction must inevitably lead? Distinguished as this system is, by every characteristic which may define a tyranny the most odious, why should we, who are its victims, not stand upon our chartered rights?

As men and brethren we appeal to you then to unite your efforts with ours in the correction of this abuse. A system which is unequal in its operation, and therefore unjust—which is oppressive, because it burdens the many for the benefit of the few—grossly, fatally, unwise and impolitic, since it is subversive of the harmony of the union—which is in violation of the principles of free government, and utterly at variance with the spirit of justice and mutual concession in which the constitution was conceived and adopted; such a system, if persevered in, must alienate our affections from each other, engender discontents and animosities, and lead inevitably, and with a force which no human power can resist, to the most awful of all calamities. We entreat those who differ from us, seriously to ponder this view of the subject. We entreat them not to misunderstand us. We cannot be altered from the discharge of our duties to ourselves and our common country by the menace of consequences, and we are equally incapable of using its language to others. It is no men and brothers—in the spirit of an affection which is still warm and undiminished, that we would call their attention to those inevitable results, which neither they nor we will have the power to avert.

Examine the subject for a moment in its connexion with the principles of an enlightened political economy, and see if the considerations which are urged to sustain this system are not fallacious and delusive. The view must be necessarily brief—consisting of hints and suggestions rather than of an extended argument, or of minute details; but our object will be attained if these may serve to awaken a spirit of dispassionate inquiry.

We are the advocates of free trade. The argument which sustains it rests upon a proposition which may not be denied. It is the unquestionable right of every individual to apply his labor and capital in the mode which he may conceive best calculated to promote his own interest. It is the interest of the public that he should so apply it. He understands better than it can be understood by the government, what will conduce to his own benefit;—and since the majority of individuals will, if properly protected, be disposed to follow their interests, such an application of their industry and capital must produce in the result the greatest amount of public good. Let it be remembered, that the question relates exclusively to the application of capital. It cannot be generally by an act of legislation. The power of the government is limited to its transfer from one employment to another. It takes from some less favored interest, what it bestows on the one which it professes to protect. It is equally untrue that such a system gives greater employment to labor. Its operation is confined to the simple change of its application. Laws which protect by bounty any peculiar species of labor, cannot be said to encourage American industry—that is, directed to various objects. These laws favor only a single class; and since the bounty is not supplied by the government, but taken from the pocket of the individual, the protection which is given to one species of labor, is so given at the expense of every other. That course of legislation, which leaves American capital and labor to the unlettered discretion of those who possess the one and apply the other, can alone be denominated the "American System."

The interference of government, with the right of the individual to apply his labor and capital in such mode as he may think most conducive to his own interest, thus necessarily operates to diminish the aggregate amount of production. In other words, the amount of the necessities and conveniences of life which are enjoyed by the community is necessarily diminished. If all nations then were willing to adopt the system of free trade for which we contend, which is accords to the spirit of Christianity and calculated to unite nations in harmony and peace, it cannot be doubted that the interest of each would be promoted. The only question which can be raised on this part of the subject is, whether the adoption of a restrictive policy by one or more nations makes it the interest of others to reciprocate those restrictions. The answer seems to be sufficiently obvious and satisfactory. The proposition which asserts the superior advantages of a free trade among all nations, rests upon the following principle. The universal freedom of action which it allows, tends most thoroughly to develop the moral and physical energies of each nation, and to apply them to those objects to which they are best adapted. The proposition must be equally true in relation to each nation, whatever may be the policy adopted by others. The nation which resorts to a restrictive policy, legislates to her own disadvantage by interfering with the natural and most profitable employment of capital. To the extent to which she thus excludes another nation from an accustomed or from a desirable market, she occasions, it is true, in that nation also a displacement of capital from its natural channels. But can the remedy consist in a retaliatory system of legislation? in a system of further restrictions imposed by the latter nation? If it be true that a restrictive system is injurious to the nation imposing it, does it cease to be so in regard to the latter nation, because, of the wrong done by the former, and because it is also injurious to such action? When we apply these views to the corn laws of Great Britain, considered with reference to their effect upon us, it is not then obvious that a system or pretended retaliation, which entitles the productive energies of our own people, whatever may be its effect upon that nation, must necessarily increase the evils we ourselves are destined to sustain?

It is strongly urged as a motive to the continuance of the existing tariff, that its operation has been to effect a reduction of prices. These have, in fact, fallen since 1816, and our opponents contended that this has been the result of domestic competition. A moment's reflection will demonstrate the fallacy of this assertion. We present a single fact in the outset. The diminution of price has been general, as well in relation to articles which are not protected by the existing tariff of duties, as to those which are. It cannot therefore have arisen from this cause. Let us remember now that this diminution of price has occurred every where—abroad as well as at home—and not only in an equal, but as a necessary consequence of the tariff, in a greater degree there than here. Among the causes which have produced this result, two prominent ones are presented to your consideration—the diminished amount of the circulating medium of the world, and the astonishing improvements which have been introduced in the modes of production. The cost of production is less; the comparative value of money has become greater. Can we wonder at the result? Take the case of cotton goods—these have fallen in price here since the enactment of the tariff. But the same thing is true not only in an equal, but in a greater degree abroad—and the reason is obvious. The causes which have produced this result—those which have been before stated—have elsewhere been left to exert their full influence in effecting the reduction of price. Here their operation has been restrained by the conflicting influence of the tariff. The reduction therefore with us has necessarily stopped at a point, which is ascertained by adding the amount of duty to the price of the imported article. Thus the diminution of price here has not been produced by the tariff, but in despite of it—and has been retarded by it. But for this law the imported, which would take the place of the domestic article in the consumption of the country, would be obtained at a price greatly below that which we actually pay, and the difference, amounting yearly to many millions of dollars, would be saved to the community. It cannot be doubted that the prices of all commodities, the domestic production of which is forced by the imposition of a duty on a foreign article of similar description, are raised by the amount of duty necessary to effect the exclusion of the foreign article, or that it is increase of price is paid by the consumer, and that the loss to the nation which is occasioned by this system of protection, is nearly equal to such difference of price.

The success which has attended the manufacture of cottons, is used to illustrate and enforce another suggestion in favor of the tariff. It is said, that by means of the protection afforded by government, manufacturers are enabled to overcome the difficulties incident to new enterprises, and that this protection is ultimately repaid to the community, in the reduced price at which the article is furnished. We have already shown that this reduction in price in the case referred to, has not resulted from the protective system. Let us look, however, at this suggestion, apart from that consideration. If it be conceded for the purpose of the argument, and only for that purpose, that a manufacture might be established by a temporary encouragement from government, which would not otherwise, at least at that time, come into successful operation, and that the community might ultimately be repaid in the manner which is supposed, the following considerations seem decisively to repel the force of that suggestion. The idea of permanent protection is excluded by the nature of the proposition. That which is proposed is temporary merely, and the question whether it is to be ultimately repaid to the community, is of course made to depend on the successful operation of the protected establishment. It is Congress who are to determine in advance, upon the propriety of putting at hazard the interests of the community, by the forced establishment of the proposed manufacture. The question to be determined depends upon the calculation of probabilities, to the correct estimate of which, much practical information is obviously indispensable. Constituted as that body is, it is difficult to conceive of one less fitted for such reference. On the other hand, there is always enough of individual enterprise, intelligence and capital, to test any experiment which gives a fair promise of ultimate remuneration, notwithstanding it may be subject to temporary loss. Left to individual enterprise, the question would be decided by those who have every motive and every means to come to a just conclusion—while the proposed suggestion would throw upon Congress those visionary projectors, who having failed to obtain the support of discreet and intelligent capitalists, would play the sure game of securing profit, if, by the rarest accident, profit should arise, and of throwing the loss upon the community, if loss should ensue.

It is said that a dependence upon other nations, for those manufactures which are essential to our wants, is inconsistent with our character as a nation; and in this view that the tariff is essential to national independence. To us the term seems to be strangely misapplied. It is agreed that a system of free trade among all the nations of the world, by securing the application of the highest energies of each, to those objects which it was best qualified to produce, would enlarge the amount of production, and increase the sum of human comfort. But such a state of things would, according to the argument which is urged, be a state of universal dependence; and precisely the same consequence would follow in relation to the commercial intercourse of any given nation with the other nations of the world, to the extent of that intercourse, whether a system of free trade or of partial restrictions should prevail. That intercourse consists in the mutual interchange of commodities, and it is impossible to conceive the idea of a dependence on the one side, without recognising the fact of a corresponding dependence on the other. But such a state of mutual dependence is a source of gratulation rather than of regret, since it gives to each nation an increased facility for the development of its highest energies, enlarges the sum of its enjoyments, and affords the surest guarantee for the peace and harmony of the world.

If the suggestion be urged in its application to the necessities of our country during a state of war, an equally satisfactory answer may be given. It is unquestionably the duty of every government to be prepared for those conflicts with other nations, which it is not always possible to avoid; but this is most effectually done by the unrestricted exertion of its peaceful energies. In a government constituted as ours is and separated as it is by the Atlantic from the nations of the old world, it is reasonable to presume that such conflicts will be rare. The intervals of peace will probably be of much the longest duration, and our system of permanent policy should therefore be regulated chiefly with a view to this state of our national existence. But the decisive answer to this suggestion is, that money constitutes the sinews of war, and that its exigencies are best provided for by enriching the nation in time of peace. A system of free trade will mainly conduce to this object. The resources which it will furnish will second the services of the neutral trader, and these with our own internal manufactures, which are already independent of legislative protection, will amply supply our wants in such an emergency.

It is one and not the least of the evils of the system which we deprecate, that it has a tendency to demoralize our citizens, to habituate them to evasions of the laws, and to encourage the odious and detestable practice of smuggling. It is the effect of the protecting duty to raise the price of commodities considerably above that at which they could be imported at a moderate revenue duty. Unless this is so, it fails to accomplish its desti-ed object, and is entirely useless. The inevitable consequence is, the temptation to clandestine importation, and the facilities which are afforded by our widely extended inland and ocean frontier, give impunity to the smuggler.

On the several interests of agriculture, navigation, commerce, the mechanic arts, and even on manufactures themselves, this system operates with an injurious influence. Speaking with reference to that portion of agriculture, which is employed in the production of articles which must be exported to a foreign market, it is obvious that any considerable diminution of commercial capital, by its transfer to other employments, must have a tendency to diminish their price. It is in the southern portion of the union that this will be most extensively felt. The domestic market will consume a portion of its great staple, which is, comparatively, small, and the immense residue will seek in vain for a foreign market, if the manufactures of other nations are in effect, and permanently excluded from our ports. This state of things may not at once occur.

The necessity of having a supply of the raw material for the employment of her manufactures, may induce our great customer to submit, for a time, to a system of purchase instead of exchange; but she will be urged by the strongest considerations to seek that supply from those who will receive her manufactures in return. If this system be rendered permanent, and pushed to the prohibitory extent, to which it seems inevitably to lead, the fate of the cotton planter is therefore, irrevocably sealed. Nor is he alone effected by this system of protection. The farmer of the middle states will feel its influence in the increase of the price of labor, as well as of every article which he buys; and if those in the manufacturing districts should find an improved market for the produce of their farms, the considerations just stated, will operate to diminish their profits—and the benefits which they enjoy from the increased investment of capital in their vicinity, will be purchased at the expense of those interests from which that capital has been transferred.

When we direct our attention to the influences of the protecting system on the navigation of the country, we might give to the subject a peculiar interest, by dwelling on the fact, that a ship is the proudest and most successful of our manufactures. From an early period of our history down to the present hour, we have been conspicuous for our skill in ship building. Adverting to it as an art, we have by the elegance of our models, and the minuteness of our finish, raised it from a mechanical, to one of the fine arts. We have applied the principles of a correct taste to naval architecture, and have therefore produced the same masterly result in this, as the application of the same principles had produced in the other arts. We might then with perfect fairness and propriety, press the inconsistency of that policy, which seeks the prosperity of manufactures, by loading with burthens that branch of them which has flourished with but little aid, and is necessarily subject to exclusion from the jealousy of foreign nations. We might connect this topic with our navy, and our naval glory, and thus enlist in our behalf the sensibilities of patriotism. But we waive these advantages, and without entering into details, content ourselves with adverting to the positive discouragements to ship building, occasioned by the tariff of 1828. By that tariff, iron, hemp, fluck and cordage, are subjected to duties which would be in effect prohibitory, if these articles were not of the first necessity, and their importation indispensable. The quantity of these articles which enter into the construction of a ship, with the labor bestowed on them, constitute one half of its value, and the duties upon them impose upon a new ship of five hundred tons a dry direct tax little short of two thousand dollars, which is paid in advance. We say a dry, direct tax, for it is not, as in cases of consumable articles, repaid by the consumer. Neither is it repaid by the freighter, for the rate of freight depends on foreign competition, and the foreign ship, cheap, because unburthened, settles the price.

The effects of the protecting system upon commerce in general, can only be satisfactorily illustrated by details. It is an important task, and will be faithfully performed by those to whom it is confided. The diminution of imports—a total or partial scarcity of some articles—an increase of price to the consumer, a depression of the mercantile spirit which, under different circumstances, would be animated to new enterprises, and the consequent check to our attainment of that height of prosperity, to which the freedom of our institutions guides us, these are results which cannot be denied. That actual misery is not felt in a young and free country, where almost every citizen is or easily can be, a proprietor, is not an argument to deter us from the removal of those obstructions to that assured and unexampled ease and comfort of condition, to which the American citizen aspires and is entitled. If to the easy acquisition of good cheap land, he can likewise add, not only the necessities, but also the blameless luxuries of life, why should he be churlishly prevented by a sordid and monopolising system, which finds enjoyment in restriction, and profusion in prohibition?

Every class of manufactures which is not the object of the bounty of this system, as well as the mechanic arts generally, are injuriously affected by its operation—Nay, even those manufacturers, who experience this protection are themselves interested in the removal of these restrictions.—The enormity of the profits, in many instances, combined with the uncertainty of the continuance of the system, give to this employment the character of a gambling speculation, rather than that of a regular pursuit of industry. The high rate of profits would occasion a rush of capital from other pursuits, and competition would speedily reduce them to the general level, if the precarious tenure by which they are held did not restrain the movement.—Such of them as are adapted to the circumstances of the country, and conducted with the requisite skill and industry would continue to flourish although legislative protection were withdrawn. They would still give a fair return for the capital and labor which they employ. The rate of profits would indeed be less, but they would be certain, or liable only to those changes which are common to the whole productive industry of the country. It is with this view of the subject, that the best informed and most intelligent among the manufacturers themselves, cannot resist the conviction that the abandonment of the protecting system, and a return to moderate duties, would be best calculated to promote the steady growth, and the safe and permanent establishment of American manufactures.

There is a remaining suggestion which we desire to present to your consideration.—The national debt, which has annually absorbed from ten to twelve millions of revenue, is rapidly diminishing, and will speedily be extinguished. On the first day of January, 1833, the available funds of the government will be adequate to its discharge. The existing tariff of duties will produce thereafter an immense annual revenue, beyond the ordinary wants of the government, and the task of providing a system of measures which shall be adapted to this new and interesting condition of the fiscal concerns of the nation, will then devolve upon the next congress. How propitious the moment for the establishment of the principles of free trade! An enterprising and intelligent people, possessing in abundance the sources of national wealth, and perfectly unencumbered by debt, may add to their claims upon the gratitude of the world, for having successfully asserted the principles of free government, by being the first also to proclaim the principles of a free and unrestricted commerce—that genuine "American System," which will remove from our borders every vestige of discontent, give more value to the freedom, which was created from the grasp of oppression by the valor of our ancestors, and perpetuate those institutions which are destined, by the blessing of God, to secure the happiness of unborn millions.

Friday, October 7. The convention continued its deliberations. Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Cambreleng of New York, were invited within the bar of the convention.

The president announced the order of the day to be the report of the general committee.

Mr. Berrien said, there is, sir, I believe, a perfect accordance of opinion among the members of the convention as to one or two of the views presented in the address. On another part of it, there is diversity of opinion, which has reference not to the correctness or incorrectness of the arguments contained in the address, but as to the question of the expediency of inserting in the statement of the opinion held by a portion of the American people, and the principles on which it is founded.

The convention having agreed to go into committee of the whole, it is obvious that this diversity of opinion will open a wide field for discussion, and may tend to produce unpleasant results. Our desire is to produce harmony of opinion on the means of attaining our object.

There is no desire on my part to provoke unnecessary discussion. I presume that there is not a member of the convention who has not made up his mind with regard to the address. If the convention should adopt the motion which I propose to offer, out that part of it which may be objected to. I hope that the members will meet my suggestion in the amicable spirit with which it is tendered. I think that if my views should be adopted, we shall be able to agree upon instructions to the committee appointed to draw up a memorial which all the members of the convention will approve, and to bring our labors to a speedy termination. With these impressions, and in the spirit which I believe to prevail in the convention, I move that the committee of the whole be discharged from the consideration of the address.

Mr. Cheves approved of the sentiments expressed by Mr. Berrien, and hoped that the convention would set with harmony.

Mr. Gallatin concurred with Mr. Berrien. It must, he said, be taken for granted that all who approve of the tariff, believe it to be constitutional. It must be so thought however that those to who oppose it, think it unconstitutional. Every one has a right to give his own construction of the constitution. Of course there can be excitement of feeling caused by diversity of opinion. We must extend charity towards each other. On all questions there is a difference of opinion. Although I don't think the tariff unconstitutional, I must do full justice to the gentleman from Georgia, and other members of the convention, who differ from me in opinion. If there is a difference of opinion, it is to the construction of a certain article of the constitution. If we are agreed as to the policy of removing the tariff, and in the determination to unite with our fellow citizens to obtain the object which we have in view. I regret that I cannot unite with some of the members on this point as to the constitutionality of the tariff, and hope that our difference of opinion may not affect our object. As to the abstract question, whether or not the tariff is unconstitutional, or on topics of political economy, I feel but a secondary interest. My object is practical utility. Although I think that the tariff is injurious to the country, generally, yet the question merely one of policy, I would quietly yield my opinion. But although different topics of political economy may be subjected to discussion, there are questions on which all must concur.

My objection to the tariff is not only that it operates unequally, and therefore unjustly, but that it is injurious as it relates to its influence on some parts of the union. It is this which I consider as unjust, independently of its abuse of constitutional power. I know, sir, the integrity of the commercial part of this country, and the respectability of the mercantile class of our citizens.

This government is founded on the affections of the people. I would ask those who believe that the restrictive policy enriches the country, whether its benefits are to be compared with the enormous evils which it inflicts? I approve of the course suggested by the gentleman from Georgia; I think it the best mode of preventing unnecessary discussion. I propose to the convention to strike out of the address, from the words "In justice to that body," in the fourth paragraph, to the end of the eighth paragraph. I wish the address to go forth without being exposed to misconception or misconstruction. I ask the members of this convention to look at the last clause of the concluding sentence of the fourth paragraph, and say whether it is not liable to misconception.

Mr. Berrien, I understand the object of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, to be, that the members may have an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the point of advertising to the suggestions which I made when I moved for the discharge of the committee of the whole, to express my individual feelings as one of the general committee, who are sensible of the magnanimity of the sentiments avowed by the gentleman from New York.

In behalf of the people whom I represent, in part, I assert that there is not a sentiment in the address, which will warrant the opinion, that there exists a feeling favorable to the severance of the union. There is not in that address a single expression consistent with reverence for the constitution, or attitude of insincerity. I cannot consent to modify what I believe to be the sincere, fire side sentiments of a people whose representative I am.

Mr. Gallatin, hoped that the names of the members who voted on the amendment would be recorded.

Mr. Cruger, of South Carolina. I feel bound, in justice to my own opinion and that of my constituents, before voting for striking out the words included in the amendment, to give my reasons for doing so. What is contained in this address is not even the medium of the opinions which prevail among my constituents, but is the very least which they would have said.

Mr. Carpenter, of Maine, objected to the tariff to be unconstitutional, and would vote for the address. He thought that those who considered the tariff as an unconstitutional measure should have an opportunity of expressing that opinion.

Mr. Gallatin was not to be drawn from his ground by the remarks of the gentlemen.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the motion to amend, and 32 voted in favor of the amendment and 149 against it.

Mr. Johnson, of South Carolina, objected to the part of the address which appeared to him to admit a principle which, if adopted would be fatal to the cause that the address was intended to support. He thought that there was an admission in the address of a power in congress to protect manufacturers. The argument, that in collecting revenue by laying import duties you may grant protection to manufactures is not only contrary to the constitution, but a false principle in political economy. I hold it to be impossible that you can grant protection and raise revenue at the same time. Whenever the power to raise revenue is granted, the power to protect is destroyed.

Mr. Berrien. The report was framed in a spirit of compromise. I appeal to the convention if we have not realized the intention with which that report was framed. I adhere to the sentiments expressed in the address. We advance no new doctrine. We are in concert there and at home. We found our conviction on this subject, upon the inevitable connection which subsists between a principal and an incidental power. We do not assert that a power has been given in any mode by the constitution, to protect manufactures; but we do assert that there is a grant of power in the constitution to impose taxes for revenue, involving a power to protect articles on which the duty is imposed by omitting to impose it on others. There is no power to protect manufactures. With these views, I hope that the gentlemen will see the necessity of submitting the question to the convention without discussion.

After some further observations by Mr. Berrien, the question was, on his motion, taken on the adoption of the address,—yeas, 150; nays, 29. So the address, as presented by the committee, was adopted.

Mr. Berrien, to facilitate the business of the convention proposed two resolutions. The first provided for the discharge of the committee to which was entrusted the preparation of a memorial to congress. The second was for the appointment by the president of a committee to consist of one member from each state represented in the convention, to prepare a memorial to congress, and instruct the committee to collect evidence in support of the memorial, and attend personal at Washington, and urge upon the national legislature the injustice and unequal operation of the tariff.

The question was put on the first resolution, which was adopted. A member moved to amend the second resolution, by inserting the words, "and in many respects infinitely more oppressive on the poor than the rich."

The mover supported his amendment by some observations and facts, in illustration of the opinion which he asserted, and Mr. Berrien accepted it as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. Prentiss wished that that part of the resolution which required the personal attendance of the committee on congress might be stricken out. He objected to the appointment of lobby members.

Mr. Gallatin hoped that the amendment would not be concurred in. He did not know what was meant by the term lobby members. But he was willing to go, as a volunteer, to Washington, to promote the object of this convention.

A member advocated that part of the resolution objected to. Such a committee would be useful. He had known such members as the gentleman from South Carolina called lobby members; to be sent from the great state of New York, and even from South Carolina. De Witt Clinton and Governor Morris had acted in that capacity.

Mr. Berrien. The duty of the committee would be to collect facts to sustain the memorial. My object was, that they should attend at Washington, not exert influence on congress but to explain the operation of facts, or the statements contained in the memorial. I am willing that the committee should attend personally, or appoint a sub-committee from their body to attend on their behalf.

Mr. Cheves moved that the last resolution be referred to the general committee. The yeas and nays being required on that resolution, the yeas were 190, and the nays 2.

The resolution to appoint a committee to confer with the convention which is about to assemble on the 20th inst. at New York, was then called up.

Mr. Poindexter advocated the appointment of the committee, and hoped that conciliatory measures would be adopted.

Mr. Horner opposed the appointment of such a committee. He believed that it could have no good effect, but would rather be prejudicial to the cause. There was no ground of conciliation on which the committee could meet the New York convention.

On motion, the convention agreed to take a recess until half past four this afternoon.

At half past four in the afternoon, the convention re-assembled.

The committee appointed to confer with the Pennsylvania delegation, with reference to the payment of expenses of the convention, reported through Mr. Bassett, of Virginia. The Pennsylvania delegation had resolved to bear the entire expenses, and refused all participation of payment by other portions of the convention. It was then unanimously resolved, on motion of Mr. Bassett, that this convention express their deep sense of the obligation they are under to the Philadelphia delegation, and tender their most cordial and sincere acknowledgements for their kind attention and liberal accommodations.

It was also resolved, that a committee from each state be constituted, to have a certain number of the proceedings of the convention circulated among their respective constituents.

The president here observed that the unfinished business of the morning, was the resolution providing a committee of six to wait upon the tariff convention about to assemble in New York, which had already been submitted to the convention.

A motion was made that that resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. Parsons, of Alabama, said he was disposed to vote against the resolution, but he desired to see it treated with proper consideration and deference, and he hoped the resolution to postpone indefinitely would be withdrawn. It was not withdrawn, and Mr.

Poindexter, of Mississippi, demanded the yeas and nays upon the question, when it appeared that 122 gentlemen voted for the postponement, and 39 against it.

The following resolutions were then offered:

Resolved, That a vote of thanks be presented to the citizens of Philadelphia, for the courtesy and hospitality manifested towards the members of this convention.

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to Coudy Raguet, esq. for the faithful and zealous manner in which he has performed the arduous duties of secretary of this convention, and that the members of this body judge themselves to recommend his paper, the Banner of the Constitution, to their constituents, as every way entitled to their patronage.

The first resolution was carried unanimously. Mr. Leonard, of New York, offered an amendment to the second, to the effect, that every member of the convention go forward, subscribe to, and pay in advance for, Mr. Raguet's paper. The resolution as amended was unanimously and cheerfully acceded to.

The secretary of the convention here read the names of the committee to draft an address to congress and urge the attention of that body to its demands.

On motion of Judge Barbour, Mr. Gallatin was appointed chairman of that committee.

It was then, resolved, That the letter of Mr. Sarchett, that of Mr. Ronaldson, and other documents that had been committed to the table; be referred to the committee to address congress.

Mr. Sedgewick, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we tender to the president of this convention our warmest thanks for the able, zealous and impartial manner in which he has discharged the responsible duties of presiding officer of this body.

Judge Barbour here rose, and in a brief, appropriate, and eloquent speech, one of the happiest efforts that we ever remember, returned his thanks to the convention for their approbatory resolution, and expressed his deep gratification at the harmony which had prevailed throughout the deliberations of that body, and his confident hope that their appeals and deliberations would not be idle to their cause, nor lost upon the American people.

On motion, the convention then adjourned sine die.

NEW PROOF

Of Mr. Calhoun's efforts to undermine the president, as early as the first year of his administration.

From "the Globe," of October 7.

A recent controversy between governor Miller, now senator of the United States, and Alexander Speer, controller general of South Carolina, has brought to light a letter, which fully develops Mr. Calhoun's enmity to the president at a time when the whole country looked to him as one identified with the administration, and a devoted friend to him who stood at its head.

It seems that Mr. Speer has, by a publication in the South Carolina papers, in some way brought into question the consistency of governor Miller's course towards the administration of general Jackson. The governor intimates that his feelings had undergone some change, and then says:

"If my confidence in the administration has been weakened, you will readily conceive how far the subject of emigration to Mr. Speer, was likely to produce that effect. This gentleman is the author of a pamphlet, in which my opinions on the subject of emigration are referred to. Mr. Speer was employed by the legislature to proceed to Washington, and lay before general Jackson a claim which this state had on the United States for about two hundred thousand dollars, for military advances made during the late war, and endeavor to engage the president to use his influence with congress to pay the claim. The following is the letter of Mr. Speer:

MR. SPEER'S LETTER.

Washington, 31st Dec. 1829.

"Dear sir—I had at first intended to write to you earlier, but finally concluded to wait, to have something more definitive in my note when I should arrive. On the first day after my arrival in this place, accompanied by our two senators, I waited on the president, for the purpose of laying before him your excellency's letter, as well as the documents in relation to our claim. From the interview, I thought I was warranted in auguring the most favorable circumstances; and, indeed, the observations of the president were as satisfactory as I could have wished, and so much so as to induce gen. Hayne, on our quitting the house, to congratulate me on our reception. After waiting several days, in order to give the president an opportunity of examining the papers, I called again, for the purpose of ascertaining if any thing was deficient, and if so, to endeavor to supply it. I sent in my request, with a request to see the president for a few moments. After waiting two hours, I left the house, and learned at the door as I departed, that his excellency had left the house, and gone to the war office. I now began to think the path was not so clear, particularly from some other omens. I had already enlisted all our members of congress in the matter, and also the vice president, and had requested them, in any interview they might have with the president, to endeavor to bring up, incidentally, this claim, and to ascertain what he intended to do in the matter.

"It was Mr. Calhoun's fortune to meet him first, and the subject was broached, when the president appeared to be averse to the whole claim. In the first place, instead of examining the question himself, he, as it appears, referred the whole matter to the secretary of war, and was waiting for his report; but, in the mean time, that there might be no delay, (I suppose), had made up his mind against us before he examined the subject. And now for his reasons: They were various—not one of which had 'any thing to do with the merits of the claim? First, the payment of South Carolina would induce the payment of Massachusetts; and this circumstance was a prominent objection to the payment of our state. Again, the payment of South Carolina would be the means of deferring the discharge of the national debt! Yes, sir, it is even true "the national debt!" Again, the payment of the claim would be a violation of the established usage of the government and laws of the land! When driven from all these positions, as perfectly untenable, he settled down to certain unflinching objections to the claim, which could not be combated, because they could not be seen.

"Now, sir, I have no doubt you are very much surprised at all this; and, indeed, but for a clue to the secret, it would be surprising to every body. When the papers were left with the general, he expressed himself so clear on the subject, that we thought the matter all settled, and would have been so, but for, as I verily believe, the influence of the secretary of war. It would exceed the limits of a letter to state the situation of this gentleman, and of his— at this place. The terms of severity are more powerful than the authority of the executive, backed by the secretary of state—and gen. E. and family are living alone in the city of Washington. The delegation from our state, and others, have rendered themselves obnoxious by not calling; and the president appears determined to sink or swim with his biographer. But there are other matters of more fearful import to this individual, in relation to his office, that are whispered here, and will no doubt soon blow out. But enough. I am acting under the direction of our two senators, and shall immediately withdraw my papers from the executive, and proceed by memorial, and only regret I did not do it sooner. Our word in relation to the tariff? There is not the least hope of a change for the better; and as to the executive, but not only against us in the matter, but common conversation verily ensures the whole proceeding of our state. Your most obedient, ALEXANDER SPEER.

"P. S. I have written this letter under the influence of mortified feelings, and it there is any observations in it that may appear harsh, I hope you will excuse it. This opinion will, I think, show South Carolina that the terms on a broken reed if she depends on any friendship here, in relation to those great interests which 'much agitate our country'.

From this letter it will be seen that Mr. Speer, when he waited on the president, in company with Mr. Hayne, found his disposition towards the South Carolina claim such as warranted the most favorable augury as to the result of his mission. He says, "the observations of the president were as satisfactory as he could have wished." Mr. Speer then enlisted in favor of the claim the vice president and the members of congress from South Carolina; and it seems that Mr. Speer, failing to obtain a second interview with the president himself, learned the fate of his errand through Mr. Calhoun, "whose fortune it was to meet the president first," and on breaking the subject to ascertain his determination— Mr. Calhoun informed Mr. Speer—

'That the president appeared wholly adverse to the claim.'

'That he had referred the whole matter to the secretary of war, and was waiting for his report.'

'That in the mean time he had made up his mind against us (the South Carolina) before he examined the subject.'

'That his (the president's) reasons were various, not one of which had any thing to do with the claim.'

'They were that "the payment of South Carolina would induce the payment of Massachusetts."

'That "the payment of South Carolina would be the means of deferring the discharge of the national debt."

'That "the payment of the claim would be a violation of the established usage of the government and the laws of the land."

It seems from Mr. Calhoun's account of Mr. Speer, that "the president was driven from all these positions as perfectly untenable"—and who, we may ask, could maintain an untenable position against the powerful logic of the vice president! The president was driven from his positions; and then, to cover his premeditated injustice, we are told "settled down to certain inflexible objections to the claim, which could not be combated, because they could not be seen."

If the account here rendered by Mr. Calhoun to South Carolina, through her agent at Washington, and her governor at home, were true, the president certainly deserved to lose the favor of his native state. South Carolina had, with devoted patriotism, contributed her whole strength to the service of the country throughout the war—depending almost entirely on a foreign market for the sale of her produce, and supplying her own wants by purchasing from the non-resident, the obstruction of her commerce was peculiarly trying; yet her ardent love of country made every sacrifice on her part tolerable. After the war was over, she still bore up under the taxes necessary to extinguish the national debt—and on the election of her favorite sons, the one to the presidency, the other to the vice presidency, she only sought to bring the claim (her claim for advances during the war) to the view of the president of the United States through the agent instructed to proceed to Washington with the claim, so as to procure from him a special message on the subject, in that an act of congress be passed, authorizing a settlement of the demands of this state on equitable grounds. This is the language of the instructions to S. Carolina to her agent, which were given to him on the 15th December, and he repaired to Washington, it would seem at first to be authorized by the president; and at last, on the 31st of the same month, to transmit to the governor Mr. Calhoun's account of the insulting subterfuges by which the president disappointed all the hopes of his mission. We are not astonished that the governor should not say "that his confidence in the administration had been weakened" by such a representation, and coming from so high a source. Nothing could be better calculated to take from the president the respect of the functionaries to whom

South Carolina had committed her interests, nor to alienate the affections of the whole people of the south. Even Massachusetts had deep cause of complaint, if a design to prevent the allowance of her own just claims had been urged as a reason for defeating those of South Carolina.

Mr. Speer in his letter gives evidence of his chagrin and disappointment. He anticipates that gov. Miller would also be very much surprised—and he says, "but for a clue to the secret, it would be surprising to every body." He repeats, that "when the papers were left with the general he expressed himself so clear on the subject that he thought the matter all settled." Mr. Speer makes a statement in Washington, and that he should have made inquiry to find a clue, to explain to him the sudden change in the president's intentions, as communicated by Mr. Calhoun, is quite natural. Mr. Calhoun, it appears, was at no loss in suggesting the influence which operated so powerfully on the president's mind as to induce him to sacrifice the just rights of his own native state—the state which delighted to honor him, and felt honored herself in seeing him elevated to the chief magistracy of the nation. The influence to which Mr. Calhoun ascribed the disappointment of Mr. Speer was the same which he afterwards pointed out to his friends, particularly those in the cabinet and the editor of the 'Tel-graph,' as the object of attack. "The influence of the secretary of war," we are distinctly told, defeated the hopes of South Carolina, and we are not left to conjecture as to the motive which operated on him. Mr. Speer is informed that "the situation of this gentleman and his— at this place." [Washington] was the cause of the failure of his mission.

He was told "that the delegation from (his) state [South Carolina] and others had rendered themselves obnoxious by not calling" on the president and family.

That the president appeared "determined to sink or swim with his biographer."

But that "the forms of severity were more powerful than the authority of the executive, backed by the secretary of state and gen. Eaton and family are living alone in the city of Washington."

This explanation, it will be seen, resolves the loss of the South Carolina claim into the prejudice excited against them, in consequence of the delegation of that state rendering itself obnoxious by not calling on major Eaton and family, thus delaying "the authority of the executive, backed by the secretary of state."

We have marked these points distinctly, that the public may see with what precision Mr. Calhoun had, at that early day of the administration, selected the objects of his attack, and the mode he had chosen to present it, so as to reach the president and Mr. Van Buren through maj. Eaton. The same mode of attack was prosecuted by Mr. Calhoun and his organ upon the publication of his correspondence, and it has been persistently followed up since by Messrs. Hughes, Branch and Brannen. This first attempt made by Mr. Calhoun himself, through Mr. Speer, it is now evident made a deep impression on the government of South Carolina, and was calculated to make the impression throughout the state; that the president was under a "malign influence," and ready to sacrifice justice, consistency, and gratitude, to the malignant feelings of his odious favorites.

What will the people of South Carolina think of the author of the artifice employed when they learn that it is entirely untrue a fabrication which received very important fact as they stand recorded on the archives of the senate.

We will give a succinct narrative of the facts in the case, which will be found sustained in every particular by the documents annexed.

On the 15th December, 1829, Mr. Speer received his credentials from his state to the South Carolina legislature, and a signed letter from the governor, requesting for the state "the friendly consideration of this claim by the president, and his recommendation to congress for its payment, should it comport with his views of justice."

Mr. Speer arrived in Washington about the commencement of the Christmas holidays, and on the day after his arrival had a personal interview with the president, "suggesting the most favorable circumstances." "The president expressed himself so clear upon the subject" (to Mr. Speer), that "he thought the matter settled."

In the spirit thus manifested by the president he immediately went to work to investigate the claims of South Carolina, that he might have the pleasure of doing justice with the utmost promptitude to the long deferred rights of the state.

On the 26th of December, Mr. Hagner, third auditor, acknowledges the receipt of the documents, in all likelihood the same day on which the president received them from Mr. Speer. These documents were received through the secretary of war with a note from him to Mr. Hagner, "inquiring [whether his] office afforded any information as to the nature and particulars of the claim."

On the 25th of December, Mr. Hagner replied and furnished statements "setting forth in detail the deductions made on the settlement of the accounts of the state (of South Carolina) which form the basis of the claim."

Mr. Hagner, it will be seen, in the same note refers to the documents "to show the causes of the deductions," and he expressly states that the claims were excluded (with the exception of interest) in the adjustment of the accounts made by him, if under the supervision of Mr. Calhoun. He says:

"The settlement was made according to the rules applied to other similar accounts with regard to all important items, in conformity with the directions issued, BY THE VICE PRESIDENT, THEN SECRETARY OF WAR."

This report, dated the 28th of December, had probably, in the interim between that and the 31st, come to the knowledge of Mr. Calhoun, and in his conversation with the president, having allusion to the former settlement of the claims under his own authority, he formed the conclusion that his decision would prove an appeal to the president's recommendation of the claims of South Carolina to congress—and it suited Mr. Calhoun's interests to ascribe the failure of the application of the governor and legislature to the "malign influence" of major Eaton and the secretary of state, rather than to impute it to his own decision with regard to the claims, when secretary at war, and the principles then established by himself. Accordingly, Mr. Calhoun gave the agent of South Carolina the account which we find reported in his letter of the 31st of December to the governor.

But Mr. Calhoun, it now appears, reckoned falsely as to the influence of his decision, when secretary of war, against the claim of South Carolina. The president and the new secretary of war determined to look beyond Mr. Calhoun's settlement, and go back into the merits of the claim.

On the 2nd of Jan. two days after Mr. Speer's private despatch was sent to the governor, major Eaton made a report to the president, in favor of allowing the claim, on the principles contended for by South Carolina.

The strict letter of the law gave the states interest on moneys advanced for the general government, only where the states paid interest. South Carolina had sold her bank stocks, which brought interest, to make advances, and although the last interest she paid none. This was the foundation of her equitable claim for this item. Major Eaton, so far from availing himself of the strict letter of the statute to bar the claim, thus recommends it to the president, with a view to have the claim legislated by congress:

"I can perceive no material difference in according interest to the state, on account of moneys borrowed for the use of the government, and where the advances were from the bank of a state, the funds being the property of the state."

Another principal item in the claim was for arms purchased by the state, which had been admitted, and a willingness to satisfy the state by an equivalent in kind from the United States' armories expended. Of this major Eaton says:

"South Carolina, however, has objected to the tender, and requested that her demand shall be met in money, and not in arms. To this there could be no objection, if there were funds within the control of the department applicable to such a purpose."

With these special recommendations, major Eaton referred the president to the settlement made by the third auditor and Mr. Calhoun, for the cause of the rejection, on their part, of the minor items of the claim.

The president, as will be seen by his message of the 4th of Jan. written two days after the report to him, presents the subject to the Senate of the United States. After explaining the request of South Carolina and the duty imposed on him, he says:

"This duty I perform with the greatest pleasure, being well satisfied that no inducement will be waiting to secure to the claims of a member of the confederacy, that has under all circumstances shown an ardent devotion to the cause of the country, the most ample justice."

After presenting the same favorable view of the principal demands of South Carolina, when secretary of war, the president thus recommends the whole claim to the kind consideration of congress; he says:

"Acting upon an enlightened sense of national justice and gratitude, it is confidently believed that congress will be as mindful of this claim, as it has been of others put forward by the states, that, in periods of extreme peril, generously contributed to the service of the union, and enabled the general government to discharge its obligations."

Thus, in less than twenty days after the governor and legislature had acted on the subject of the claim, in South Carolina, did the president comply with their utmost expectations, by urging it on the attention and invoking the "justice and gratitude" of congress in its favor. In conformity with the president's wishes, on the 11th January, the matter was taken up by the military committee in congress, which concluded their report on the subject as follows:—

"As the committee are of opinion that relief ought to be granted, they therefore reported a bill."

The bill, as a matter of course, was passed to a second reading, and there the claim was dropped.

Will not the public enquire why southern eloquence remained silent, and has permitted this equitable and honorable claim of South Carolina to lie in the house unattended up to this hour? The claim of Massachusetts, which it was precluded the president was unwilling to provide a precedent for, has since passed congress, and received the sanction of the executive. It is not astonishing that this circumstance did not put the representatives of South Carolina in mind of the rights of the state! There must be some strong reason for this strange neglect.

We have no inclination to indulge conjecture upon this subject, but the history of the case suggests the idea, that Mr. Calhoun had an interest in consigning the whole subject to oblivion. His whole story of the president's hostility to the claim, and of the loss of favor by the southern delegation, through the Eaton and an Aaron Burien, would have been exposed by the success of the claim. To keep up discontent in the south, it was necessary that her honest claims should be urged on the executive and congress, and that the people should understand that their applications were neglected or, what is worse, vetoed, because their high-minded representatives would not stoop to obtain their claims from the favor of the wife of the secretary of war! It was necessary, too, for a particular interest, that the closing sentence of Mr. Speer's letter to the governor should have some countenance, and that those concerned might be enabled to impute the belief that the president was averse to the whole interests of the south. This sentence which is emphasized in the original, is, we think, a clue to the fabrication which was imposed on governor Miller. Mr. Speer says:

"One word as to the tariff: There is not the least hope of a change for the better; and, as for the executive, he is not only against us in the matter, but in common conversation severely censures the whole proceeding of our state."

MESSAGE:

From the president of the United States, communicating documents from the legislature of South Carolina, relating to the claim of that state for advances made during the late war. To the senate of the United States.

I have been requested by the legislature of South Carolina, as will appear from the documents accompanying this communication, to submit to the consideration of congress, certain claims against the United States, for advances made by that state during the late war. It is conceived, that the redress sought for, can only be obtained through the interposition of congress. The only agency allowed to me, in to present such facts in relation to the subject as are in the possession of the executive, in order that the whole may be fairly considered.

This duty I perform with great pleasure, being well satisfied, that no inducement will be waiting to secure to the claims of a member of the confederacy, that has, under all circumstances, shown an ardent devotion to the cause of the country, the most ample justice.

By a reference to the department of war, for information as to the nature and extent of these claims, it appears that they consist of—

1st. Interest on moneys advanced for the United States, which have been heretofore reimbursed.

2d. Certain advances, which, on a settlement of accounts between South Carolina and the United States, were disallowed, or suspended, by the accounting officers of the treasury.

In regard to the former, the rule hitherto adopted by congress, has been, to allow to the states interest only where they had paid it on money borrowed, and had applied it to the use of the United States. The case of South Carolina does not come strictly within this rule, because, instead of borrowing, as the others, for the use of the United States, upon interest, she actually received of the United States funds for which she was actually receiving an interest; and she is understood to insist, that the sum of interest in both cases being equal, and the relief afforded equally meritorious, the same principle of remuneration should be applied.

Acting upon an enlightened sense of national justice and gratitude, it is confidently believed that congress will be as mindful of this claim, as it has been of others put forward by the states, that, in periods of extreme peril, generously contributed to the service of the union, and enabled the general government to discharge its obligations. The grounds upon which certain portions of it have been suspended, or rejected, will appear from the communications of the secretary of war, and third auditor, herewith submitted.

ANDREW JACKSON.

January 4th, 1830.

Executive department, Columbia, 15th December, 1829.

My dear sir: The state of South Carolina has a claim against the United States, for advances made during the late war. I have been directed by resolution of the legislature, to request the friendly consideration of this claim, by the president and his recommendation to congress, for its payment, should it compare with his views of justice.

Alexander Speer, esq. our principal fiscal officer, is constituted a special agent, to attend at Washington, and superintend the investigation incident thereto, to whom you are referred for information.

It cannot have escaped your recollection, how imminent was the danger of the whole southern country, during the late war, when the British fleet hovered on the coast after the capture of Washington. The United States were under the most solemn and constitutional obligation to protect this state, which they were unable to do, and left us to our own resources. In the liquidation of advances made by us, interest was withheld, and many items rejected, on account of their informality. The immense sacrifice which is made to the general government, during peace, for protection during war, ought to induce a liberal course on the part of that government, which omitted to do what the constitution enjoined upon it.

It was entirely uncertain for some time, whether Charleston, or Savannah, or New Orleans, should be the object of the attack of the British, when they left the Chesapeake. That a deep solitude should have been left, and the most energetic means devised, by South Carolina, in this crisis, was to have been expected; but that the accounts of this state should be subject to such a rule as would exclude many bona fide intelligent expenses, could not be rationally anticipated. To your own knowledge of the difficulties, as well as to a sense of justice, and pledged faith of the federal government, we appeal for a prompt and final liquidation of the balance still due. With great consideration, I am, dear sir, your most obedient,

SIEPHEN D. MILLER.

His excellency Andrew Jackson, president of the United States.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

December 1st 1829.

The special committee, to whom was referred that part of the governor's message, upon the claims of this state, for moneys advanced to the general government during the late war, together with the comptroller general's report on the same subject, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report; that your committee have examined the state of the documents against the general government, and are of opinion that the same is just, fair and equitable, and that it is necessary that the same should be presented as speedily as possible, and that Alexander Speer, now comptroller general, be authorized and directed to proceed to Washington on this business. Your committee are of opinion, that it is desirable that the executive of the state bring this claim to the view of the president of the United States, through the agent instructed to proceed to Washington with the claim, so as to procure from him a special message on the subject, so that an act of congress be passed, authorising a settlement of the demands of this state on equitable grounds, and to this end the committee are of opinion the constant attention of our agent will be necessary.

Your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That A. Speer, now comptroller general, proceed forthwith to Washington, to prosecute the demands of this state against the general government.

2. Resolved, That A. Speer, now comptroller general, be allowed one thousand dollars for his services, and in lieu of all expenses in prosecuting the claims of this state, and that the same be paid him out of the contingent fund by the governor.

3. Resolved, That the governor be requested to communicate, through the agent, with the president of the United States, so as to procure from him a special message to congress on the correctness of the said claim.

I do hereby certify, that the foregoing is a true copy of the original report, considered and agreed to in the house of representatives, and concurred in by the senate, and of file in my office.

R. ANDERSON,
Clerk of the house of representatives.

December 15, 1829.

His department, 2d January, 1830.

Sir: The application for the state of South Carolina which has been referred by you to this department, has been considered, and the papers are returned.

I can perceive no material difference in according interest to a state, on account of money borrowed for the use of the government, and where the advances were from a bank of the state, the funds being the property of the state. The objection, however, consists in this: that on no occasion has congress gone farther, it is believed, than to authorize the payment of interest on funds actually procured, and where the state had paid it, or incurred a liability to pay it. Thus for the principle has been admitted in legislation, and it is for congress to determine if it shall proceed further. Apart from this, the other claims presented for settlement consists of various items which will be rejected or suspended for reasons which will be found detailed in the report of the third auditor which accompanies this communication; and by two reports of committees in the senate and house of representatives, made at the first session of the twentieth congress.

That part of the account which relates to arms supplied by the state, has heretofore been admitted, and an offer made to restore them from our armories. South Carolina, however, has objected to the tender, and requested that her demand shall be met in money, and not with arms. To this, there could be no objection, if there were funds within the control of the department applicable to such a purpose. The amount annually appropriated by congress for making arms, and thereby to supply the militia, would seem to make it an immaterial matter to the government whether this admitted demand was satisfied with arms or money. But as there are no funds applicable to such an object, legislation becomes necessary. Very respectfully,
J. H. EATON,
The president of the United States.

Treasury department, 3d auditor's office, 28th December, 1830.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, this morning, of your note of the 26th instant, enclosing certain documents respecting the claim of the state of South Carolina, and inquiring whether this office affords any information as to the nature and the particulars of the claim.

In reply, I have to observe that the printed book, being one of the documents before mentioned, contains copies of statements, furnished from this office, setting forth, in detail, the deductions made on settlement of the accounts of the state in this office, which form the basis of the claims, (except so far as concerns interest), and also the causes for those deductions. The settlement was made agreeably to the rules applied to other similar accounts, and with regard to all the important items, in conformity with decisions thereon by the vice president, then secretary of war. The statements referred to commence at page 36, and end at page 72; and in following pages will be found a copy of the account, as settled at this office.

As the report of the committee of claims of the house of representatives on this subject presents a view of the case different from that exhibited by the report of the military committee of the senate, contained in the book before alluded to, I take the liberty of referring you thereto. It may be seen in vol. 4, 1st session 20th congress, No. 246. The papers are returned. With great respect, your most obedient servant,

PETER HAGNER, auditor.

The hon. John H. Eaton, secretary of war.

MESSRS. BRANCH AND EATON.

From the Raleigh Register, October 6.

Gov. Branch, late secretary of the navy, passed through this city on Tuesday last, on his way to Tennessee. He called upon us to request the publication of the subjoined correspondence, for the purpose of showing that he has been unfairly dealt with, in maj. Eaton's late publication. In that appeal, with a view of convicting gov. Branch of a mean, truckling, subserviency and of feigning a resentment which he did not feel, maj. Eaton introduces a note from the governor to the president of the U. States, in which he expresses himself in terms of great friendship and respect. This note is made to bear date on the 29th January, two days subsequent to the famous communication made to governor Branch and his associates,

Messrs. Berrien and Ingham, through the instrumentality of col. Johnson, and presents the governor in the attitude of being mean enough to profess the most ardent friendship for the president, two days after that officer had offered him so indignity which no independent man would brook. This was well calculated to depress governor Branch in the estimation of high minded men, and we feel a high degree of gratification therefore, in being able to furnish incontrovertible proof, at the following note, &c., that the correspondence between him and the president occurred before, instead of after the communication from colonel Johnson, and therefore destroys completely the foundation upon which major Eaton has raised his superstructure. It remains for major Eaton to explain how the date of governor Branch's note was altered from the 27th to the 29th January, that an alteration was made, either intentionally or through mistake, in as plain a demonstration itself, and whether the result of the one or the other, it has given Mr. Eaton a momentary triumph which this explanation must counteract.

On the 20th of January, the president of the United States, addressed the following note to governor Branch:

January 20th, 1830.

"The president with his respects to governor Branch has the pleasure to inform him that he has seen major Eaton and he has authorized the president to say to him that he will with pleasure have a friendly interview with governor Branch in the presence of major Barry whenever it may suit governor Branch and his convenience—the president communicates this wish, with much pleasure as he hopes all misunderstanding will be explained."

To this note, governor Branch returned the following answer, bringing the same as is introduced by Mr. Eaton, except that the true date should be the 27th of January, instead of the 29th, as represented by him:

Naval department, Jan. 27, 1830.

"Dear sir: I have received your note of yesterday's date, and do most cheerfully accept your friendly meditation; more, however, from a desire to give you an additional evidence of the friendly feelings which have actuated my bosom towards yourself, than from a consciousness of having given to major Eaton just cause for the withdrawal of his friendship. As a further manifestation of the frankness which I trust will ever characterize my conduct, I agree to meet him this day at two o'clock, in the presence of major Barry, at Mr. Vao Buren's, and in his presence also.

Yours truly, JOHN BRANCH.

To the president of the United States."

On the same day, the 27th of January, Mr. Eaton addressed the following note to gov. Branch, showing conclusively, from its date, that it was on the 27th and not the 29th, that gov. Branch replied to the president:

27th January, 1830.

It will not be in my power to accord to day to the suggestion of your note to the president I will advise you of the time when I shall be able to do so. Respectfully,
J. H. EATON.

On the next day, Mr. Eaton addressed the subjoined note to gov. Branch, which shows from its date, that it could not have been the 29th upon which he addressed his note to the president:

January 30th, 1830.

Sir: major Barry will be at my office presently who may be present if you have no objection to the interview proposed, and which may take place at your room or my own as you may prefer. I will come over or you can come here.
J. H. EATON."

To this note, Mr. Branch replied that he would meet major Eaton in the office of the attorney general, in the presence of major Barry and the attorney general, and the meeting accordingly took place in a few moments thereafter, as will be seen from the following hasty note from Mr. Eaton to the governor:

"Mr. Berrien is in his room, if you will walk over. I have no objection.
J. H. E."

There having been some discussion in the Georgia papers, on the subject of the sentiments of Wilson Lumpkin, the candidate for the office of governor of Georgia, in reference to general Jackson. Since the controversy between general Jackson and Mr. Calhoun, in which Mr. Lumpkin took a part, we give the following conclusive letter on the subject, which we find in the Milledgeville Union.

Monroe, 19th September, 1831.

Gentlemen: A report has reached me this morning, that a political combination, who undertake to dictate to the people of Georgia, and prostrate the fair standing of every man who refuses to yield to their mandates, have a new arrangement in preparation to misrepresent and do me great injustice. The story is, they are attempting to make it appear that I am unfriendly to gen. Jackson—and that I am united with Mr. Calhoun against him. If they are thus engaged, it completes the infamy and disgraces of a combination of most daring office seekers, that ever existed in a civilized community.

You know that I speak the truth when I affirm, that, from the commencement of the disagreement between the president and vice president, to the present moment, I have uniformly, in private and public, said, we must sustain Jackson; the interest of Georgia and the union will be best promoted by his re-election.

My friends and foes know that I have been faithful in my support of the president. He knows it. Mr. Calhoun knows it. How can he, then, revile the reviler of Jackson—his enemies—his friends—selfish friends—now rise up, and expect to profit by pushing me out of my own stand, and placing themselves in my tracks?

They must presume upon the ignorance of the people. I rely upon their virtue and intelligence. Respectfully yours,

WILSON LUMPKIN.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 8—Vol. V.

BALTIMORE, OCT. 22, 1831.

[Vol. XLI. Whole No. 1,049]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The editor, having been appointed one of the delegates from the city of Baltimore to the convention of agriculturalists, mechanics, manufacturers and others, favorable to the protection of the national industry, to be held at New York on the 26th instant—will, of course, be absent at the period of the next publication of the REGISTER, and, probably, for some days thereafter. He has, therefore, given up more than an usual proportion of the present sheet to the insertion of articles from manuscript, deferring much stock-copy as more convenient for use in his absence; and, that the lee-way may be brought up and certain interesting papers be inserted with reasonable promptitude, he has arranged the issue of a supplement, to get-in the fifth annual report of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, the anti-masonic address, and several other long articles which must be published and preserved in this work; and, having now disposed of the chief proceedings of the "Free Trade convention," he must make room for those of the Protecting Convention, about to meet at New York. In a fair and just presentation of the doings of opposing parties, the public intelligence will be best served.

☞ We do not esteem it useful to offer many remarks on the proceedings and address of the late "free trade convention," at present. They will, no doubt, be taken up by other hands at New York in the ensuing week, and differing views be presented to the consideration of the American people.

We have to regret, however, that the proceedings and address have an imperative or menacing character—that modifications of the tariff laws are thrown out of the question, and nothing but "UNCONDITIONAL SUBMISSION" is offered us! The principle of protection, under which our government has acted from the beginning until the present day, must be yielded to new readings of the constitution, and a vast majority of the people give way to a small minority—because the latter wills it!

We hope that the friends of the tariff about to meet in convention at New York, will not be excited because of these unreasonable doings—but proceed in the business that shall present itself for their action just as if the "free trade" convention had never been held; and, though resolute in defence of their principles, and conscious of power to protect their interests, we desire that all moderation may be observed, as no doubt it will, and the reason of the people be calmly appealed to, for the support of such laws as every civilized nation under heaven has felt it necessary to enact, that its population, and wealth and strength might be advanced and secured.

Very large meetings of the people have been held in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, &c., and in many of the smaller towns or counties of numerous states, to appoint delegates to the New York convention, at some of which very able resolutions were passed—but room has not been allowed to notice them at length. At the Baltimore meeting, held last Saturday evening, in the great hall of the Exchange, we are pretty confident that more persons were present than at all the anti-tariff meetings held to appoint delegates to the "free trade convention," those at Charleston alone excepted—which were numerous, because of the high excitement of political parties. Not many of the anti-tariff meetings contained so many as twenty persons—some of only five or six; the meetings in Philadelphia and Baltimore, on that side of the question, were attended by only 31 persons; but those on the other side by at least three thousand—the bone and the sinew of these great cities—a full representation both of capital and production.

VOL. XLI.—No. 11.

☞ We present some further accounts of the proceedings of the "free trade convention," (received since our last), and believe that a sufficiently full, and certainly, fair history of the proceedings of that meeting is now given, except a roll of the members with their places of residence, which shall be inserted as necessary to a right understanding of the constitution of the meeting. We wish that the same courtesy may be extended to the convention just about to be held at New York—by the editors of "free trade" papers.

☞ The "Richmond Whig," after copying the article from the last "Register," which gave the names of some distinguished individuals who had declared the constitutionality of a protecting tariff, says—

"It is in the memory of many of our citizens, that in 1808, the time referred to by the Register, it was rank federalism in Virginia to wear any other than domestic manufactures. Every importer or consumer of foreign goods then was no better than a tory. Now how changed! Those were the palmy days of the ancient dominion. The revolutionary leaven had not yet entirely evaporated. Now we are ready to sell our birthright for a mess of pottage, and bow at the footstool of foreign manufacturers; our anger, our complaints, our indignation, all, all, are reserved for our brethren of the North, the Yankees—on whom, reluctantly enough, was forced the protecting system, by the south, the east, and the middle states.

"We will try to procure the file of the Enquirer, and if we can find the 4th of July celebration referred to, will publish it."

The last paragraph relates to the exhibition of a home-made shirt, by a governor of Virginia, on the 4th of July.

What the "Whig" says is true. It was "rank federalism" to doubt the propriety of protecting domestic manufactures in 1808. And this calls up the recollection of a fact,—that John Randolph, being about this time "a nuisance and a curse," declared his utter rejection of American manufactures, because the use of them was considered "pat-iotic." And every body, old enough to turn their memory back to the period spoken of—from 1808 to 1812, must well remember that John Randolph was then regarded as an apostate—totally separated from, and universally despised by, "the republican party."

☞ It is generally believed that the ensuing session of congress will be the most interesting and exciting, if not the most important in its results, of any that has been held for several years. It will contain, at least, four parties—and how they will work together, or against one another, in "compromise" or "combination," by the huge of "reward," or fear of "punishment"—no human being can tell; not even Mr. Thomas Ritchie!—though a "momentous crisis" is certainly at hand—Mr. Randolph having arrived last week at New York, from a ten days residence at the capital of the autocrat of the north.

☞ I have received a copy of the "Liberator," and come in for a share of the editor's reproof for having said, that "a sudden emancipation of the slaves, either by force or through principle," would be an awful calamity. I shall not argue the right of my opinion with the madness of a man who is doing all possible injury to the cause of emancipation, which he affects to support and increases the difficulties that stand in the way of rendering efficient service to people of color, bond or free. It is a great misfortune, that persons so impotent to do good may have a mighty power to do evil. I was the friend of black men before Mr. Garrison was born—and, if my life is a little lengthened, expect to be so after his fewer shall have left him.

SQUALLY! By an arrival at Boston from Cronstadt, we hear that the Russian government had notified the French ambassador, that his presence was no longer necessary; and that his passports were ready! If such be the fact, the belligerent feelings of France will not any longer be restrained. Civil war the people will have, if foreign war is not declared.

In seasons of adversity, hundreds of thousands of worthy persons in the United States, if they did not secretly wish a general war in Europe, have, at least, been willing that it should take place—the same persons, grateful for the general and quiet progress of our country in population and wealth, are fearfully alive to any event that may unhinge the present regular state of business, and wish the continuance of peace.

SPECIE. It is only about ten months since, that the "New York Journal of Commerce" complained of the superabundance of specie—"that the legal interest on a mass of idle capital would be almost half a million annually"—that how "to be relieved of the incumbrance [of specie] it was not easy to see"—that to stop a "drain of specie, congress imposed a burdensome duty on the goods bought with it"—that the "Chinese had taken it into their heads to second our policy, and, having made their thirty millions of golds" of silver, were calling for merchandise," and so "our market for specie was lost"—that "a vortex was wanted where we might carry off after cargo, throw it in, and never see it more," &c. &c. See REGISTER of January 15, 1831, page 353.

On this article we made some copious remarks—endeavoring to account for the abundance of money, in the success of the "American System"—and because of new and profitable applications of capital and the mightily increased circulation of values; saying, however, that several things might happen to afford a "vortex" for our specie, without "giving our streets willow," as the Journal of Commerce suggested might be a means of relieving us of the "incumbrance!"

Specie is now in "demand," and may be said to be "scarce," because it brings a handsome premium: about seven millions have been lately exported, and other millions are preparing to follow; the banks have, necessarily, curtailed their accommodations, and a very considerable degree of pecuniary embarrassment begins to prevail. The payments on account of the public debt about to be made, it is supposed by some, will relieve the existing pressure—but as much of the stock is owned in Europe, and exchange is far above the real par, additional exports of specie may follow such payment, and an increased want of money be felt—rather than that relief which is anticipated. For, we think it will be freely admitted, that every silver dollar, forcibly drawn from the United States in the payment of foreign debts, reduces the ordinary and safe circulation of money not less than five dollars. Such is the law of scarcity and supply. A small deficiency or excess affects the whole mass, of any and every merchantable commodity.

It is the excessive importations, notwithstanding the "burdensome duty on goods bought with specie," as the Journal of Commerce had it, which now makes a fearful, because forced, "vortex" for dollars. These heavy importations, (exceeding in the sum of 30 or 40 millions the amount of our exports, judging by the amount of the duties which it is said will be secured in the present year), may be in part caused by the reduced price of labor in England, in the increase of paupers, and the necessity of making public sacrifices that the working people may be employed and kept out of mischief. The poor rates in England are above 35,000,000 dollars—now, if by farming out miserable beings to the masters of iron, and others who require much manual power, easily directed by a few skilful individuals, the poor-rates may be abated—the policy is a wise one, because, by this operation foreigners may be compelled to assist in the support of the English poor! It is "throwing out a sprat to catch a mackerel." Thus—a person in England, entirely able to perform severest animal labor,* may have, say, 6s. a week for his subsistence; the parish hires him out to an iron-maker for 4s. and pays the balance useful to his support. Thus, the iron-maker is enabled to send his products abroad, and, by employing English paupers, interferes with the employment of valuable citizens of Pennsylvania, whose right to the enjoyment of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," no one will have the impudence to deny. It is not worth while to carry out this proposition any further—for it has the stamp of demonstration upon it: still the "free traders" will say, and British subjects declare, that American freemen who "know their rights and knowing dare maintain them," should encounter such a competition! But we shall see that the high-minded and hard-fisted working people of the United States will nullify the debasing project of their enemies—that they are not slaves, and will not suffer themselves to be reduced into paupers, through any hostile combination of interests to effect either. They will speak and be heard—if not, VELT! Theory will not fill the bellies of their wives and children, nor a cut-throat of huzzas bake an oven of bread! They must and will understand these things. Our "philosophy" is, that every citizen of the United States shall be protected against the pauper-labor of England, and the craft of her agents, located among us to evade the payment of just duties on goods imported.

The excessive importations of the present year may have been in part caused by the increased privations of the English laboring classes, and the indispensable obligation of providing a subsistence for them. The supply of foreign woollen goods, we are told, has no parallel except in the enormous importations of 1816—hence the price of such cloths have considerably fallen, though the rate of exchange has much risen, which latter should have increased the selling price of British goods in the United States—and an ample "vortex" is opened for our specie! But we think that there is yet another cause for these heavy importations. No one, after the repeated evidences that we have had of the fact, can doubt that it has been the policy of British merchants and manufacturers to create "gluts"—that the manufacturers of other countries might be paralyzed or destroyed. Such a course of proceeding has been openly avowed in parliament, and approved by no less a man than the present lord chancellor of Great Britain, the learned and sagacious lord Brougham, and to the operation of this British policy, we are of opinion, that the present demand for specie is partially owing.

When, some months ago, we spoke of the excessive demand for and high price of wool, we regarded them as the result of sheer speculation, and estimated more than once that they were not of domestic origin. It is known to several of our correspondents that we directly ascribed them to the British policy spoken of—that the American woollen manufacturers might be embarrassed, and, to one at least of our friends, the whole course of the supposed operation was suggested and its effects calculated. It was, however, hoped that the matter would pass over without extensive injury, and deemed impolitic (by those whose opinions we respect), to give publicity to the conclusions at which we had arrived, for reasons stated. But it will be remembered, that we earnestly advised the farmers to put the money in their pockets for their wool, and promptly. Out of this rise in the price of wool, it was manifest that our manufacturers must make cloth at a much increased expense, or arrest the progress on their works—and thus a forced business, or a lessened supply, of woollen cloths, would follow. Such was the state of things, that many manufacturers became sellers of wool—convinced that they could not work it up to an equal profit at the existing price of the material. Better proof than this cannot be offered that there was some artificial excitement to advance the price of American wool, on which our manufacturers chiefly depended. Well, this being effected, and, before supplies of foreign wool could be obtained and made into cloth (though paying a real duty of more than 50 per cent. on its cost, which, in itself, has our hearty approbation), we see that the market is overflowed with British woollen goods, the heaviest importation ever made, as we are informed, since the mad year of 1816. Who does not see management in these proceedings—first, in an excessive advance in the price of American wool, and then an excessive importation of British woollens—and thus the citizens of the United States, not only embarrassed in their own proper pursuits, have forced contributions levied upon them for the support of British paupers, and the British armies of soldiers, placemen and priests. And these contributions, it is the pleasure of Great Britain, shall be made in silver and gold. She excludes at present, as it were, all the products of the states north and west of the Potomac, containing three-fourths of the people of the United States—the taxes tobacco and rice at a most enormous rate, and for the only article freely admitted—cotton, she will give only a low price. But the end is not yet: unless this disastrous operation is checked—with the arrest or destruction of our woollen manufacture, down, down, goes the price of American wool, and millions worth of labor and millions in capital will be sacrificed. As it was in 1818-19-20, so will it be again—and, as the great public revenue derived from importations in 1815-16, effected, as it were, a general ruin of private individuals—so will the prosperous state of the finances in 1831 involve the country in distress, in a sudden appreciation of the value of money, and consequent decline in the value of labor and lands and improvements. A heavy revenue derived from importations more generally shews the want than the wealth of a country—but if received from internal resources, may afford a just measure of its prosperity. These are principles that cannot be refuted. They will endure and apply, as long as time remains.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Oct. 6, 1851. Whereas, notice was given by the department on the 1st inst. to the proprietors of the four and a half per cent. stock of the five millions of dollars, created in pursuance of an act of congress of the 26th of May, 1824; and to the proprietors of the five per cent. stock, created in pursuance of an act of the 15th of May, 1820, that the certificates of the said stocks will be redeemed on the 1st and 2d of January next respectively; and whereas, some of the proprietors of the said stocks may desire a reimbursement of their certificates previously to the aforesaid 1st or 2d of January, notice is hereby given, that, on the presentation and surrender by the proprietor of any certificate, or his attorney duly constituted, at the treasury, or at the loan office where the same may stand credited, or at any time previously to the aforesaid 1st or 2d of January next, as the case may be, the principal of the said certificate will be reimbursed, and the interest which shall have accrued thereon to the time of such surrender, will be paid.

secretary of the treasury.

[The public debt will receive a heavy reduction in the present year—for the revenue will be very large.]

AMERICAN INSTITUTE. The annual fair of this institute was held last week, at New York. There were 890 exhibitors, and vast crowds of persons attended to examine the goods; seven thousand being computed as the visitors in a single day! Many of the articles were of the first class for the goodness of their quality as well as beauty. Specimens of hemp and wool are highly spoken of, and the finest and best grass hat, "ever imported or exhibited" was present, the work of a young lady of Connecticut. The show of iron goods and wares was extensive—so were those of wool and cotton, in great variety and excellence—especially broadcloths and carpeting, and some handsome silk manufactures. As we expect to give a pretty full account of this fair, as well as of the exhibition of the Franklin Institute, at Philadelphia, it is not necessary to descend to particulars just now.

After the conclusion of the fair, Edward Everett, esq. of Massachusetts, delivered an oration in St. Matthew's church, which will be published of course. It is spoken of in lofty terms, by those who heard it—in number about 2,000, though yet a greater number could not press themselves into the building; and it was received with loud applause, notwithstanding it had been requested, by the president of the institute, that such should not be given at the church—but it was the fortune of the orator often to make the feelings of the audience captives to his eloquence, and keep the attention of a dense crowd riveted on him for an hour and a half. He was warmly greeted at the close.

FRANKLIN INSTITUTE. We have delightful accounts of the late splendid exhibition of domestic manufactures, at Philadelphia. Many of the delegates to the "free trade convention" attended, and, probably, never before saw anything better calculated to excite patriotic feelings—for we suppose that every patriot must rejoice in the prosperity of our common country. How "cold and dead" would any one be that could not find pleasure in seeing the hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton which pass from the interior of the southern states to the sea-board, to reward labor and capital?

Among the articles exhibited were two splendid pieces of broad cloth, worth $10 a yard, made out of American wool, and bearing this inscription—"The manufacturer's skill, and the widow and the orphan's labor." It is stated that many of the "free trade" delegates, on seeing the goods exhibited and ascertaining their price, were astounded at their quality and cheapness, as well as at the variety and extent of them. The greater part of these persons have no idea that leather and its manufactures are worth more than the whole crop of cotton—that such manufactures are protected by a duty of thirty per cent. which they think must needs be "a tax on consumers" and yet that these manufactures are at least thirty per cent. cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain! Thus, instead of paying ten millions tax because of this protection, ten millions are saved because we make and manufacture rather at home. I well remember when large quantities—tens of thousands of pairs of shoes, were imported—now we export tens of thousands of pairs—so with hats, cabinet wares, chairs, coaches, saddlery, nails, gunpowder, copper, cotton goods, &c. Is the duty on like goods, if imported into the United States, charged on the cost of our own when purchased by foreigners? If so, John Bull must be a "confounded fool" to trouble himself so much to keep them out of foreign markets, or counterfeit them. John isn't a fool—he is much closer allied to something else, in all matters of trade!—as some of his doings to prevent the sale of our manufactures in South America have clearly shewn.

NEGRO CLOTHING. From 1824 until 1828, the chief supplies of coarse woollen goods for the southern market came from the northern states—and were acknowledged by those who used them to be better and cheaper than any with which they had ever before been furnished; but after the forced duty on coarse wool, the Canton company, of Massachusetts, whose works cost $100,000—suspended operations, and the establishment, after remaining idle until last spring, was then sold to a new company for $120,000—and such cloths as had

*The leather made in the state of New York was last year valued at $2,905,750—say three millions; in 1810 reported at only 1,079,742 dollars—or less than one eighth of the whole return in that year. But, probably, the present manufacture of leather in New York is equal to one fifth of the whole made in the United States—say 15 millions. From inquiry, we estimate that the labor of boot and shoe-makers, saddlers, &c., is about 60 per cent. of the value of the leather, for an average; and think that 7-8ths of all the leather made passes through the hands of the dependent trades or manufactures. Then—

Whole value of leather, as a material	$15,000,000
Advance on 13 millions worth of leather, at 60 cents in the dollar's worth of its ultimate manufactures	19,500,000

Total annual value	34,500,000
--------------------	------------

Now this allows only 205 cents to each person, including all the uses made of leather, for boots, shoes, saddlers, harness, book binding, coach and trunk making, ship building, &c. &c.

been freely supplied for 30 cents a yard rose to 45, and now are out of the market. The effect of these proceedings rests where it should. Left-handed legislation has met with its reward.*

Again—we have many and valuable manufactures of cotton canvas, cotton osanburgs, cotton flannels, cotton blankets, and a very strong sort of cotton goods called beaver-teens. All these are cheap—much cheaper than such necessary articles were ever before supplied for our consumption; and the new applications of cotton should also be respected by those who produce the commodity! But neither such cheapness in price, nor demand for their product, seems to have any degree of influence over the heated passions of the south. These manufactures also, must be destroyed, it possible—though, as in the case of coarse woollens, fifty per cent. may be added to the cost of clothing the slaves.

There is something in all this that is not reducible to any fixed rules of action among thinking men. The cry of distress prevails among the cotton planters of South Carolina, while those of Louisiana are remarkably prosperous and entirely content. The one blames the tariff as the author of every evil—the other supports it as a source of invaluable good.

MANUFACTURE OF EDGE TOOLS. In the last volume, page 394, we briefly noticed a valuable factory of edge-tools at Chambersburg, Pennsylvania. Since then we have learned some other particulars, which we shall state with great pleasure—to show the success that has attended an important branch of manufactures, which we had apprehended would be a much longer time in reaching that degree of perfection which is indispensably necessary to obtain the home market, because of the quality and price of the articles offered to the consumption.

This establishment owes its present extension, if not its origin, to the tariff of 1828, though its products are rather incidentally than fully protected. It is situated in the borough of Chambersburg on the Conococheague, (meaning, in the language of the Delawares, "Clear Water") creek—the supply of which is abundant, and the fall, within the town, is 40 feet. It was commenced in 1828, with 5 or 6 smith's fires, and now has 14. In 1828, the value of the goods manufactured was 6,000 dollars—in 1830, $18,000; and that of the current year is expected to exceed $30,000; and new works are erecting to increase the manufacture to 50,000 dollars a year. The present consumption is at the rate of 40 tons of first rate iron per annum, with proportionate quantities of steel, &c. Thirty grind stones, worth from 25 to 30 dollars each, and weighing more than a ton, being about 5 feet in diameter and about 12 inches wide, are annually used. They are supplied from York county. The transportations of materials and goods make a heavy item of expense—for about 2,000 bushels of mineral coal and 15,000 of charcoal are used, employing many persons, horses, &c. Forty workmen are employed in the factory, and the wages paid amount to 7,000 dollars per annum—which, with the various other disbursements, in cash, give a rapid and wholesome circulation to money. The chief articles manufactured are axes, hatchets, adzes and hammers, in all their varieties—drawing and straw knives, socket chisels, cleavers, choppers, inslaves and screw drivers; and trowels, butcher's and other knives, fleshers, workmen and currying knives, have been made to advantage, but the demand for the first named articles has lessened the manufacture of the latter, and the quality and cheapness of these things, so far as their extent goes, places British competition at defiance, and has effect to keep and circulate a large amount of money at home, afford employment in many interesting departments, and give value to articles which otherwise would have none, because of the want of demand.

*In 1804, a writer in a Charleston paper earnestly recommended the manufacture of a strong cloth of cotton warp and wool filling, saying it would sell for from fifty-five to seventy cents per yard. This was exactly the description of goods made by the Canton company, and sold, soon after the tariff of 1828, at from thirty to thirty-five cents per yard. Before that tariff, Welsh plains were worth 6½ cents a yard—a year after that tariff was passed, they sold for less than 40 cents a yard.

We mentioned that certain goods from this factory had been sent to England as patterns, and the result is shown in the following very interesting extract of a late letter from Mr. Dunlop, one of the proprietors. He says "We [Dunlop and Madeira] a few days ago received a letter from Messrs. Lexley and Meredith, hardware merchants in Philadelphia, stating in substance, that they had just received a long letter from James Cam, of Sheffield, England, to whom they had forwarded, by order of his son, $50 worth of our goods as patterns, in which he says—'he is very much pleased with them, and that they are exceedingly neat and well finished, but that the prices are too low, and that he cannot furnish such tools at their price to suit any market in the United States. We sold him the goods at OUR RETAIL PRICE. He wishes to know your wholesale prices. The English workman has great difficulty in hitting your patterns, and asks a considerable advance on any new article. We need not fear any competition with the English. American tools of the larger sort are from 10 to 20 per cent. better than the British, any how.'"

Such is the prompt effect of the enterprise and talents of Messrs. Dunlop and Madeira. The Mr. Cam alluded to is one of the largest manufacturers of heavy cutlery in England; and he shrinks from the competition of quality and price.

Those who recollect that the British manufacturers for the foreign and the home market are very different persons—will easily understand this. The quality of American manufactured goods generally, because of an equal responsibility, is the same, (if not better in some cases), as of those which are manufactured in England for home consumption, and their price is generally about the same. This fact is especially known in all the chief manufacturers of leather, skins and furs, wood, &c. such as boots and shoes, hats and caps, ships and cabinet wares, for examples—all which are handsomely protected in the United States. The aggregate value of the class of manufactures last alluded to, cannot fall short of 70 or 80 millions of dollars a year—or much more than the whole amount of our domestic exports.

TAXES, TAXES, TAXES! The value of manufactures of leather in the United States is about	$35,000,000
Of hats and caps	15,000,000
Of household and kitchen furniture, &c.	15,000,000
Of wagons, carts, coaches and other carriages and agricultural tools, &c.	10,000,000
Of coats, vests, and other tailor's work	10,000,000
Of paper, books, binding and newspapers, and various stationery articles	10,000,000
Of (ladies) hats, caps and bonnets, lace, artificial flowers, umbrellas, &c.	8,000,000
Soap, candles, tobacco, beer, cider, buttons, pen-knives, wooden clocks and "wooden nutmegs" &c.	7,000,000
	<hr/> 110,000,000

Product of other mechanics—excluding, all the makers and workers in iron, lead or other metals—in wool, cotton, and all the principal branches of what are commonly known by the term manufactures

200,000,000

This aggregate is a far less amount than the annual product of the several mechanical branches of business, and on all such products there is an average duty of about 30 per cent.

Now Mr. Raguet, and all the "free trade" people tell us, that upon every "cradle" and coffin of the value of ten dollars there is a tax of three dollars, and hence the mechanics of the United States tax the rest of the people at least sixty millions of dollars a year—notwithstanding the articles they supply for the consumption are of less cost than like articles in Great Britain! And there is a tax of 6½ cents on every square yard of coarse cotton, though the selling price of it has been as low as 7 or 8 cents! Nay, at the present price of flour in England, the tax on every barrel that we use is not less than one dollar! There is also a tax of five cents per pound on nails, though the price is only about 5½—a tax on potatoes, cord-wood and onions!—on hay, peaches and water-melons!

THE FUR AND LEATHER CAP MANUFACTORY, of Messrs. Packer, Prentice & Co. of Albany, (having also a warehouse in N. York), employs 200 males and 450 females, disbursing 1,800 dollars in weekly wages! The chief materials used in this factory are manufactured, or prepared, by the concern. The business transacted amounts to several hundred thousand dollars a year—the wages, alone, being about 100,000. Hadn't all this better be sent to support the king and lords and bishops of England, with their army and navy and paupers? This manufacture is protected by a duty of 30 per cent. but the caps supplied from it are cheaper, far cheaper, than England can furnish them—free of duty.

HOW IT WORKS. In the year ending 1st October 1830—there were imported into Providence, R. I. 61,887 barrels of flour, 396,928 bushels of corn, and 18,857 bushels of rye. In the year ending October 1, 1831—75,164 barrels of flour, 243,290 bushels of corn and 11,172 bushels of rye.

In the first year, 43,000 bales of cotton, imported at Providence, were consumed—in the last year 53,378 bales; and the stock on hand, 30th September 1831, was 12,730 bales—to wit, 5,430 Louisiana and Alabama 5,691 upland, 354 sea-land.

About 5,000 barrels of flour are annually used at one flannel manufacturing village in Massachusetts—with large quantities of southern corn, &c.

We have no doubt that a greater quantity of flour proceeds from New York, and the states south and west, to New England, than is sent to all foreign nations. This business has almost exclusively grown up because of the establishment of manufactures. Hitherto, it was only the wealthy people of New England that consumed southern bread-stuffs—but now, labor being rendered profitable, many sets of half-a-dozen villages that might be grouped, are worth many times as much as the growers of wheat will obtain from an opening of the West India ports—unless flour shall be carried in British bottoms from Canada, Nova Scotia, &c.

BROOM CORN. The manufactures of broom corn are worth some hundred thousand dollars a year, through "Yankee contrivances." A young Yankee has just invented a machine to clean it very neatly, and with great rapidity. If England would receive this manufacture freely—it would help to pay for many bales of thread, tape and buckram; and probably keep half a million of hard dollars for the home circulation.

"NANKIN COTTON." We have seen specimens of this cotton, and hope that it will become an interesting item in the manufactures or exports of our country. It is thus noticed in an account of the late exhibition of domestic manufactures at Philadelphia.

"But perhaps the most interesting part of the exhibition, is that of the American nankins made by Mr. Callet, of Paterson, New Jersey, from cotton grown by the hon. John Forsyth, of Georgia. This variety of cotton is believed to be at present exclusively raised by the above mentioned gentleman, on his estate, near Sparta, Georgia. It requires no dying, the cotton yielding of itself a natural and permanent nankin yellow color."

THE YANKEES! One man at Charlestown, Massachusetts, has gathered 363 lbs. of squashes from one seed—another at Portsmouth plucked an apple from one of his trees that weighed 1 lb. 10 oz.—and the cow of a third dextrously shook a quince tree, and eat a peck of the golden fruit! A fourth makes about 2,000 dollars a year by the manufacture of shaving boxes to assist the operation of nullifying the beards of southern gentlemen—A fifth grows water-melons weighing 39½ lbs. So they go on. With any thing—from a shaving box to a ship, from contriving wooden nutmegs to the use of the bayonet—from making edict to handling 32-pounders, the Yankee always wishes to "go a-head!"

and he will sit down, with a pen knife, to make a clock out of cedar shingles—or enter for a three year's voyage to the Pacific to harpoon whales—"just as it happens!" Two of them, some years ago, took a trip to Canton in an old sloop, in which they built an oven and commenced the manufacture of gingerbread; and, having gathered money, returned with a "considerable" cargo of teas, which they picked up "in trade." And one who had recently, peradventure, returned from a voyage among the frozen islands of the south, to catch seal—lately managed a team of one hundred and fifty pairs of oxen at a cattle show, marching and countermarching them like a well drilled company of soldiers, at eunimad! We may next hear of him teaching a school, or hammering horse-shoes—budding a mill, weaving cotton table cloths, or making mouse-traps! His only motto is "ONWARD!"—always onward.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. We have the fifth annual report of the president and directors of this road to the stockholders. It is a very interesting paper, and shall speedily have an insertion. It announces that seventy-one miles of rail road will be opened for the transport of persons and goods in the present year; and that, notwithstanding the very heavy cost of the first division, the average of these 71 miles, with a double set of rails, will not exceed 27,128 dollars per mile. The average cost from Ellicott's mills to the Potomac will be no more than 20,168 dollars a mile; which rate, it is confidently stated, will carry the road to the coal mines in Alleghany county. About two-thirds of the whole line is laid on stone rails.

VERMONT. The legislative power of this state is in the hands of the anti-masons, having a majority in "joint ballot." As there was "no choice" for governor, he will then be anti-masonic. There appears, however, to be a small majority against them in the house of representatives—several ballottings having been had to elect a speaker without success—three candidates being voted for.

NEW JERSEY. The election of members of the legislature of this state was held last week. One account says, that the parties in both branches are equally divided—another, that the council (senate) is so divided, and that in the house of representatives there are 26 Jackson and 24 Clay members—which seems to be the true result. Some division in the latter party is said to have produced this unexpected result. The Jackson party had a majority of 20 in the last legislature.

PENNSYLVANIA ELECTION. From the quadrangular warfare at the polls of this state, it is not easy to determine the real strength of any of the parties. There is the "Jackson" party, the "Jackson and Wolf" party, the "national republican" party and the "anti-masonic" party, and, in some instances, the "working men's" party. The first, as we understand the state of things, is Jackson throughout, the second, Jackson for the time being, the third Clay against the field, the fourth for Mr. Wirt. The term "democratic ticket" has, in many places, superseded that of "Jackson ticket," and is made up, (as in Philadelphia, for example), of gentlemen of various political preferences, but agreeing on what we regard first principles—all being friendly to the "American System." When the returns are in, we shall, perhaps, give a general statement of the result.

SOUTH CAROLINA. A vacancy in the house of representatives of this state, lately occurred by the decease of one of the Charleston delegation, and a most ardent campaign took place in that city. The unprecedented number of 2,700 votes were taken—for Mr. Keith, (nullifier), 1,354; Mr. Robinson, (union), 1,346—majority for nullification only 8. This is called a "glorious victory," and there was a great entertainment at the circus, in consequence. At the late election for intendant, the free trade and state rights party had a majority of 108 votes.

GEORGIA. There has been a very close election for governor in this state, and the result is yet uncertain—present returns, Lumpkin 24,698, for Gilmer, (now governor) 23,792. Lumpkin is of the Clark and Gilmer of the Troup party. We know not what they differ about—but they do violently differ. The "Milledgeville Journal" 13th, has some further returns—says, generally that Mr. Lumpkin is about 1,500 votes ahead, and that 12 counties were yet to be heard from. From the manner of the "Journal," (a Troup paper), we suppose that Mr. L. is elected.

MISSISSIPPI. The late census of this state shows the following results: white males 38,497, females 32,121—total 70,618 whites; slaves 66,692; free persons of color 529; grand total 136,806.

FAYETTEVILLE. We think there are many reasons why a full account of the voluntary contributions made for the relief of the sufferers by the calamitous fire at Fayetteville, should have been published. We have not heard that it has been.

MISSOURI. Many candidates are before the people to supply the place in congress made vacant by the unhappy death of Mr. Pettis, and the controversy is proceeding to great lengths, indeed. The Missouri Republican gives us the following extract from the "Western Monitor," edited by James H. Birch, who is one of the candidates to represent the state of Missouri in the congress of the United States:

"We commence to-day, the powerful speech of colonel Benton, against re-chartering this dangerous institution," and continued it, in every line and letter, to the dissipated consideration of the democracy of the country. A letter from St. Louis, of the first instant, says—"the two parties are already beginning to separate upon it, in reference to the successor of the lamented Pettis;" and adds, "he will have died in vain if a bank-man is elected in his place." We know moreover—and other friends of Mr. Pettis know the same fact—that he never ceased to avenge the controversy into which he was forced, and the consequent violent end he encountered, to the desire which was felt to elect in his place, a friend and supporter of this man-destroying institution. On this chilling subject, we have the promise of more ample developments, in the shape of a written statement, left by the deceased, for the purpose of being used by the republican party after his own voice had been hushed in death. It will add to the fame of this gallant and intrepid champion of the people, that, having borne their banner triumphant in life, he died a martyr to the doctrine of equal rights and privileges."

Which, "by interpretation," means, that the bank of the United States mediated and brought about the death of Mr. Pettis, even at the sacrifice of major Biddle!

What NEXT?

The Boston Traveller—gives an extract of a letter from a friend in Missouri, detailing minutely the circumstances of the duel. The writer was a warm friend of Mr. Pettis, and, among other things, says—

"I urged the duelling out of major Biddle, after the election, and at the same time I knew the major would take the distance above given. But, under the same feelings I would have advised my brother to lose his life in the same way. The death of Mr. Pettis, with its attending circumstances, has wrought a complete change in some of my sentiments. I have advocated duelling in the abstract, and on principle; but this melancholy scene, the recollection of which, is filled with so many unpleasant reflections, will not permit me to countenance the practice, at least not until the memory of this shall fade. A dark cloud rests upon that transaction whenever my mind reverts to it. The course—blind, rash and murderous—which I urged in this unfortunate affair, has left stings with me which nothing but religion can extract. I have had few moments of peace since the death of my worthy friend."

The intemperate proceedings of the parties—and it would seem that (as is generally the case), both were in fault, led to the fatal result, which hurried two much valued men into eternity.

* Bank of the United States.

Mr. Woodberry, the present secretary of the navy, seems to be earning for himself "golden opinions," because of his prompt and courteous attention to business.

MR. RANDOLPH. The Baltimore Patriot says, that Mr. Randolph left this city on Wednesday morning last, by steam boat, for Richmond.

MR. CROCKETT. From the official returns of the recent election in the Western district of Tennessee, it appears that the enormous number of sixteen thousand four hundred and eighty-two votes were polled, of which Mr. Fitzgerald received the slim majority of 586 votes.

MR. McDUFFIE, &c. The "free trade and state rights" men of South Carolina seem to have a gloomy time of it, under the oppressions of the tariff, for almost every week we have an account of some great dinner given to some great man, at which there was plenty of eating and drinking, and—talking.*

At an entertainment just given to governor Hamilton at Edgemoor, Mr. McDuffie and other distinguished persons were present. His excellency made a "powerful speech," and was loudly cheered, and Mr. McDuffie, on being toasted, made a speech too. The account says that "he gave a most interesting detail of the recent trial in Charleston on the custom house bond, demonstrating that, in the very spirit of the tyranny by which the iniquitous American System is forced upon the south, trial by jury was sacrificed by the 'evidence of special pleading'—he illustrated the gross inequality and injustice of the protecting system, by contrasting the conditions by nature and the conditions by federal legislation, of the northern and southern sections of the confederacy—and manifested his opinion of the proper remedy for the grievances of the south in the following sentiment:

"The conservative principle of our confederated republic—the right of resisting oppression through the judicial tribunal of the country, under the sanction of state sovereignty."

All this is very fine—nullification "up to the hub." But—

In Alabama, the people eat and drink and make speeches, as well as in South Carolina—and they are pretty nearly as effective as those of the last named state. It seems that a public dinner was given at Tusculoo to Mr. Gayle, recently elected governor of Alabama at which also many distinguished persons were present. The following toasts shew the character of the meeting—

The memory of George Washington, the father of his country. Never did a father leave to his children so glorious an inheritance, as the example of his life, nor so valuable a legacy as his farewell address—The first should be contemplated with unceasing veneration, and the latter profoundly studied, and its principles earnestly followed, by every American who loves his country, its institutions and liberty.

James Madison. A venerable patriot yet spared to us, a profound constitutional lawyer and enlightened statesman—The times demand his advice and opinions, and his countrymen should bow to them as the saving admonitions and oracles of political virtue and truth.

The union of the states. The only basis on which our federal government can stand—May it be eternal as the everlasting hills.

Nullification. The Trojan horse, carrying within disunion, anarchy and civil war. If once permitted to enter the temple of our liberty, ruin, devastation, and slavery, will inevitably follow.

And Mr. Gayle, on being specially complimented, among other things, returned to the length of time which he had been in public life, the part he had taken, and the principles by which he had been governed; and concluded by a most masterly review of the doctrine of "nullification," in which he demonstrated with a force and clearness not to be resisted, the unconstitutionality and danger of this modern heresy. He fortified his positions by a reference to the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of '98, and the Virginia report of '99, and the opinions of Patrick Henry, James Madison, Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, and illustrated and embellished the whole by pointing out in the most beautiful manner the benefits which we had derived from the union, the pride and dignity of Americans wherever they were, proceeding from the liberty, freedom and happiness of their country, and by drawing a frightful and gloomy, but true, picture of the condition to which we would be reduced by a conflict of force between the general and state governments, and dissolution of the union, which he contended would inevitably result from the doctrine of nullification if practically adopted. He gave as a sentiment:

* The "Unionists" also seem to think that something may be done in this way, and have their meetings and dinners in various parts of South Carolina—which are numerously and powerfully attended.

"The union. It must be preserved."

The speech and toast were received with "loud and rapturous cheers."

The following queer anti-nullification-nulifying paragraph is from the Richmond Enquirer: He is a lucky fellow who understands it! The editor seems afraid of his own thoughts.

"The wonder with us is, how any of the friends of state rights in South Carolina, should ever have entertained any hope of redress from the federal court. In the first place, the tariff law is so constructed as to forbid the question of its constitutionality coming fairly before the court. If this be not one of the many instances of usurped power; which (to use the words of Madison's report) the forms of the constitution would never draw within the control of the judiciary department, the very form of the law itself would forbid it. In the second place, if it could fairly come before that tribunal, it would not be safe to carry it there. We confess, we should expect very little from a body so constituted as that is, so guided by vicious precedents, so penetrated with strong federal doctrines, so little disposed to protect the rights of the states. No, no, our hope is not fixed on that anchor—the rights of the states must depend on the states and on the people—not on a tribunal constituted as that court is."

MR. COLEMAN, recently ejected from congress by the people of Maysville district, Kentucky, has been appointed post-master at Maysville in place of his brother-in-law, resigned. It is a snug office—said to be worth 1,500 dollars a year.

A "FREE TRADER!" Shortly after its date, and in due course of the mail, I received a letter post-marked at Cincinnati, June 16, and for which I was sendled out of twenty-five cents postage.—But that's nothing—it will relieve the finances of the general post office, and so pay off the national debt.

Cincinnati, June 14, 1831.

Mr. Niles—You are a villain, and I know it.

A subscriber to the Banner of the Constitution, or W. S."

Mr. Raguet had better examine his Cincinnati list, and strike off "W. S." for he'll not pay "the printer!" As for myself, I hope to survive, as well this knowledge of me, as the fraud of 25 cents; and as the gentleman so well knows me, I have taken measures that the public may know him; and if his name is worth publishing in capitals, he may expect to see it "Registered."

ANOTHER COMPLIMENT! Some "good natured friend" has forwarded to me the "Florida Gazette" of the 27th Aug. published at St. Francisville, La., by a certain "J. Eckley"—a gentleman that I never heard of before, who has obtained some types and a keg of ink to back them. The leading paragraph under the editorial head begins thus—"We regret to see that our thick skulled, flat headed, ugly, stupid, and wicked ci-devant secretary Ingham, has again offended the public ear with his complaints. He raves in one breath like some imaginary hero in bedlam, and in the next he whines about persecution like a sick child," and so forth. This article is followed by one in which the editor of the REGISTER is pronounced a host within himself, in the way of abuse and vituperation "calling to his aid every vile scrap of filth and trash and slander that can be culled from the opposit on papers," and so forth; and simply because he threw back, with contempt, certain mad sayings of the chief organ of the nation of South Carolina!

Mr. Eckley must have breakfasted on an alligator stuffed with rattle-snakes, and hoisted with coarse black pepper. Well—if such suits his own stomach and pleases his neighbors, I have nothing to say against his taste; and it establishes his whole hoggin without doubt.

YET ANOTHER! The following is from the "St. Louis Beacon," of which a senator of the United States has the credit of being the real editor:

"Our friends will see that the Jackson party has gained a great victory in Baltimore. The defeat of HEZEKIAH NILES is a double one—both as a violent anti-Jacksonist and the old champion of the American System. Mr. Niles has published a Manufacturer's Journal—nicknamed by way of contradistinction, Weekly Register—about a quarter of a century in Baltimore; and now the author is signally and decidedly overthrown in his own city.  This is the way that Jackson is losing ground!"

The defeat of "Hezekiah Niles," as a private individual, was not unexpected, and is—nothing; such result having no more influence over the political character of the legislature of the state, than a highroad or two of water taken from the Missouri would check the progress of that river in its junction with the Mississippi but his rejection as "the old champion of the American System" is—something, and may pass for a "sign of the times;" notwithstanding no person can be elected to any responsible place by the people of Baltimore, who shall openly profess himself an opponent of that system. Party has not yet gone as far that our citizens will fairly quarrel with their bread and butter, on account of it.

AND NOW PER CONTRA! At a late public dinner at Cambridge,* Maryland, Hezekiah Niles was warmly toasted, (but the toast is mislaid), and more recently at another at Chestertown,* the following was given as the 6th regular toast—

Hezekiah Niles.—The able sentinel, he never deserts his post; if gratitude is due to public benefactors, so is encouragement to those enlightened patriots who labor to sustain national industry.

And at the great meeting of the people of Baltimore on Saturday evening last, at the Exchange, more than a thousand of the chief capitalists or most worthy of the productive men, (and of all political parties), being present—the following resolution was offered, and received in a manner that seemed to shake the noble and lofty dome under which the citizens were assembled. I wish the editor of the "Beacon," whether a senator of the United States or a mere stickler of types, may occasionally for such a flow of fervent gratitude and humble thankfulness as I felt, when the bone and sinew of our population thus unexpectedly greeted me, and my valued and venerable friend—

Resolved, That the friends of Domestic Industry in the city of Baltimore and its vicinity, highly appreciate the services of Hezekiah Niles, of the city of Baltimore, and Matthew Carey, of the city of Philadelphia, in the great cause to which they have devoted their labors; and that the persevering and arduous efforts of these enlightened citizens to inform and direct public opinion in the proper estimate of the true sources of our national prosperity, entitle them to the applause of the country.

MAJORITY. The triangular wars among parties in the states which require majorities to elect public officers, will probably bring about a relief to the people,

*It may be well to observe, for the information of the editor of the "Beacon," that Cambridge and Chestertown are on the Eastern Shore, and that the people of this part of Maryland were almost unanimously opposed to the "American System" a very short time ago. Here is comfort for the Beacon editor! for at each of those entertainments were large numbers of the "chuseu people"—cultivators of the soil.

for the waste of money and time which attends a performance of their duty at the polls. It seems very possible that the seats of three or four members of congress from Massachusetts and Vermont will remain vacant, because of the struggles between the "National Republican" and "Anti-Masonic" parties, which gives to the "Jackson party" the power of preventing a choice, though hopeless of electing its own candidates. Another unsuccessful attempt—the 6th, we believe, has been made to elect a member of congress from the 4th district of Vermont.

QUEER PARAGRAPH. The Washington Globe says—"We imagine that the American people will consider the peace and prosperity of the country safest under the deliberations of the great councils composed of their own legitimate representatives; and, trusting in their wisdom, we should have no fear of the union, if Mr. Clay were dead."

ANTI-MASONRY. With the reception of such a letter as Mr. Wirt's addressed to the "National Anti-masonic convention," we believed that the anti-masons of Massachusetts would have felt satisfied with gov. Lincoln's letter to their committee; but it seems that they are not. Their first nominated Mr. Adams, late president of the United States, for the office of governor, and, he having declined, they have taken up Samuel Lathrop, esq. in opposition to gov. Lincoln.

THEATRICAL BUNNY. There was a grand uproar at the Park theatre, New York, on the evening of the 15th, because of the appearance of an English singer, named Anderson. It is stated, that during his voyage he had so much abused the "ill-d yankees," as to have received a sound beating for it. This being noised about, the theatre was crowded, and, the moment Anderson appeared, he was met with hisses, cat-calls and cries of "off, off." He kept his station however, the play proceeded, and was gone through in dumb show. Mr. A. then published a card, denying that he had spoken disrespectfully of the American people, and hoping that what happened in a private quarrel might not prejudice the public against him. We like the feeling displayed on this occasion—but it may have had a wrong direction. It is sufficient, we think, that persons dissatisfied with performers—should let the theatre "alone!"

A second appearance of Mr. Anderson produced a mighty "row." Several thousand persons, within and without the theatre, appear to have taken part in the important affair! Many acts of violence were committed—and the police, including all the watchmen, had an arduous time of it. The result was the entire withdrawal of the offending party from the stage of that theatre. The narrative of events occupy several columns in the New York papers! There were a good many act-toss in the theatre, in which some Englishmen, (who appear to have rallied on the occasion), were pretty severely handled.

FOR NAPLES. We see it stated that Mr. John Nelson, of Frederick, Maryland, has been appointed "minister to Naples." If so, it is a renewal of the principle of the Panama mission of Mr. Adams, and the more recent Constantinople affair of general Jackson. They all rest upon the same foundation. We have no minister at Naples—there is no vacancy—and the appointment is one altogether de novo. It is said that Mr. Nelson has accepted the appointment and will depart next month.

A USEFUL CITIZEN. The Fredericktown Herald gives the following character, justly due to Philip E. Thomas, of Maryland, the president of the Baltimore and Ohio road company:

"He is a financier and engineer, mechanic and artist; he can direct the drilling of the laborers or a blast in a rock—ever fruitful in expedients, and indefatigable in the application of them. In the language of a friend, he is 'up to everything,' and if it were not for his straight coat, he would make an excellent commanding general of an army!"

CALCULATION! The Albany Argus, taking 48,000 as the basis of a representation, gives the following allotment and estimate of the presidential election of 1832. For Jackson Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and all the rest of the states that follow on the usual list, with 5 in Maryland—total 232; for Clay, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware and 5 in Maryland, total 47, for Wirt, Vermont—7.

EMBEZZLEMENT. A fraud practised on the bank of New York as far back as 1820 and 1827 has just been discovered, in a forced or forged balance of one of the accounts, and the amount of such settlement is 40,000 dollars. One of the chief clerks at that time is suspected of this ingenious proceeding, which he appears to have thought would never be discovered.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Auguste Davizac, of Louisiana, to be charge d'affaires of the United States, near his majesty the king of the Netherlands.

James A. Dunlap, of Florida, to be attorney of the United States for the middle district of Florida, vice James G. Ringgold, deceased.

James Buchmann, of Pennsylvania, minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of St. Petersburg, vice John Raulolph, resigned.

"CRUSHED SUGAR." United States vs. Ebenezer Breed & Co. We learn from the Boston Gazette, that in this case, which has been on trial several days in the district court of the United States, the jury on Friday, returned a verdict in favor of the defendants. The action was brought to recover the difference of duty (about 20,000 dollars) on a large quantity of sugar imported about a year since from London, and entered as powdered sugar, paying four cents per lb. and which was alleged to be loaf or lump sugar, "crushed," and subject to a duty of 10 or 12 cents. This case has excited much interest.

In addition to the above the Boston Patriot remarks—Mr. Dunlap moved for a new trial, which motion is under consideration by the court. Suits have been instituted on bonds given for similar importations by other houses in that city. The defence set up was that the sugar in question was not commercially known as loaf or lump sugar, and was not so valuable, selling at about the rate of powdered sugar.

TAK CHOLERA. Near Novogorod thirty medical persons have been infamously massacred by the people, under the pitiable delusion that the cholera morbus is the effect of poison administered by the physicians and foreigners to thin the number of the Russian peasantry. So much for the respect and confidence in their superiors, and the peaceable submission to their lot, which the want of education breeds in an uncivilized nation!

Not only these and other popular excesses of a similar nature, but mutinies of the soldiery, ending in the murder of no inconsiderable number of officers in the military colonies, remain unpunished, and report says that discretion and moderation, that is pusillanimity and impotence, will prevent any inquiry being instituted. So much for the vigor with which despotism arms its legitimate autocrats for the security of its servants and subjects.

All precautions against the disease which ravages the empire have been abandoned, either at the mandate of a rabble colored by bloodshed and massacre in the hospitals of St. Petersburg, or by the narrow and ignorant enmity of the ministers of commerce and finance, who either deny the contagious nature of the malady, or prefer the revenue of the state to the health and safety of the community.—There is indeed an exception. One place is encircled by an impenetrable sanitary cordon and while his subjects are dying in agonies of a painful and infectious complaint, the sovereign is protected from its approach in his voluntary isaretto of Peterhoff.

THE CROWN JEWELS of England are worth a great deal of money, as such things are estimated. The "invaluable jewels" as they are called in a London paper in the queen's crown, are valued at £111,900. The crown weighs 19 oz. 10 dwts.—is made of gold, but is covered with diamonds so that not a particle of the gold can be seen.

THE KENSINGTON. The officers of this ship while lying at Portsmouth, Eng. had some quarrel about civility, with certain British naval officers, for which they demanded satisfaction and so forth; they afterwards wished to withdraw their note, but it had passed into the hands of admiral Coghington. The K. passed through Spithead on the 30th August, without saluting the flag of the commander-in-chief. The English are under a mistake in supposing this vessel to belong to the navy of the United States. She is, or will be on her arrival, the property of the emperor of Russia, and never belonged to the U. S.

A LUCKY FAMILY! The Beresford family in Ireland, have long been celebrated for their devotion to the ruling power in England, and ever-readiness to perform any work assigned them—and they have been wonderfully "rewarded," by offices in the state and church; fastening themselves, however, especially on the latter. There are in Ireland four archbishops and 18 bishops, of the established religion. Within the last 20 years, it is stated that the Beresfords have possessed the bishopricks of Kilmore, Cork, Raphoe and Clogher, and the archbishopricks of Tuam, Dublin and Armagh—some of them by translations, as the death of incumbents presented increased "shearings of the flocks"—these people always going on from lat things to latter ones.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. In our last paper a notice was inserted requesting the citizens of Nashville and Davidson county, to meet at the court house on Saturday last, for the purpose of expressing their opinion in relation to the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States. A few persons, not exceeding seventy or eighty, assembled, col. Andrew Higgins was appointed chairman and Samuel Watson, esq. secretary. As soon as the meeting was organized, Chas. Biddle, esq. offered a preamble and resolutions declaring in substance that it was inexpedient, at the present time, to express any opinion on the subject. Before the question was taken, Dr. Boyl McNairy offered resolutions in favor of the renewal of the charter. The meeting was then addressed by Felix Grunty, esq. in favor of Mr. Biddle's resolutions, and by col. Andrew Erwin in favor of those submitted by Dr. McNairy. Mr. Biddle's resolutions were adopted and the meeting adjourned sine die. [Nashville Banner.]

THE HESSIANS. "At the bank of England," says a paragraph in the Lady's Magazine, for December 1786, "the sum of 471,000*l.* was transferred by Mr. Van Otten, on account of the Landgrave of Hesse, an much being due for Hessian soldiers lost in the American war, at thirty pounds a man." According to this calculation, the number of Hessians lost in the said war was 15,700.

[A good many of these deserted, and from them have descended some of the most worthy and respectable families in the middle states. One generation in America, is enough to convert even Hessian machines into rational freemen.]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN COLONIES. The steam ship Royal William has recently made the voyage from Quebec to Halifax, and back, in nineteen days, including all stoppages. This is regarded as an important event, because of the increased business of the British colonies, on account of an arrangement of the West India trade, which has given employment to a large amount of British tonnage, at the loss of employment for our own.

It is added, that the Royal William will probably be sent to England—and her departure is urged, "that the honor of priority in sending a steam ship across the Atlantic" may not be snatched from the Canadians by a like adventure from the United States! It is already forgotten that an American steam boat not only crossed the Atlantic, but proceeded to St. Petersburg and returned, some 10 or 12 years ago!

"A NUISANCE." The grand jury of Spartansburg South Carolina, has presented the "Free Trade Association" as a "nuisance!" [Branches of this association have been installed in many parts of the state, and it is those societies which are deemed a "nuisance."] South Carolina, we have no doubt, will "minister to herself," and heal the political diseases that prevail within.

BARBADOS. An account from Barbadoes, of the 5th September, states that 3,704 persons had then been found dead in the ruins, and the churches were full of the wounded.

ALGIERS. The vines and mulberries which were sent from France to Algiers, have thriven there remarkably well. The cultivation of cotton and indigo has been likewise introduced by some Frenchmen, into the immediate vicinity of Algiers, which promises to be a valuable colony for France in more respects than as a mere marine depot.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Judge Marshall. A Philadelphia paper of the 18th says—We learn with hearty satisfaction that the chief justice continues to do extremely well. Four days have now passed since the performance of the operation.

Henry Smyzer has been elected a representative in congress to fill a vacancy in the York district, Pennsylvania.

Trotting. The Philadelphia Chronicle says—At the Hunting Park course, on Thursday afternoon, the celebrated horse, Whalebone, trotted thirty-two miles, in harness, in one hour, fifty-seven minutes, and fifty-nine seconds; two hours, being allowed. He performed his task with apparent ease, though some time was lost by the breaking down of the sulky. Few bets could be had against him at less odds than three or four to one.

Silver mine. It is reported in Albany that a valuable silver ore has been, within a few days, discovered in great quantities in the county of Scholastic, in the state of New York.

Statue of Hamilton. The block of marble designed for the statue of Hamilton, has been brought to New York, in the brig Elizabeth, capt. Storry, from Lehigh, and it is the intention of Mr. Hughes, we learn, to commence the statue immediately. His known ability as a sculptor has created high expectations in relation to this undertaking. The statue when completed is to be placed in the large room of the Merchants' exchange. No place could be more appropriate for such a memorial of the man to whom this city is so largely indebted for its commercial prosperity.

Endicott pear tree. The famous pear tree planted by gov. Endicott in 1628, (203 years), on his farm in Danvers, then a part of Salem, has this year borne three bushels of pears. The species is bou-cretien. This tree has survived many generations of men, and is almost the only first settler remaining. [Sat. Reg.]

A great excitement seems to have prevailed at Charleston, against Mr. Charles McIntire, a wholesale dealer, because that certain children's handkerchiefs, of British manufacture, stamped with some offensive figures, had been sold at his store, without having been noticed by him. He says that this thing has been "blazed about the city," that "he is an innocent victim, injured beyond reparation," but it is not stated why these 75 cents per dozen things should have created so great an excitement.

A caution. A schoolmaster in Rensselaer county, N. Y. has been fined one thousand dollars for kissing one of his female pupils.

A long loan. The bank of the United States has loaned to the city of Cincinnati one hundred thousand dollars, at 5 per centum—the stock redeemable at the expiration of forty years.

"Cranberry day" is hereafter to be a festival at Barnstable, (Mass.) The Journal states that the town authorities had forbidden this valuable berry to be taken from the bogs on Sandy Neck, until ripe, and then to pay a stipulated part to the town. Sept. 20th was the day appointed, and 500 men, women, and children, had a fine frolic. Wet weather had probably reduced the crop one half; but from 150 to 200 bushels were picked.

Double marrying. A Catholic gentleman and an Episcopal lady were to be married a few days since in Connecticut. The lady insisted on the forms of her own church, and the gentleman was equally pertinacious in favor of a Catholic ceremony. Whereupon it was mutually agreed that each should be gratified. A clergyman was called, and being married Episcopally, the couple repaired to New York, and were married over again Catholically.

An ancient Highlander. There is at present living at Grulla, in the Isle of Skye, a man named John Macpherson, who has attained to the extraordinary age of 108 years. His faculties are still entire; his memory, in particular, being fresh and unimpaired. This veteran clansman, who has witnessed so many changes in his native country, still repines at the extinction of the feudal spirit by which the glory of clans and chiefs has been eclipsed. He remembers prince Charles Stuart, after the battle of Culloden, disguised as a female, and going under the name of Morag, in company with the celebrated Flora Macdonald.

Valuable cows. At the recent cattle show and farmer's fair, in Andover, (Mass.), two cows were exhibited, one of which, with feed from a common pasture, gave from the 2d of May to the 27th of September, 556 gallons of superior milk, being an average produce of four gallons per day. The other gave in the month of June, 17 quarts a day; there was made from her milk in one month, fifty pounds of good butter.

Ladies of the South Sea islands. The Rev. Mr. Stewart mentions, in his 'Visit to the South Seas,' that among the Nukuhivians, the belles are ambitious of white complexions.

"The uncommon fairness," he says, of many of the females, is the result of an artificial process, followed by an almost entire seclusion from the sun. The juice of a small indigenous vine called papa, possesses the quality of whitening the skin; and such as are particularly desirous of fair complexions, wash their whole persons every morning in a preparation of this, and wrapping themselves closely in their garments, keep within doors most of the day. When they do go out, they always make use of the large leaf of the palmetto for an umbrella. They usually bathe in the evening, and do not resort to the cosmetic again till morning."

New York. The three story brick house and lot, corner of Pine and William streets, was sold yesterday, by James Bleeker & Sons, for $22,000. The lot is 25 feet on Pine, and 68 on William street.

Lost labor. The Drovers' bank in New York was entered by false keys on a certain night last week—and, with great labor and skill, the occupants bore their way into the directors room, but could not bore themselves into the vault; and they retired after several hours' profitless work, unmolested.

English bishops. It is confidently asserted, that earl Grey is consulting with the Episcopal bench, for the purpose of curtailing the immense revenues of some of the bishoprics. In future the income of a bishop is not to exceed £5,000 a year, the surplus of his revenues is to go to a fund in aid of the building and repairing churches and chapels. The two Irish mitres, now vacant, are at once to come under the new arrangement.

[This measure will not produce any abatement of the oppressions on the people, or accomplish any public benefit. It will not satisfy either party in the war between church revenues and poor rates.]

Singular lady-bird. A lady of the Russian court, in the reign of Catherine the second, kept a slave, who was her perruquier, shut up in a cage in her own chamber. She let him out every day to arrange her head dress, and locked him up again with her own hands after the business of the toilet was over. His box was placed at her bed-head, and in this fashion he attended her wherever she went. He passed three years in this captivity, the object of which was to conceal from the world that this lady wore a wig.

[Memoires Secretes sur la Russie.

Gun locks. The New Hampshire papers describe a newly invented percussion gun lock, which is so constructed as to discharge the gun sixty times with one priming. The inventor is George W. Morse, son of the rev. B. Morse, of Haverhill, a lad of 17 years of age. The lock is entirely concealed within the stock, which is of the common form, with the exception of the trigger and guard, the latter being divided into two parts, one of which is movable, and drawn back when the gun is cocked, and serves as the hammer by which the percussion is produced.

Roger R. Taney. The honorary degree of L. L. D. was recently conferred on this gentleman by Dickinson college.

Maltmorency mills at Quebec. This establishment, the most extensive of the kind in North America, was totally destroyed by fire in the course of the night of the 25th ult. The Quebec Gazette states, that there were in the immediate vicinity of the mills about 150,000 deals, few of which have been saved. Of these, a number had been sold to different merchants in town. The mills, and by far the greater part of the timber, belonged to Peter Patterson, esq. The insurances are £3,000 on the mills, one-half insured at the Quebec office and the other half at the Alliance office, and £3,000 on the deals, also insured in equal proportions at the same offices. The value of the property lost cannot be much under £20,000, nearly $100,000.

Chief cities of the world. A very ingenious calculation is given in a late German publication of the hundred most populous cities in the world. These are Jeddo, in Japan, 1,680,000 inhabitants; Peking, 1,500,000; London, 1,500,000; Hans Ischen, 1,000,000; Calcutta, 900,000; Madras, 817,000; Nankin, 800,000; Congo Ischen, 800,000; Paris, 717,000; West China, 600,000; Constantinople, 597,000; Benares, 530,000; Kio, 520,000; Su Ischen, 500,000; Hong Ischen, 300,000, &c. The fortieth in the list is Berlin, containing 193,000; and the last, Bristol, 57,000. Among the hundred cities, two contain 1,500,000; two upwards of 1,000,000; nine from 500,000 to 1,000,000; twenty-three from 200,000 to 500,000; fifty-six from 100,000 to 200,000; and six from 57,000 to 100,000. Of these one hundred cities, fifty-eight are in Asia, and thirty-two in Europe; of which four are in Germany, four in France, five in Italy, eight in England, and three in Spain; the remaining ten are divided between Africa and America.

A reverend runaway. A writer in the N. H. Patriot states that the rev. Mr. Arnold, of Ossipee, who was tried last fall at Dover for abusing a child, lately attended at a four days' meeting at Sandwich and was caught in an "astonishing affair" with a girl, a recent convert; that his parish dismissed him, and that he then converted what property he had into cash, not even spring his wife's silver spoons, and ran away with his hopeful convert, to parts unknown.

Mary Ann Higgins, a handsome girl, aged 19, was convicted at Warwick assizes, of administering arsenic to her aged uncle, with a view to kill him and obtain his property. The old man died from the poison; the prisoner was believed to be instigated to the act by her sweet-heart, Edward Clarke, who was tried as an accessory, but acquitted. She was executed at Whitchy common, near Coventry. It is supposed that from 15 to 20,000 persons were present at the execution.

[London pap.]

Dog fish. A Boston paper of the 10th inst., says—The cod fishery on the banks and on shore has this season been unprofitable, in consequence of the innumerable dog fish which infest the grounds. Both the market fishermen from this quarter, and those who cure fish, make loud complaints of their depredations; they can scarcely get their hooks into the water before the bait is seized by the dog fish, which also drive off the cod and haddock. The dog fish are killed in vast numbers, yet they seem scarcely to be diminished. At this season they are so small, that their rough skins, used to polish furniture, &c., are not worth taking off. Late in the fall they are of some value.

Died, on the 22nd Sept., in Albemarle county, Virginia, col. Reuben Lindsay, in the 84th year of his age, a gallant soldier of the revolution, and a much valued private citizen.

—, at Wapahgonkonneta, about the 1st inst. Black-hoof, one of the chiefs of the Shawanoe tribe of Indians, aged about 114 years. He was well known throughout the western country, as a formidable enemy in war, although the latter part of his wayfaring life was devoted to the American cause. He was at St. Clair's, Harmer's, and Crawford's defeats, and perhaps, at the time of his death, was the last man living who was at Braddock's defeat.

An old sailor. Some of the papers state that captain Crocker, of the packet ship Pacific, has now completed his 160th passage across the Atlantic—they should say his hundred and sixty second passage.

[N. Y. Mer. Adv.]

A slave ship with 120 slaves on board, was lately wrecked on Anegada, one of the Virgin Islands; she struck so suddenly that it was impossible to unchain a majority of the poor wretches, and a large number were drowned.

"Big Sam," the British king's porter at Carlton house, was seven feet five inches high in his stocking feet, and a well made man. He was a Highlander.

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at Boston brings Liverpool dates to the 6th September, inclusive.

Preparations were making for the coronation of the king and queen of England, which was to have taken place on the 8th of September. The bishop of Canterbury had been selected to place the crown on their heads, who would also administer the oath; the bishop of London was to preach the sermon on the occasion. Several bishops would read the litany.

The reform bill was still progressing slowly, and it was expected that it might possibly get through the house of commons by the time of the coronation. The harvest was every where abundant in England, and the weather remarkably good.

The French government had delivered to the national guards 860,151 muskets, 216,000 sabres and 500 pieces of artillery. The army amounted, according to actual returns, to 403,000 men.

In Belgium affairs had been amicably adjusted, and king Leopold had reviewed a portion of the French army, which was to be forthwith withdrawn. His reception was enthusiastic.

The fate of Poland is truly alarming, and calculated to awaken the liveliest fears. The account of the disaffections of Warsaw are repeated, and at the very moment when the seeds of civil strife were germinating in the capital, the whole Russian army, in four divisions, was advancing upon it; so that under such disadvantageous circumstances, the liberty of the generous Poles are to be staked upon the issue of a single battle. The Russian army consists of 110,000 men while that of the Poles number but 50,000. The Polish out-posts retired before the approach of the Russians, who were within three leagues of Warsaw.

Since the above was in type, another arrival at New York, brings Liverpool dates to the 9th September.

ENGLAND.

The duteless of Kent will not attend the coronation of the king—nor permit her daughter, the princess Victoria, (a little girl who is the proscribed mistress of many millions of Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen), to attend! Here's the rub! This proceeding had caused a great excitement, and the duteless is pretty freely abused in the papers, as having forgotten from whence she came.

The "reform bill" passed through the committee of the house of commons on the 7th ultimo. The ordeal to which it is yet to be subjected may detain it some time longer before it reaches the upper house.

Bills were pending in the house of commons to reform existing abuses in Scotland and Ireland.

Money was scarce in England, and a great deal of distress among the merchants. A man named Keight, a workman in the mint, had absconded with 2,806 blank sovereigns—he is supposed to be residing near N. York.

FRANCE.

About 13,000 of the French army in Belgium will remain there for a time. Many officers of the French army at Marseilles, were about to resign, and fears were entertained that it would add to the elements of civil war, as the Carlists were continually on the alert, watching every movement which could possibly tend to advance the hopes of the fallen dynasty. The duteless of Berri was at Massu, where report says Charles the 10th had just arrived.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

A new protocol had been received requiring Belgium to give up the Dutchy of Luxemburg to Holland. The Clara Polder, a district of country containing about 1,500 acres of the finest land in Europe, had been inundated and the improvements destroyed, together with the present crops, by a breach made by the Dutch in the sea dyke to the east of the Capitaleum dam. What adds to the distress of the inhabitants is, the Dutch had forbid the closing of this break.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

The accounts from Poland are filled with deep and melancholy interest. General Skrzynecki has resigned the command of the army to general Dembinski, compelled, doubtless, by the force of circumstances, so to do, in order that faction might not have further pretext to injure his country, through their hostility and jealousy of himself. His resignation is full of generous devotion to the cause of Poland. We give his order resigning the command as well as that of Dembinski on assuming it.

"Warsaw, August 13.

"ORDER OF THE DAY.

"Head-quarters of Bolinow.

"Soldiers!—Called by the choice of the nation and your confidence, to exercise the command-in-chief over you in the sacred cause of our country, I shared at your head in all the glorious privations and dangers to which you have been exposed. Far from all feeling of self-love, I never sought the power which was confided to me; I accepted it, and have hitherto exercised it. Though I was sensible that it was accompanied with many and great difficulties, it was not my intention to yield to those difficulties, but I was resolved to be the first to give the example of that perseverance of which we have so much need in our present situation.

"A deputation named by the diet have found it advantageous for the good of the country to confide the chief command of the army to other hands. Whilst I submit with resignation to this interference, I will address you for the last time, to testify to you the entire esteem with which I am filled for your bravery, your devotedness and zeal. Your country judges by what you have hitherto done, of what it may expect from you in future. The commander, whom the representatives of the nation have placed over you, is already known to you by his bravery and his resolution, since by overcoming the greatest difficulties he saved your countrymen from that destruction which, for a less resolute man, would have been inevitable. Let us surround him with the confidence and affection his merits deserve. Implicit confidence, obedience, the first virtue of a soldier of every rank, will be a powerful support on our side to the new commander; and I who had the honor to be at your head, may now be allowed to aspire to another, that of fighting in your ranks, and giving you an example of the discipline, which I have hitherto required from you, and to which I will with you willingly submit. Soldiers, let us always unite magnanimity and obedience with courage and zeal, and with God's help Poland will still rise from its ruin—Poland forever.

"SKRZYNECKI.

"The commander-in-chief of the armed national force."

ORDER OF THE DAY.

"Head-quarters, Bolinow, August 12.

"Soldiers! Called by the will of the diet from your ranks to your head, I take on me this post full of confidence and hope. The exercise of the chief command is not difficult where all are animated by one feeling—that of sacrificing themselves for the deliverance of the country. Yes, it will certainly find it in your courage, and the perseverance which is able to conquer every thing. Citizens and soldiers I have served among you during this national war; I therefore know the spirit that animates you, and will not exert you to obedience and order, so much only I will say, that extraordinary efforts are required—only one thought should direct all our movements, that of renouncing every thing that men prize most highly, in order to secure our independence. Whatever these movements may be, the zeal which inspires you in battle must not cool during your preparations for it. If my military life hitherto, and bringing back to their families some thousands of your brethren whom you perhaps had already given up as lost, can give me any title to your confidence, I claim it of you in the name of God and your country. I know that I can only be strong through your strength; I know also the demands of the nation and the army, and will not disappoint your expectations. You shall see me every where partake in your hardships and dangers, but I must also be allowed to hope, that when we go altogether to the combat, you will depend on me as I do on the country and you. Its deliverance alone guides your steps as well as mine.—Let us keep away every thing that might weaken the moral strength of the army, and free ourselves, and we shall leave to our posterity a free country.

"HENRY DEMBINSKI,

"Commander-in-chief, ad interim, of the armed national forces."

With respect to the choice of a future commander-in-chief the votes are divided between four persons: Dembinski Pradziński, Uminski and Wladislaus Zamoski.

The Augsburg Gazette, of the 24th August, states that the Poles had been compelled to abandon their entrenchments at Blioriss, and the Russians had advanced within five miles of Warsaw. The Polish army marched out of Warsaw on the 8th to give them battle, but before the troops had taken their positions, a smart action between the cavalry of the opposing armies took place, the Polish cavalry was defeated and driven towards the city, when a popular tumult ensued. Generals Jankowski and Bukowski, who had been acquitted of the charge of conspiracy, were dragged from their houses and hanged, and about fifty persons lost their lives. General Dembinski, was deprived of the chief command, but reinstated again, in a few hours, much against his will.

Warsaw was invested on all sides, and its capitulation expected. Another account confirms the previous one as to the riot, but fixes its date on the 15th and 16th August.

A terrible revolt had broken out in the Russian military colonies, and a levy of troops had been made in the ratio of 4 men for every 600 souls. This movement it was hoped might favor the cause of Poland.

Prior to Skrzynecki's resignation, he had entered into a negotiation with Paskewitch for a cessation of hostilities. It was not known whether his successor would pursue the same course. The cholera still raged in many places, but had abated in others.

PORTUGAL.

An insurrection broke out in Lisbon on the 21st August. A part of the 4th regiment declared for Donna Maria II, proceeded through the streets with colors flying, and band playing the constitutional hymn. They were cheered by the people. On reaching the Rocio square, they were surrounded by the different regiments of Miguel's troops, and were charged upon by the cavalry. The 4th maintained their ground and compelled the cavalry to retire, but were ultimately overpowered. During the insurrection, Don Miguel shut himself up in Belem castle, and sent his staff to reconnoitre. Some shots were fired at them. Theconde St. Martino, and the baron de Befura, were shot, being taken for Don Miguel, being very like him in stature. From 150 to 300 were killed. Mr. Grundy, an Englishman, had been badly treated by the Portuguese soldiers, and on applying to the commander-in-chief, Coude de Rodadoo, for redress, the ruffian cut him with his sabre, and his men bayoneted him and left him for dead. The British consul had remonstrated, and ordered the British corvette, Despatch, to anchor in front and near to the Commercial square, to afford relief and protection to British subjects. Trade is completely at a stand, all is terror and dismay in the city; no one dare show himself out of doors.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

Accounts from Constantinople of the 2d August, state, that 1,800 houses of Pera, (nearly the whole of it), had been destroyed by fire; 60,000 persons were without shelter and had lost most of their property.

BORDER TROUBLES.

From the Portland Courier.

A messenger from Madawaska. Mr. Baker, from the Madawaska settlement, the same individual who was formerly imprisoned by the British authorities, is now in this town, having come on by express for the purpose of conferring with the executive of the state.

We understand that he reports that the inhabitants of Madawaska met and organized themselves as a town corporation, agreeably to a law of our state legislature, passed last winter. The British authorities hearing of it, remonstrated and threatened. Again at the time of the annual election, the inhabitants met and chose a representative. The authorities of New Brunswick then came with an armed force and arrested as many as they could find, who took any part in the town meeting, and carried them off to Fredericton, probably to be imprisoned.

Mr. Baker and a few others fled to the woods and escaped being arrested. He hung round the settlement a few days, so near as to communicate occasionally with his family, [the women being allowed to go back and forth from one neighborhood to another.] The French inhabitants yielded to the requisitions of the British and were permitted to remain, but the Americans refusing to promise allegiance, were carried off in a body.

We understand some of the prisoners addressed letters to the governor of this state while on their way to Fredericton. We presume a statement will immediately be forwarded to the general government. It is time our government should come to some decision in this business.

From the St. John (N. B.) Observer.

We learn, from respectable authority, that the sheriff of York county has brought down from our territory at Madawaska, several of the parties concerned in the recent trespasses in that quarter, and who are now confined in jail at Fredericton, to be dealt with as the law directs, and at their own audacity deserves.

FREE TRADE CONVENTION.

From the Philadelphia Gazette.

[The following was accidentally omitted, in the report of the proceedings on the morning of the last day of the convention.]

Mr. Pointexter offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with the tariff convention about to assemble at New York.

The adoption of this resolution would, he said, show a conciliatory spirit, and, perhaps, lead to a satisfactory arrangement. If the tariff convention refused to confer with our committee, we should appear advantageously before the public, as having made an offer for friendly arrangement.

Chancellor Harper, of South Carolina, could see no possible good that would result from the appointment of such a committee. The two conventions differ in principle. They believe protection to manufactures to be constitutional. We believe it to be unconstitutional. They believe it to be right, we believe it to be wrong, to favor particular branches of industry. It can hardly be expected that they will give up their principles, and we shall certainly not give up ours. There is no room for a compromise—no ground on which we can meet one another half way.

A motion to adjourn, prevented the question from being taken on Mr. Pointexter's resolution.

The yeas and nays on Mr. Gallatin's motion to strike out so much of the address, as referred to the constitutional question, were as follows:

There were 170 votes for it. Mr. Carpenter, of Maine, however has addressed a note to the editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer, saying he does not believe the tariff to be unconstitutional—and "had given as a reason for voting for the address, that he had no objection to spreading before the American people, the reasons of that portion of the people, who, on that subject differed from him in opinion—but he wished and trusted they would not adopt them as his."

When the question was taken on the following resolution, the gentlemen present recorded their names in the affirmative, except Zachariah P. Herndon and Henry C. Young, of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee to consist of one member to be selected from each state represented in this convention be appointed by the president, whose duty it shall be to prepare a memorial to congress, setting forth the evils of the existing tariff of duties, and asking such a modification of the same, as shall be consistent with the purposes of revenue, and equal in its operation on the different parts of the United States, and on the various interests of the same, that it shall be the duty of the said committee to collect the evidence necessary to support the said memorial, to present it to congress at its next session, and to attend personally or by a sub-committee at Washington for the purpose of promoting the same.

That the said committee be instructed to insist in the said memorial—

That the present tariff system is unequal in its operation and therefore unjust, that it is oppressive because it enforces burthens on the many for the benefit of the few—unwise and impolitic, since its tendency is to disturb the harmony of the union—that it is inconsistent with the principles of free government, and at variance with that spirit of justice and mutual concession, in which the constitution was conceived and adopted, operating unequally and unjustly upon the different portions of this union, having a direct and almost inevitable tendency to demoralize our people, and calculated to produce discontent among the people of the United States, by a numerous and respectable portion of whom, it is believed to be unconstitutional, and finally that its effect is to diminish the productive resources of the country, and to lessen the amount of the necessities and conveniences of life, which are enjoyed by our people, and is in many respects infinitely more oppressive upon the poor than upon the rich.

And that the said committee be instructed, moreover, to express the willingness of the memorialists to acquiesce in such an interposition of the legislative power as shall be prospective in its operation, thereby avoiding any sudden revulsion which might operate with undue severity on the manufacturing interest, but tending to the desired result with the least possible injury to the interests which have grown up under the existing system of protective duties.

The following is a correct list of the committee appointed under this resolution.

Albert Gallatin, of New York, chairman.
 Henry Lee, of Massachusetts.
 William Hunter, of Rhode Island.
 Roger Minot Sherman, of Connecticut.
 C. L. Hardenburg, of New Jersey.
 Clement C. Biddle, of Pennsylvania.
 George Hoffman, of Maryland.
 Thomas R. Dew, of Virginia.
 James Iredell, of North Carolina.
 William Harper, of South Carolina.
 John M. Berrien, of Georgia.
 Enoch Parsons, of Alabama.
 William E. Butler, of Tennessee.

Judge Barbour's speech on adjourning the Convention. Gentlemen of the Convention:

The expression of my sincere and cordial thanks is the only return which I have to offer you, for the approbatory resolution which you have just passed.

Not to feel gratified at such a manifestation of good opinion from such a body, would on my part betray an utter want of sensibility and of gratitude—not to acknowledge it, would be an equal want of candor.

Gentlemen, you will pardon me for detaining you a moment, in giving vent to feelings of another character, in which I am sure every member present participates.

We came hither under extraordinary circumstances. We came in obedience to the wishes of the great community which we represent, to consult together, with a view to devise a constitutional and peaceable remedy for the grievance of which they complained—that is to say, a wrongful and oppressive system of taxation. We came amidst the hopes and fears of our constituents.—They indulged indeed the hope of success, yet it was a hope clouded with the apprehension of failure, from that contrariety of views, and varying shades of opinion, which so often prevail in numerous assemblies of men.

I congratulate you gentlemen—I congratulate our constituents, and our common country, may I congratulate the great principle of free trade of which we are the advocates, that the result of our deliberations has more than disappointed all their fearful apprehensions.

It has done more—It has given to the wind, the ill-omened auguries of those who exultingly predicted a plentiful harvest of distraction in our councils, and the scattering of fire brands, which would kindle the flame of civil war amongst our people. Thank God! This was not our purpose. This is not what we have done—we came here, with peace on our lips, and in our hearts—we have spoken the language of peace and friendly expostulation. We have appealed to our countrymen, and, in the name of justice, have called upon them, for a redress of our grievances.

And will this appeal be in vain? I hope, I trust, I believe, it will not.

I persuade myself, that our countrymen, will listen with respectful attention, to the complaints of their brethren; I persuade myself, that congress too, their and our representatives and servants, will not turn a deaf ear, to a remonstrance coming from a quarter, and supported by a voice to which even the proudest monarch, on a European throne, would feel it to be his duty, to vouchsafe an attentive hearing.

Should this be the happy fruits of our deliberations, we may felicitate ourselves upon having been members of this body,—we may well rejoice, that it will afford a new and gratifying proof of the value of our government.

The experience of the late war, had furnished illustrious evidence of its ability, to carry us gloriously and triumphantly through a perilous struggle with the most powerful nation on the earth.

This would shew its happy aptitudes for a time of peace—it would shew that public opinion, enlightened by information, and guided by justice, will stamp its impress upon the legislative councils of the country. That its every form and pressure will be exhibited in the acts of that legislature, dispensing equal rights to each portion of the community, and causing every wave of discontent, which disturbs the repose of the society, to subside and settle down, into the profound calm of perfect contentment.

That such may be the auspicious results of our deliberations, I invoke the patriotism of our fellow citizens. I invoke the justice of our common country. I invoke the genius of the constitution, and that spirit of harmony, which called it into being.

The address was received with loud plaudits, and the convention declared to be adjourned, sine die.

We feel it due to the History of this convention to add the following letter addressed to the editor of the New York American.

I read with concern your strictures of yesterday on the free trade convention, and submit to your consideration the following remarks.

The gentlemen of the south, I have every reason to know, came to Philadelphia with a determination, not easily shaken, to declare by a formal vote of the convention, that the tariff laws are unconstitutional. Among a variety of other arguments, they were distinctly told, that if it were clearly understood, that that question was to be discussed and decided, we should immediately return home, as we would not enter into any such discussion, or be present at any such decision. They were further informed, that we had no objection to state the fact, that a large, intelligent, and patriotic portion of the community did believe these laws to be in violation of the constitution; but beyond a mere statement of that, of any other fact, we were unwilling to go. Upon this point, there was the most intense interest, and an immense amount of private conversation.

The address, from circumstances unnecessary to be mentioned, was not I believe the sub-committee at a dinner, until it was read before the general committee, did we know how the gentlemen who drew it up proposed to present this most perplexing, and, indeed, only difficulty. As soon as the address was read in the committee, one of the delegates from New York made the very motion to strike out when it was subsequently repeated by Mr. Gallatin in the convention, but, upon its being stated and avowed on all hands that the reasons set forth in the address were the reasons of others and not of the convention, and that if there were any expressions which could admit of a contrary construction they should be altered, the motion was withdrawn, under the conviction that the two New York delegates alone remained steady in their opposition. Upon principle I did not then, nor do I now see, that any thing was yielded; though, as regards expediency, I was strongly opposed to the course pursued.

Whether you will now think, Mr. Editor, that the south accorded nothing to their northern brethren, I cannot say, but I can assure you, that in abandoning an express vote by the convention, that the tariff laws are a gross violation of the constitution, those gentlemen gave up a point on which many of them had set their hearts.

In conclusion, I am decidedly of opinion that it was infinitely better for the New York delegation to remain and vote as they did, rather than to withdraw. I am further of opinion, that any possible evil which might have resulted from the meeting of the convention, has been prevented. This belief I entertain because I know that the principal, and I believe all the gentlemen who represented the union party in South Carolina, are perfectly satisfied. Lastly, I think that a meeting unprecedented in our country for talents, character, and the great stake which the members hold to the community, which was capable consequently of good or ill to no trifling extent, has done positive service, though with calmer discretion more might have been effected.

A member of the New York delegation.

The present price of St. Domingo coffee is 12 cents per lb. or, on an average, about the rate which it held for the last three years, though on the 1st of January 1831, the duty was reduced from 5 to 2 cents per lb. The question occurs—whether has the West India grower, or the American consumer of coffee been most benefitted by the lessened duty? The whole cost of importation has been reduced 25 per cent. yet the price of the article remains nearly the same. How do the doctrines of the anti-tariffists tally with this interesting fact? It certainly shews, what we have oftentimes stated, that a duty on goods imported is not necessarily a tax on consumers—and it is well known that the diminished duty on coffee in the United States soon increased the price of the article in the West Indies. Will the "philosophers" look into this?

But we heartily approve of the reduced duty on coffee. It has at least the effect to make a more lively and better demand in the West Indies for the productions of our soil and workshops—and the cost of every commodity can only fairly be measured by the means afforded to purchase it.

BRITISH "FREE TRADE."

Speech of Mr. ROBERTSON in the British house of commons on a proposition to reduce the duty on French wines.*

Mr. Robertson said that the right honorable gentlemen had made an extraordinary use of his statements, and he confessed he thought the opponents of the measure would not derive much advantage from his arguments [hearts and a laugh.] The right honorable gentleman placed the whole question on the perpetual character of the Methuen treaty; but it must be recollected, that at the end of the fifteen years after the signing of the treaty, either party was at liberty to put an end to it, if they thought fit. Dismissing it, therefore, he meant to apply himself to the purely commercial point of the question, and on that he believed the government had committed a very dangerous error. The vice president of the board of trade (Mr. Thompson) had asked, with an air of triumph, if they thought that the Portuguese would deprive themselves of some of the most necessary articles of consumption, purely because this country admitted French wines on better terms? He (Mr. Robertson) would ask, however, what was to prevent the Portuguese from equalising the duties on all the articles of export from England? According to the returns of 1830, it appeared that exports to Portugal on official value amounted to two millions and a half, in addition to 200,000*l.* worth of cod shipped from our colonies of Newfoundland. The fish which Portugal took from the fisheries of Newfoundland amounted to 300,000 kiltres. The transport employed 100 sail of vessels, and it was received at a duty of 15 per cent., while the fish brought by our great rivals, the Americans and the Norwegians, paid a duty of 30 per cent. It was said, however, that British industry might safely be left to a competition in this supply of cod fish. But what was the result of that competition in the case of Spain? Twenty years ago the Norwegians and Americans supplied Spain with 10,000 kiltres, and England carried 80,000 kiltres. At the present moment the 80,000 were supplied by the Americans and the Norwegians, and the 10,000 kiltres by England. The truth was, that Portugal took more from this country than Norway, Sweden, Denmark and France, with their population of 45,000,000. We took, he said, from several states ten times as much as we did from Portugal, and this proved that imports had nothing to do with this question, but that it entirely depended upon other circumstances. He strongly protested against the project of the noble lord, in which he proposed to give up a certain market in Portugal, upon the speculation of obtaining a market in France—a speculation, too, which there was no reason to believe could be successful. The noble lord wished to reduce the duties on French wines for the purpose of encouraging France to enter into a more extensive trade with us, and to admit our manufactures. No encouragement, he contended, was at all likely to make France do any such thing. Had we not even experience whereby to be guided on this point? In the year 1825, the duty on French wines had been reduced 6*s.* 6*d.* a gallon, and the result had been that our imports from France were now twice as great as they were at that period, and our exports only half what they had then been. Now it was only proposed to reduce the duty 2*s.* 9*d.*, and what good could they possibly expect from that? It was idle for us, he contended, to endeavor to persuade other nations to join us in adopting the principle of what was called "free trade." Other nations knew as well as the noble lord opposite, and those who acted with him, what we meant by "free trade" was nothing more or less than by means of the great advantages we enjoyed, to get a monopoly of all their markets for our manufactures, and to prevent them one and all from ever becoming manufacturing nations. When the system of reciprocity and "free trade" had been proposed to a French ambassador, his remark was that the plan was excellent in theory, but to make it fair in practice, it would be necessary to defer the attempt to put it in execution for half a century, until France should be on the same footing with Great Britain in marine, in manufacture, in capital, and the many other peculiar advantages which it now enjoyed. The policy that France acted upon was that of encouraging its native manufactures, and it was a wise policy; because, if it were freely to admit our manufactures, it would be speedily reduced to the rank of an agricultural nation; and, therefore, a poor nation, as all must be, that depend exclusively upon agriculture. America, too, acted upon the same principle with France. America legislated for futurity—legislated for an increasing population. America, too, was prospering under this system. In twenty years America would be independent of England for manufactures altogether. He begged to ask the noble lord why it was that government, embarrassed as it was with the reform bill, should have brought forward the question of the wine duties at all this year? What was the reason; what the pressing necessity? In this measure ministers were departing from the principle they had themselves laid down; they were taking a tax off the wealthier and higher classes, and imposing it upon the middle and lower classes. Either considering the measure as a question of policy or finance, it was one of the worst and most unfortunate which could possibly be submitted to the house of commons. If they even did succeed in transferring the whole wine trade from Portugal to France, all that they would have effected was, to give advantages to a rival in a maritime and commercial point of view, and to take advantages away from a nation which never could compete with us, either as a maritime, commercial, or manufacturing country. As a question of policy, he therefore, the measure was bad; as a question of finance, he had shown it was bad. It would do great injury to the wine trade in this country, and what be of no benefit to that class of individuals who could afford to drink Champagne, Burgundy and Claret. The quantity of French wines, of the first growth, actually produced was so small, that the import could not be increased; and with French wines of the second and third growth, the people of this country never would be satisfied. He contended that the policy pursued by all statesmen was to encourage the connection with the friendly country which afforded us the market, in preference to the rival state which withheld it. Even Mr. Huskinson, when America raised her tariff, declared, that if this line of policy were persevered in, that perhaps England might, in self-defence, raise the duties in her turn, and take cottons from Brazil, and so show America we could do without her. During the war, he remarked, we were the carriers of the whole world, and well nigh monopolized its commerce; but since the peace, France, Germany, America, and all the other countries of the world had proceeded upon the principle of encouraging and protecting native manufactures. England alone, by departing from this policy, had injured her trade and commerce, and was indubitably accelerating that distress and difficulty which would hereafter assail us. If the system of establishing low prices for manufactures were continued—if the price of agriculture produce were to be lowered by the repeal of the protecting corn laws (which would be the next thing called for)—if we were to have all our corn from Poland—our silk and all the other commodities we wanted from other countries, it was true the consumer—that is the few—would be benefited, but the many would be ruined; and then, he begged to ask the noble lord, who was to pay the taxes? After the corn laws, the next thing meddled with would be the funds. It was impossible the lounded system could be continued much such an increasing cry for low prices. And the result of all these alterations would be, to place the country in the worst of all situations—namely, that of having only two classes, the extremely wealthy and the extremely poor. He should, therefore, under these circumstances, move, as an amendment, the resolutions of which he had given notice. He was ready to give the noble lord the advantage of the increased duty on some of the foreign wines, but what he objected to was the reduction of the duty on French wines, while there was at the same time an increase of the duty on the Portugal wines. The honorable member then read his resolution, which stated the amount of exports and imports as between this country and Portugal, and as between this country and France, contrasting them with the view of showing that, as regarded population, the imports from France, as compared to the exports to that country, were much larger than as between this country and Portugal, much to the advantage of France. He begged to add now, that since a reduction of the duty on French wines, the exports to that country had been diminished.

PROTECTION OF MANUFACTURES.

"The 'National Intelligencer,' in publishing the address of the Free Trade convention said—it will be seen that it does not affirm the unconstitutionality of the tariff laws, but only suggests them to be contrary to the spirit of the constitution. Their unconstitutionality can only be maintained by a perversion of reasoning, and a total disregard of all testimony. To believe it, is a belief because of impossibility. The constitutionality of the protection afforded to home manufactures by duties on imports was indeed never seriously questioned until a late year. When our government went into opposition, it was the first 'thing thought of,' not only by congress, but by the people, and by the people, too, of different parts of the union. The great work, which we now have in the press, (the 'American State papers'), contains numerous proofs of this fact. We have before us at this moment a copy of the first petition ever presented to congress, which was on the 11th day of April 1790. It was from the people of the city of Baltimore, and bears the signature of several hundred citizens, of whom few besides the present venerable senator from Maryland, (General Smith), now survive. It seems to us to be of sufficient interest at the present moment to justify our calling the attention of our readers to it by copying it entire. Here it is: 'To the president and congress of the United States, the petition of the tradesmen, mechanics and others, of the town of Baltimore, humbly sheweth.

"That, since the close of the late war, and the completion of the revolution, your petitioners have observed, with anxious regret, the manufacturing and trading interests of the country rapidly declining, while the wealth of the people hath been prodigally expended in the purchase of those articles, from foreigners, which our citizens, if properly encouraged, were fully competent to furnish.

"To check this growing evil, applications were made by petitions, to some of the state legislatures: these guardians of the people, in several of the states, interposed their authority: laws were by them enacted, with the view of subduing, or, at least, diminishing the rage for foreign, and of encouraging domestic manufactures; but the event hath clearly demonstrated, to all ranks of men, that no effectual provision could reasonably be expected, until one uniform efficient government should pervade this wide-extended country.

"The happy period having now arrived when the United States are placed in a new situation; when the adoption of the general government gives one sovereign legislature the sole and exclusive power of laying duties upon imports; your petitioners rejoice at the prospect this affords them, that America, freed from the commercial shackles which have so long bound her, will see and pursue her true interest, becoming independent in fact as well as in name; and they confidently hope, that the encouragement and protection of American manufactures will claim the earliest attention of the supreme legislature of the nation; as it is an universally acknowledged truth, that the United States contain, within their limits, resources amply sufficient to enable them to become a great manufacturing country, and only want the patronage and support of a wise, energetic government.

"Your petitioners conceive it unnecessary to multiply arguments to so enlightened a body as the one they have now the honor of addressing, to convince them of the propriety and importance of attempting to measure so obvious a necessity, and indeed, indispensable as every member must have observed and lamented the present melancholy state of his country; the number of poor increasing for want of employment; foreign debts accumulating; houses and lands depreciating in value; trade and manufactures languishing and expiring. This being a faint sketch of the gloomy picture this country exhibits, it is to the supreme legislature of the United States, as the guardians of the whole empire, that every eye is now directed: from their united wisdom their patriotism, their ardent love of their country, your petitioners expect to derive that aid and assistance, which alone can dissipate their just apprehensions, and animate them with hopes of success in future, by imposing on all foreign articles, which can be made in America, such duties as shall be just and equitable in preference to their labor, and thereby discouraging that trade which tends so materially to injure them, and impoverish their country; and which may, also, in their consequences, contribute to the discharge of the national debt, and the due support of government.

"Your petitioners take the liberty to annex a list of such articles as are, or can be, manufactured in this country, in moderate terms; and the humanity trust that the legislature will fully consider their request, and grant them, in common with the other mechanics and manufacturers of the United States, that relief which, in your wisdom, may appear proper."

[Here follows, in the original, a list of articles manufactured in the city of Baltimore, and state of Maryland, which it does not seem necessary to copy.]

Such was the language of that day, and such the view which the patriots who carried the country through the revolution took of the nature and objects of the general government; and the first thing which they expected congress to attend to was "the encouragement and protection of American manufactures," by a tariff of duties on foreign goods imported. Yet at this day it is gravely maintained, and indeed solemnly resolved, after a lapse of forty-two years, that the tariff is unconstitutional!

Just one week after the above petition, another was presented to congress from the citizens of New York, from which the following is extracted:

"Your petitioners conceive that their countrymen have been deluded by an appearance of plenty; by the profusion of foreign articles which has deluged the country; and thus have mistaken excessive importation for a flourishing trade. To this deception they impute the continuance of that immoderate prepossession in favor of foreign commodities, which has been the principal cause of their distresses, and the subject of their complaint.

"Wearied by their fruitless exertions, your petitioners have long looked forward with anxiety for the establishment of a government which would have power to check the growing evil, and extend a protecting hand to the interests of commerce and the arts. Such a government is now established. On the promulgation of the constitution just now commencing its operations, your petitioners discovered in its principles the remedy which they had so long and so earnestly desired. They embraced it with ardor, and have supported it with persevering attachment. They view with the highest satisfaction the prospects now opening and adorning this auspicious period. To your honorable body the mechanics and manufacturers of New York look up with confidence, convinced that, as the united voice of America has furnished you with the means, so your knowledge of the common wants has given you the spirit, to unbind our fetters, and rescue our country from disgrace and ruin."

A few days afterwards, another petition was presented from the inhabitants of Boston of which the following is an extract:

"Your petitioners need not inform congress that, on the revival of our mechanical arts and manufactures depends the wealth and prosperity of the northern states; nor can we forbear mentioning to your honors that the citizens of these states conceive the object of their independence but half obtained till those national purposes are established on a permanent and extensive basis by the legislative acts of the federal government. Unless these important branches are supported, we humbly conceive that our agriculture must gradually decline, and the impoverished state of our exports will eventually lessen the demand for the produce of our lands."

"Your petitioners formerly experienced the patronage of this state legislature, in their act laying duties and prohibitions on certain articles of manufacture, which encourages our petitioners to request that heavy duties may be laid on such articles as are manufactured by our own citizens, humbly conceiving that the impost is not solely considered by congress as an object of revenue, but, in its operation, intended to exclude such importations, and, ultimately, establish these several branches of manufacture among ourselves."

At that day the honest people who made the constitution, it will be seen, so far from having any misgivings of mind as to the power of congress to protect manufactures, by imposing duties, was a leading object for which the general government was established.

We ask the anti-national editors to do just so much justice to the general government and the tariff laws, as to copy the above statement of facts concerning the early legislation of congress.

THE TARIFF CONVENTION. At the meeting of the convention, which assembled in the city of New York, on Wednesday last, to consult on measures connected with the protection of domestic labor, delegates from thirteen states, and the District of Columbia appeared. At half past 10 o'clock, A. M. James Tallmadge, of the city of New York, was called to the chair, and Ezekiah Niles, of Baltimore, appointed secretary, until the convention could be organized. A committee was then appointed, consisting of three persons from each state, to consider and report on the mode of organization. In conformity with the recommendation of this committee, the following officers were unanimously chosen, William Wilkins, of Pennsylvania, president; Joseph Kent, of Maryland, James Tallmadge, of New York, George Blake, of Massachusetts, and Lewis Condict, of New Jersey, vice presidents; Ezekiah Niles, of Baltimore, Robert Tillotson, of New York, Charles Payne, of Vermont, and Joseph H. Pierce, of New Hampshire, secretaries.

WE stated in our last, that Henry Smyzer, of York county, Pa. had been elected to congress from that district—it should have been to the senate of the state legislature.

FINE WOOL. A letter addressed to the editor from the western part of New York, says, "wool has become a very important and the principal article of profit in this region. There are many fine flocks of sheep, of from 200 to 2,000—principally mixed merinos, and mixed with Saxon. While on this subject, allow me to make a few remarks on the growing of fine wool, in this country. Having formerly been engaged in that business in Saxony, and now for more than four years in this country, besides having been an importer of Saxon sheep three years previous to my settling and establishing a flock of pure electoral Saxon sheep here, I am enabled, from experience, to make a comparison between that and this country, as it regards that branch of agriculture. Sir, I do not doubt in the least, indeed, I am ready to demonstrate the fact, that this country is capable of producing as fine wool as there can be produced in Saxony. Every thing that nature can afford towards it, is abundantly supplied. All that is wanting now, in my humble opinion, is experience. Sheep have been greatly improved within seven years in this country, and but a few (say 10) years more, and it will produce fine wool enough to supply home demand. The protection on fine wool, however, is not in proportion to coarse wool, and may in some measure retard the improvement."

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT. A New York electioneering address, signed by James Lent, chairman, has the following sweeping paragraph:

"During former administrations, particularly that of Mr. Adams, various appropriations had been made for internal improvements. The benefits which New York was deriving from her enterprise in opening her canals, made other states and sections of the union desirous of possessing like advantages; and although the application by New York to congress for aid had been rejected, other applications by combining a sufficient number of interests to carry a majority have been successful. Millions had been expended by the United States for those objects, and when gen. Jackson came into office the improvements already projected, as proper for the application of the national funds, would have cost more than $300,000,000."

Why did not the maker of the address tell the people how many millions had been appropriated and paid for internal improvements, since the adoption of the constitution, that the people might be alarmed with the amount? But the 200 millions for works "already projected" would have had a small finish, had that truth been told. The getting-up of this estimate of works projected, was a disgraceful affair—and almost purely dishonest, criminally careless.

On the other hand, a writer in the "Albany Argus" of the 12th inst. speaking of the want of a sufficient depth of water for ship navigation to that city, which he anticipates, and, we hope, truly, will become a very important place of trade—says,

"Nor is there the least doubt that the navigation can be improved. Money alone is wanted; and the United States would willingly give it if properly solicited. Our city should be alive to this subject, and steps taken to have one or more of our citizens in Washington at the opening of the next session, to co-operate with our highly respectable representative in such measures as may be deemed best calculated to procure aid from that source.

"The state of New York will pay into the treasury of the nation this year something like twenty millions of dollars, in duties, and surely one or two hundred thousand would not be refused us, when the public benefit would be so great."

Very well. The Albanians shall have our best wishes for the success of their application. But the latter paragraph is not less of a sweeping character than that which Mr. Lent has certified to.

"The state of New York will pay into the treasury of the nation this year something like twenty millions of dollars!" Now, the phrase might have been corrected by saying the city of New York, and that again amended by naming a certain street in that city, and the whole accurately stated by decidedly saying, that one man, Samuel Swartwout, would pay the whole sum.

When some silly one wrote to Mr. Jefferson of the great revenue paid by New York to the national treasury—he said "remove the custom house across the river, and Paulus Hook will pay the same amount."

SMUGGLING OF SUGAR. From the New Orleans Bee. A new species of import has come to our knowledge, which, if tolerated, threatens ruin to the sugar growers of this state. It is a kind of syrup, which has not been sufficiently boiled to granulate, but contains more than two-thirds of sugar. One gallon of this syrup, from actual experiment, yields from eight to nine pounds of sugar. If, therefore, such an importation be allowed, it is evident that the sugar refiners, not the planters, will furnish us with sugar—the latter being unable to resist so formidable a competition. A recently imported cargo of this commodity has been seized by our collector, and we impatiently await the award of the court on this subject, which materially affects the interests of our state. If the seizure be not confirmed, the duty on sugar, is illusory, inasmuch as that obtained from the syrup pays something less than half a cent, instead of three cents imposed by the tariff. There is but little doubt but that a great quantity of this article has been introduced in the United States, and to attribute to this the depreciation of our sugars in the northern ports, is not an unreasonable supposition.

[It is stated that the treasury department has issued a circular directing that a duty shall be paid on this liquid sugar by the pound, as other sugar pays—so those that may be caught will make a bad speculation!]

VERMONT. Official returns of the votes for governor of this state—Mr. Palmer, anti-masonic, 15,258; Mr. Allen, national republican, 12,999; Mr. Meach, Jackson, 6,158—no choice. But the plurality system prevailing as to the council, the anti-masonic ticket fully succeeded. Mr. Palmer was elected governor by joint ballot—for him 114, for Mr. Allen 56, Mr. Meach 42,

Mr. Crafts 35—majority for Palmer, one. Mr. Smith elected speaker of the house of representatives, and all the rest of the officers appointed are anti-masons.

IRA WOODMAN. The case of this postmaster in New Hampshire, is, at last, settled! From the "Statesman" of the 15th inst. We abstract the following account of it—if true, as described, there has been a criminal neglect in the officers whose duty it was to see that justice was rendered for an offence so prejudicial to the "general welfare," and which experience teaches us has become more frequent than heretofore. We say this in all soberness for wrongs suffered.

Woodman, according to the "Statesman," was arrested for purloining a ten dollar note, of the Brighton bank, from a letter, and a true bill against him was found, (pretty nearly two years ago we believe), by the grand jury of Grafton county. When brought forward for trial, he was claimed by the United States attorney, Mr. Cushman, as having committed an offence against the United States, and accordingly given up and held to bail for his appearance. In the course of time, a true bill against Woodman was returned to the circuit court of the United States, but the U. S. attorney not proving the existence of the Brighton bank, it was not shown that a larceny had been committed. The court, however, refused to discharge Woodman, having no doubt of his guilt, and the case was continued—one security being given in the sum of one hundred dollars that he should appear. The circuit court of the United States has just held another session, Woodman, having taken "leg bail" did not appear, and the surty is said not to be worth a farthing. But the fact of a surty in the sum of $100, for so serious a charge, is one of the strongest things in the whole affair.

GOLD. One house in New York is said to have received 1,000 sovereigns from England. They were not remitted because of the exchange being against England! The difference between the value of those sovereigns in England, and as we rate dollars, is not less than 14 per cent. in favor of the former.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Daniel W. Pope, of New York, to be consul of the United States at Toluca, in the United Mexican states.

John Martin Baker, of Pennsylvania, to be consul of the United States for the port of Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, in place of W. H. D. C. Wright, removed at the request of the Brazilian government.

John K. Campbell, of Florida, to be attorney of the United States for the district of West Florida, vice Benjamin D. Wright, removed.

Alexander Thomson, of New York, to be consul of the United States at Glasgow, in Scotland, vice David Walker, deceased.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. In the house of representatives of the state of Tennessee, now sitting, the following proceedings lately took place—

Mr. McGaughey offered the following preamble and resolutions—

Whereas, the charter of the United States bank will expire in the year 1836, and whereas it is believed that the stockholders in said bank will attempt to procure a re-charter of that institution—and whereas, it is believed by this general assembly, that it is not consistent with sound policy to extend the charter of said bank—Therefore,

Resolved, By the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, that our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives requested, to use all possible means to prevent the re-chartering of the bank of the United States, if any attempt should be made in congress for that purpose, before the next session of the General assembly of this state.

Resolved, That the secretary of state furnish a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each of our senators and representatives in congress—and that they be printed with the notes of the present session of the general assembly.

Mr. Allen suggested that it would perhaps be better to appoint a committee on the affairs of the general government, to whom these and all similar propositions might be referred. He was opposed in all such interference on the part of the legislature, with business specially belonging to the federal government. He moved to lay the resolutions on the table, which was done accordingly.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS. The "Vigilance Association of Columbia" (South Carolina), composed of gentlemen of the first respectability, have offered a reward of fifteen hundred dollars for the apprehension and prosecution to conviction, of any white person who may be detected in distributing or circulating within that state the newspaper, called "The Liberator," printed in Boston, or the pamphlet called "Walker's Pamphlet," or any other publication of a seditious tendency.

[Is not, by far, too much importance attached to these publications? It can be accounted for only in the ferential and ardent feeling of the people in the south, because of their condition—and, indeed, from certain movements among the slaves in various states, there is much reason to apprehend no inconsiderable degree of concerted action, though extremely indigent and inefficient, except for very limited operations, though causing a general alarm, no one knowing where a blow might fall.]

THE CHOLERA. From the 19th June to 15th July, inclusive, 7,738 cases of this disease were recorded at St. Petersburg as having taken place—of these, 5,950 died and 2,139 were cured—the rest were removed, and their fate unknown.

Whole number of cases up to 1st August 8,281—known deaths 4,281. The disease was at its height 17 days after its appearance, and then began rapidly to decline, and was nearly extinct, at our last accounts from the Russian capital.

AN OFFICIAL WAG. The local commissioner of the city of Boston must be a right merry and shrewd wight. In a late report to the municipality, touching shady lands lying between that city and the town of Roxbury, he states that a new road has been laid out across a part of those lands, leading from the Neck (the long street connecting that town with the city) striking the southern termination of Tremont street, of which avenue it is to be a continuation. This new portion will exceed two miles in length—three fourths of which is to be perfectly straight; the other half mile, says the commissioner, "which is nearest the city, is just crooked enough to remain travellers that they have arrived in Boston where every thing, I trust, will be found straight except the streets."

THE NEW ISLAND. The French government have despatched one of their ships of war to determine the latitude and longitude of the new island which has sprung up in the Sicilian sea, between Girgentum and Pantalaria. They have also sent some eminent geologists to examine the structure of the island—an object of much curiosity in the scientific world, as hitherto no opportunity has been afforded of carefully investigating an island of this description, they having in all instances sunk back into the sea before the opportunity was allowed for such examination.

BRIEF NOTICES.

"Gen. Nat." It is believed that this distinguished leader of the blacks at the massacre in Virginia, was drowned, in attempting to cross New river. So says a letter to the governor of the state.

Benjamin W. Richards, the excellent mayor of Philadelphia, has been unanimously re-elected by the council.

Small Pox. A strange vessel landed two sick men at Melchias, (Maine), 8th inst. and made off. One died and many persons having visited them, it was reported at Bristol, that one hundred had taken the small pox.

The earth is 2,048,572 miles nearer the sun in winter than in summer. Its motion is 17 miles in a second, so that if a man pulls off his hat to another in the street, he goes many miles bareheaded without catching cold.

Wool. The imports of wool into this city for the two first quarters of 1831, are 1,116,751 lbs. The imports for the third quarter are estimated at 800,000. Total import for nine months, 1,716,751 lbs. [Boston Post.]

Levy of Catholic troops. The following extraordinary statement is extracted from the Roman Catholic Magazine, for August, 1831, under the head "Rome," page 445:—"We have heard from good authority that his holiness has, through the Nuncio, Monsignor Spadaccini, applied to the British government for permission to raise a body of 10,000 troops in Ireland, and that the application has been successful."

A printer in London has made an awkward attempt to evade the cost of stamped paper, by printing the news on cotton, and selling the Gazette under the name of "a political pocket hamster-hat."

Coffee. It is stated that 8,500,000 lbs. of coffee are in the public stores in Haïti, waiting the further reduction of a duty that will take place on the first of January next.

Canal celebration. The citizens of Chillicothe, Ohio, are preparing to celebrate in splendid style, the opening of canal navigation.

Rappahannock canal. The lower section of this canal is now navigable, and boats laden with timber arrive daily in the basin at Fredericksburgh, Va.

Medical use of gold. M. Legrand, an eminent French physician, has published a volume in Paris, on the use of gold in cases of syphilis. The article can be administered in various ways, and in doses amounting to one third of a gram per day, rubbed upon the tongue, in the shape of gold leaf, or the oxide of this metal, or the perchloride of gold, &c. It acts on the digestive organs, without weakening the system and produces an exhalation of spirits.

Naval. The U. S. ship Fairfield, capt. NEWTON dropped down from the navy yard to the anchorage off town point, on Saturday last, preparatory to sailing for the West Indies. Com. ELLIOTT will embark on the Fairfield to resume the command of the U. S. naval force on that station.

The U. S. frigate Brandywine, com. BIDDLE, was at Toulon in August last, to sail soon for Marseilles.—Officers and crew all well. [Norfolk Herald.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at Baltimore brings Liverpool dates to the 15th of September.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

The latest intelligence from Poland is to the 27th of August. The main Polish army had retired within the fortifications of Warsaw, after having sustained a loss of 1,400 or 1,500 men in a reconnaissance, owing to the imprudence of col. Legallais a French officer. Two corps had been detached into the pallanates of Poddachia and Plozk. The former and the stranger under the French gen. Bonmarino, is believed in Paris to have gained a signal victory over a part of the army of Rudiger. One good effect of these diversions is, that the Poles have, in consequence, been enabled to introduce large supplies into Warsaw.

The dictator Kucowiecki, had restored order within the walls of Warsaw. Four of the persons engaged in the massacres of the 16th of August had been shot. Both armies are said to be anxious to come into conflict. Paskewitch was hastening his preparations for decisive operations against Warsaw, wishing to avoid a recurrence of those disasters consequent upon a campaign in the winter, from the effects of which, Dabitsch, his predecessor, had suffered so severely.

The emperor Nicholas is said to have determined on listening to no mediation by other powers—any terms on the part of the Poles short of absolute submission, is, therefore superfluous.

The patriot clubs of Warsaw are represented as great evils; in the excess of their zeal, in the bloody affair of the 16th of August, they perpetrated the most frightful acts of atrocity. Neither age nor sex were spared by them, and their merciless deeds were perpetrated too in the name of liberty, and under the guise of patriotism. The conduct of the civic guards is represented as culpable in the extreme, and that their commander, count Ostrowski, decl-ined, on coming up to the theatre of massacre, that arms were not placed in his hands to destroy his countrymen. The police gates were then broken, and the populace aided by some of the guards.

Gen. Jankowski was seized first and hanged on a lamp post.

"Soon after, generals Salski, Hurtig and Bukowski, M. Fanslow, chamberlain to the emperor, and madame Roz now, were put to death in the same manner. The daughter of that lady was pierced through with a sabre for attempting to defend her mother. These unfortunate victims were mutilated after having been killed. The details are too horrid to be related.

"The rage of the assassins continued unrelenting. They proceeded to a prison in which were confined some agents of the old police, and afterwards to the house of correction, where they recommenced the carnage. Men imprisoned on slight charges, and strangers to politics, were murdered. About 60 individuals perished on that dreadful night.

"It appears that general Kucowiecki declared himself governor of the city, and that the national government confirmed him in that office the next morning. But his efforts were insufficient to arrest the anarchists, because there were no troops of the line at Warsaw, and because the civic guard could not be depended upon. Several murders were committed on the 16th—at three o'clock in the afternoon, a Russian officer, who had been wounded and made prisoner, was taken out of a cart and hanged in the street, because it was reported that he was a Prussian; he was, however, a native of Coorland.

The dictator had issued a proclamation, in which after stating that the diet had been forced by necessity to create a new government, founded upon the authority of the laws, adds, that it would act with all the vigor required by the existing circumstances of the country; that justice should be done towards all who were found guilty of having violated the laws. The count declares he will never suile the national glory, and will take care that, with the aid of the laws, criminal agitators, who were the best allies of the enemies of the country, shall be annihilated.

Report states that the brave Schrynnecki had entered the 4th regiment as a grenadier.

The Russians were reinforcing their army with great activity and it was thought would be able to increase its numbers from 25,000 to 30,000 in a few days; when that should be effected, it was thought Paskewitch would make the assault on Warsaw. The cholera was at Berlin.

ENGLAND.

The coronation of William IV, took place with great pomp on the 8th Sept. Indisposition is said to have been the cause of the absence of the duchess of Kent and her daughter.

The reform bill, it is thought will pass the house of lords, though not without violent opposition.

A British squadron had sailed for the Tagus, for the purpose of redressing the injuries inflicted by the Portuguese government on British subjects.

The British ship of war Alligator, from off Algiers on the 17th August, reports that the French a few days previously had an affair with the Belonins, in which they sustained a loss of 600 men, and are said to be masters of only ten miles round Algiers, 2,500 of their troops were sick in the hospital, and others were constantly returning to France. The town was very badly supplied with provisions.

The Herald of the 12th says:—"The American packet ship President, captain Champlin, passed through Spit-head yesterday evening, in 24 days from New York; she is a splendid vessel, and brings as passenger his excellency, the hon. M. Van Buren, ambassador from the United States to this country. He landed at Cowes.

AUSTRIA.

The Austrian government had suppressed the insurrection in Hungary—Several countries in it had been shot.

ITALY.

Tranquility had been restored, and the report of disturbances in Naples was not believed.

PORTUGAL.

It was said that the French and English governments would act as mediators between the government of Don Miguel and the refugees of Portugal.

FRANCE.

There had been disturbances in Paris—a mob had attempted to destroy the machinery lately introduced into a factory. The armed force was called in and prevented its destruction. Some lamps were broken and other outrages committed—disturbances had also taken place at Blois and other places—order had been restored without any serious injury.

BRUSSELS.

The Brussels papers contain the opening speech of King Leopold to the new legislative body of Belgium. "This address, appears in have given general satisfaction in Brussels.—His majesty adroitly apologizes for the disgraces of the late campaign by attributing them to the accidental superiority of the Dutch in point of discipline, and an unfair surprise upon his subjects; thus by at once saving the courage of the Belgians and assuring them of foreign protection, he seems to have found the shortest way to their good wishes. He very properly identifies himself with the nation, but the promises which he holds out on the thorny subject of the fortresses may hereafter lead to some awkward discussion. Hostilities had entirely ceased at Antwerp, and the Dutch were even showing a disposition to make the amende for the damage which they had already done to Belgian property."

An arrival at New York from Havre, brings advices direct from France to the 12th September. The disturbances in Paris as well as in the departments in the south of France had given some trouble to the police. They had, however, been suppressed without bloodshed, and things were assuming a tranquil state again. At Clermont the prison was forced and its prisoners released.

There were reports of ministerial changes. M. Perier had declared that if the ordinance abolishing hereditary peerage should pass, he would retire. It was stated that should he resign, his place would be filled by M. Decazes, who was a minister of Louis XVIII.

The cholera was making alarming progress in Vienna, Berlin, Hungary and other places, and the government of France were taking active measures to prevent its introduction there.

By this arrival, as well as one at Norfolk, a report is brought, that Schrynecki had assumed the chief command of the Polish army, and, on the 30th of August, had had an engagement with the Russian army under field marshal Paskewitch, and compelled him to quit the position he occupied in front of Warsaw. The private correspondence by these arrivals make no mention of this battle, and we fear that it is not to be relied on.

The manufacturing establishments in France are in a prosperous situation.

Owing to the small quantities of grain brought to market, flour was dear in Paris.

An insurrectionary spirit had manifested itself in Switzerland, and the diet had taken strong measures to suppress it.

MANIFESTO OF THE POLISH GOVERNMENT AGAINST PRUSSIA.

"There are extreme circumstances which will not permit men to observe the conduct which otherwise they would willingly pursue.

"Can it be a reproach to the weak, that when on the point of perishing, they expose the false pretences, of those who, under the cloak of legal conduct, would effectually ensure their destruction, by aiding their adversary?"

"The Poles have a right to say that the faith of nations is but an empty name, and that treaties and conventions have been invented only to cover the crimes of the powerful with the mask of justice. The principle of non-intervention, for what does it serve, but as a pretext in the selfish policy adopted by the cabinets of the present day? How Austria has applied it in the disarming of Durnick's corps is known to Europe, and Europe remains silent. Prussia has violated, in a manner still more striking, a principle which, once adopted, ought to be adopted by all, or applied impartially.

"Often have we addressed to the cabinets, the guarantees of our rights, the most pressing representations; and all have been deaf to our voice. We cannot, indeed, demonstrate by judicial process the wrongs which we have suffered on the Prussian territory. They are, however, sufficiently proved by the most circumstantial details; of all proofs the most convincing is that furnished by the present position of the Russian army.

"Prussia, confident in our weakness, has done well to give evasive answers to all the governments who would seek to maintain, bona fide, the principle of non-intervention. She could not better disguise her conduct from incredulous cabinets, that they might be required to see the French at Warsaw, before they would believe in the concert subsisting between the cabinets of St. Petersburg and Berlin.

"The national government has received a report from the general-in-chief, announcing that the army of Paskewitch is concentrated on the Lower Vistula, and extended in echelon, on the right side of the river, and resting upon the Prussian frontier. [Here follows a minute description of the then position of the army, since changed.] It results from the plan of operation adopted by general Paskewitch, that in case of a check more or less severe, he could with difficulty regain the right bank, and, by consequence, must have the certainty of a secure retreat in Prussia, into which the quarantine will not hinder him long from penetrating, and where no Russian corps will experience the fate of general Durnick. This conduct of Prussia destroys all the advantages which we have acquired by so much devotion, and so much blood spilled all over the soil of Poland. It renders useless, we are bold to say, all the miracles of our courage.

"Our struggle has been an appeal to God; why attempt to influence his decrees, and lend to the strong more terrible arms for the purpose of crushing the weak? Let it be known that it is not with Russia only we are engaged in combat. There was a time when the spectators of a conflict would have thought themselves guilty of a crime if they did not assist the weaker party—the world calls that time barbarous. At present two powers are seen conspiring against an unhappy nation, and the contest is looked upon with sung froid. The attacked nation has not even arms to defend itself, for Prussia, not content with having surrounded our frontiers for a long time with a fetid quarantine, checks the transport of every thing necessary for our defence. Such are the means resorted to in order to reduce us; this is the fair battle offered us by Russia, assisted by the Prussians. Their princes invoke the name of God in their proclamations—God is justice and equity, and invoking him to testify falsehood is committing perjury. Who can foresee the future? The princes who wish for our destruction may, perhaps, hereafter be pursued by misfortune, and, placed in situations of difficulty. Let them then recollect their conduct to Poland. How can we be silent while we experience such injustice. Our complaints must be published, that they may be a solemn manifesto against the conduct of Prussia. The world must know what we have complained of—what are the difficulties we have to conquer; and perhaps then the governments, which are deaf to the voice of justice and humanity, will be forced to admit that a people which has had the courage to support itself single-handed against such powerful enemies combined to annihilate it, is worthy of a free and independent existence."

SUPPLY AND PRICE OF COTTON.

The Columbus (S. C.) Telescope, contains the following statement, communicated by an intelligent and well informed merchant of that place: It exhibits a most discouraging prospect for the cotton grower; but when more of an article is produced than is requisite to supply the current demand, the surplus can only be disposed of by a reduction in price, so as to bring it within the compass of the means of those who could not before afford to purchase. So the quantity of cotton in market has been increased beyond the demand at which it bore a price that paid the producer a handsome profit; and the manufacturer will not buy it unless he can make some profit on his labor—while his prices are reduced to the lowest, in order to extend the sale of his manufactures in a ratio with the increase of the raw material. In the present glutted state of the cotton market, some hope of relief may be entertained from the present agitated condition of Brazil—a decline of 2 or 300,000 bales in the exports of that country, would, perhaps, advance the price of our crop in the whole amount of the value of that quantity—for nothing can be more clear than that too much cotton is grown to permit large profits to the cultivator. The principle in this case is applicable to every business. In 1829, because of the excessive manufactures of coarse cotton yarns, how general was the distress, how mighty the ruin of the cotton spinners? What was the remedy? The spinning of finer yarns, and in the very great extension of the print-works, calling for large supplies for calicoes, &c. and so the spinning became a good business again. What would be the price of flour, if only the capital and labor employed in making iron in Pennsylvania were applied to the growing of wheat—by making the land rich, producing 25 or 30 bushels to the acre instead of about 10? Flour would not sell for three dollars a barrel—for there is no demand for the one or two millions of barrels that so much additional capital and labor would produce. Over-production is the real cause of the decline of price for cotton. Do away the cultivation of the cane in Louisiana, and no man, however favorable his circumstances may be, can raise a pound of cotton in South Carolina, without a great loss and ultimate ruin—though in Louisiana, because of the richer land and a better article, the planters might yet make a living.

The remarks about ship building may suit the recreation of a little island town, like Columbia. This valuable branch of industry was feebly carried on, because there were more ships than business—there had been an over-production of them. But when business a little revived, and only a little, the want of this was discovered and the value of them rapidly advanced, and now, notwithstanding the "enormous duties on materials for ship-building," that business was never more brisk than it is now, and it will remain lively until the demand is supplied; and then if there be not an extensive war in Europe, it will fall back to the building of vessels chiefly for the coasting trade, as before.

From the Columbian Telescope, Aug. 23.

The prospects for the coming crop with regard to price are gloomy. Accounts from England up to the 8th of last month, left it selling from 4½ to 6½d. average 5½d. sterling.

The following statement will shew what that would enable the Charleston shipper to pay, merely to cover cost.

	5½d. is equal to cts. 10,17
Charges.
Insurance, loss of weight, petty charges and commissions 12½ per cent.	1,27
Freight at 5-8d. per lb. and, primage 5 per cent. thereon.	1,21
Duty per lb. 5-8d.	1,15
	— 3,63
	6,54
Add exchange 8 per cent.	52
	— 7,06
Nett sales,

Planters in the interior may after allowing charges to market and commissions to factors estimate what their crops will probably yield. The freight to England is put down at 5-8 per lb.—this is much under what has been paid for the growth of 1830. For that of 1831, unless a plentiful supply of British shipping arrive, the rate of freight will be very high. Owing to enormous duties on materials for ship building, few ships have been built at home while the produce to be carried has greatly increased, vessels from loss and decay have diminished, and we must rely on foreign shipping to carry a great part of our crops.

There is now no doubt that the new duty will be laid on—it will therefore behove the planters to be very particular in handling their cotton, to have it put up in the best possible manner, for the worst cotton pays the same duty as the best; for example, the duty on cotton which might bring 6d. is 10½ per cent. on what sells at 3d. it would be 21 per cent. In France the duty on upland is 3 cents, on Sea Island 5 cents.

ARKWRIGHT.

A MARKET OPENED!

From the Buffalo Advertiser.

The most profitable way of selling American flour, and pot and pearl ashes, to the manufacturers of England.

It is well known to commercial men that the merchants of Canada have a legal right to sell the wheat and flour, produced in the provinces, in the markets of England, for consumption in that country, on payment of a small duty; which right they exercise to great extent, because they usually find it profitable. They also, (and all other persons), have the legal right of importing flour into Montreal and Quebec from Rochester, and other parts of the United States, without paying any duty. When the average price of English wheat in England, is over 67 shillings sterling per quarter of 8 bushels; or $1 56 per bushel of 70 lbs. the duty there on colonial wheat is only 6 pence sterling per quarter, and on colonial flour only 4 pence per bul.—when the average price is under 67s. the duty is increased to 5s. sterling per quarter on wheat and 3s. 1d. per bul. on flour, which is the highest duty required by the existing law on colonial wheat and flour. At the same average price, or when the price is 67s. per quarter and under 68s. the duty in England on wheat and flour from New York and all other foreign ports, is 15s. 8d. sterling per quarter on wheat, 11s. 3d. per bul. on flour.

The practice at Montreal and Quebec is, to collect as much Canadian wheat and flour as possible, and sell the same for shipment to England; it being worth more for that purpose than any other. A second operation is to import from the United States, and sell for consumption in the provinces, and for exportation to the West Indies, as much American flour as practicable.

Thus the American flour from the western country, supplies the place of that which is admitted into England for consumption, on payment of a small duty; which approximates to the advantage of a direct admission there, at the same duty. Since the 15th of May last, the shipments of Canadian wheat and flour from Montreal and Quebec, amount to about 1,150,000 bushels of wheat and 41,256 bbls. of flour.

It is probable that this large export will make a steady and good market at Montreal for American flour. American pot and pearl ashes from Montreal, are admitted into England free; no duty being required; while those from New York and all other foreign ports, pay a duty of 6s. sterling per 112 lbs. or $26 64 per ton, &c.

THE LATE MAJOR BIDDLE.

At a meeting of the officers of the United States' army, stationed at Jefferson Barracks, held at the mess-room of the sixth regiment, on the 4th September, 1831 brigadier general Atkinson was called to the chair, and capt. H. Smith, 6th regt. appointed secretary. The object of the meeting was then stated by the chairman, to wit, to take into consideration the propriety of an expression of the feelings of the meeting, in the death of major Thomas Biddle. Whereupon, it was

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed, to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of this meeting—

And brig. gen. Leavenworth, major Riley, and capt. Palmer, of the 6th regt. capt. Harrison, of the 3rd regt. and capt. Rogers, of the 6th regt. were appointed that committee. The committee having retired for that purpose, prepared and submitted the following preamble and resolutions which were unanimously adopted, viz.

Whereas, a recent melancholy event, deeply to be regretted by the whole community (and particularly by the members of the army) both as to the cause of its origin and its result, has taken from the army a gallant and distinguished officer, and from among us an esteemed and respected friend: Therefore,

Resolved, That this meeting unfeignedly deplore the loss of their estimable fellow soldier, the late maj. Thomas Biddle, an officer who had gallantly distinguished himself in the field against the enemies of his country and whose untimely death now calls forth our deepest sympathies.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for his memory, we will wear the usual badge of mourning for 30 days.

Resolved, That these proceedings be signed by the chairman and secretary, and a copy forwarded to the family of our late friend, with our sincere condolence for their irreparable loss.

H. ATKINSON, brig. gen. U. S. A. chairman.

H. SMITH, capt. 6th reg't, secretary.

Tennessee.—Wm. E. Butler, Alexander Patton.—2.

[This list is made up in the following manner: The "Philadelphia Gazette" (which seems to have been as if the official paper of the convention), of the 28th September, contained the names of all the delegates then known at Philadelphia to have been appointed, being 365 nominations in all; and to these were attached their several places of residence. A subsequent paper gave the names of those who attended, up to the 5th October—and those gentlemen who are without a location in the list above, have residences unknown to us—some, perhaps, were talent-men, picked up, as from several states, because they happened to be in Philadelphia at the time, to make a full representation! We say "perhaps"—but regard the residence of gentlemen as of some importance in the matter before us. Look at Virginia, for example—nearly all the delegates are from the little tide-water counties and New York does not show one delegate except from the city.]

[We do not give the list as correct—but have closely examined the materials furnished to make it so—and if error is, we hope that it is not in us.]

ADDRESS OF THE ANTI-MASONIC CONVENTION.

From the New York Whig.

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow citizens:

A large and growing political party, through us, respectfully addresses you. Numerous bodies of enlightened and honest freemen, in states containing more than half the electors of our union, have openly and fairly delegated us to represent them, in the performance of duties, which cannot fail to affect your essential rights. And believing that your rights are marvellously blended with theirs, we seek, most earnestly, so to perform these duties, as to produce effects equally and extensively beneficial upon the rights of all. These duties consist in nominating candidates to be supported, as candidates for the offices of president, and vice president, of the United States, at the next election, and in acting forth the grounds, on which you are invited to sustain the nomination.

The concurrence of millions of men, in any act of liberation or decision, for objects, in which they have a common interest, presents to the mind a magnificent and exciting spectacle. If the men be intelligent, patriotic, and free, and the object be that of appointing the most suitable of their number, to guard the rights, and advance the prosperity of the nation, which they constitute, human life can rarely exhibit a spectacle of equal interest and sublimity. Scarcely any approach towards such an exhibition has ever been witnessed, in any counmark all the indications of good or evil, which may affect it, and weigh them well, the better to secure the objects of his care.

He should be wise in judgment. To this end, patient examination, cool deliberation, and impartial affections are requisite. Accordingly, he should be in the customary use of them. His judgment is the great hinge of good or evil to millions. It should not therefore be hasty, wavering, or weak; but well informed, faithful and firm.

He should be prudent. This quality refers more to action than to speculation, but includes both, and consists in a sagacious foresight of evils, and an effective application of means to avoid them, as well as in an enlightened anticipation of benefits, and adequate efforts to secure them. It is an exalted merit; not often brilliant in its means, because they are such as common sense enjoins, and therefore excite no wonder; but blessed in its effects, because under all circumstances it leads to the utmost attainable good. Prudence obtains less praise than it deserves, because it is often confounded with the partial and sordid purpose, to which it may be made subservient.

He should be disinterested and patriotic. Yielding himself to the wishes of his fellow citizens for the momentous task of their leading civil service, he should in all its specifications and labors, lose himself in them. Their rights, their safety, their happiness, should be his undeviating aim. Regarding them as his political brethren and principals, he will be intent upon promoting their interests. In this way, he will secure his own. And grateful to them for his elevation to the noblest and widest sphere of beneficent exertion, in which wisdom and virtue can aspire, in this world, he will labor, unceasingly, for the good of his country. With a country distinguished above all others—for its exemption from time-honored abuses either civil, ecclesiastical or military—for its self directing, and self-relying habits of its people—for its ingenuity and enterprise, in all the walks of productive industry—for its force and steadiness of resolve, in pursuit of practical utility—for its just distribution of social respect and honor—for its high and equal valuation of individual rights—for its anxiety and ability to disseminate useful knowledge, among all its children—for the spirit of improvement incorporated in its frame of government, exciting in the discovery, and inviting to the adoption, of every new and useful principle, and method of operation—for its unparalleled advancement in wealth, numbers, and strength—for its facilities of enlargement over half a continent, and of influence over all the world—for the adaptation of its employments, purposes, and institutions, to the rights of man—for its large and increasing enjoyment of the esteem and favor of nations—and for its glorious hopes of perpetuity, it would be as natural as it would be necessary, that he should be a patriot. It would seem impossible for him to be otherwise. Penetrated with a just sense of the dignity and importance of his great trust, he should endeavor to discharge it, with parental and equal regard to every section and member of the national family.

What should be the principles of his administration? Such certainly as are found in the fundamental doctrines of the republic, and are best calculated to harmonize order and right. As drawn from our constitutions and illustrated by the writings and examples of our sages, they are chiefly the following—equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state, condition, or persuasion; religious or political—peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none—the support of the state governments, in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwark against anti-republican tendencies—the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad—a sacred regard to the principles and spirit of our union, which make us one people, and have been the essential means of our national power, honor, prosperity and freedom, as much as they were of the successful assertion of our national independence—acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, even if deemed wrongful, till they can be lawfully changed, by the influence of intelligence and patriotism; such acquiescence being the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism—a well organized militia, our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them—the supremacy of the civil over the military authority—economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly furnished—the honest payment of our debts and careful preservation of the public faith—encouragement of the great interests of agriculture, commerce and manufactures, that every branch of productive industry may be profitable, protected and respected—the diffusion of information, by the reasonable patronage of elementary schools, and scientific establishments, as well as by the publicity of all governmental transactions, with those temporary exceptions only, which are dictated by prudence, in relation to foreign intercourse, and the initiatory steps in prosecuting crime—the arraignment of all abuses at the bar of the public reason—the strict accountability of placement and frequent rotation in office—the unbroken dominion of the laws over all men, whether private citizens, public officers, or associations of both—the prompt and lawful application of all the necessary powers of government to secure the liberty and life of any citizen from criminal invasion, when it is known to be threatened, and the most strenuous and persevering exertion, on all occasions, to disclose and bring to legal punishment, the perpetrators of crimes for liberty has no existence, but in name, where the government is unwilling, or unable, to withstand the enterprises of faction and crime, whether proceeding in secret or in public; confine each member of the society, and association of members, within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all, in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property. There are yet other rights of the people of which his administration should manifest a zealous care—that of political equality, implying general suffrage, and eligibility to office—of the independent and safe application of the right of voting to all cases, which the people shall think proper, as in this way it may become the mild and safe corrective of abuses, which must be lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided—of freedom of religion; freedom of the press, and freedom of person, under the protection of the habeas corpus of trial by jury and judges impartial in their obligations and impartially selected; and of security in person, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures. These seem to us the essential principles of our freedom. They have been raised out of the precious name of human rights, by the labors of ages; and having disengaged them from the rubbish and dross, under which all the workings of ignorance, faction and tyranny, would keep them eternally buried, by the most pur-heated, arduous, and sagacious exertions, our political fathers have combred and set them up, for our shelter and guidance. Let us never be unmindful of them. We can have nothing of so much worth. They are the most brilliant jewels of our nation already ruined and renewed. We cannot overvalue them. But, unlike the shining baubles of ostentatious and unrighteous power, they are valuable in their use. In that alone are they good; and their most important use is, to be made the touchstone of the merits of those we trust.

Are these principles in danger? Every candid man, who will enquire, must think so. They were never in danger so imminent. Their foe is rich, disciplined, and wily. He obeys no rules of civilized warfare, no restraint of truth, no justice, no pleadings of humanity. He already occupies the principal posts heretofore relied on, as the chief defence of our liberty; every where lies in wait to deceive; endeavors to poison the springs of resistance to him; seduces the unwary, disloyal, and coward, by flattery, lucrative employment, and offers of preferment; intimidates the irresolute and weak, by haughty exhibitions of his power; and assails by a thousand ambushes, and by all sorts of weapons the most even-minded and condemned, the watchful, thoughtful, steadfast, and unconquerable friends of free principles. Such a foe is freemasonry.

This appears incredible to honest unreflecting men, till they fairly understand the character of freemasonry, and ascertain its conduct. Whenever they do this, the incredibility vanishes; they join the great rally of anti-masons, and work with one mind and untiring zeal, in all the way of law and honor, for its abolition. The disinclination to take up impressions of evil against it arises, almost wholly, from the fair characters of some men, who have been connected with it, and from the support of it, by interested politicians, and the presses under its control.

Honorable men have joined it, in early life. Incited by unsuspected representations of its purity and value, and by curiosity to explore a mystery, they surrendered themselves to the wash of its members, and offered to be conducted into its dark chambers. Of these we know some stopped at the threshold; some, in the first degree; some in the second; and more, in the third. None of them knew any thing of its peculiar ceremonies, oaths, or objects, till they had sworn to conceal them. They have often praised the virtues it claimed, for they loved virtue, and hoped the claim was just. But they never imbibed its spirit, or knowingly approved its principles. From the first step of their initiation, they always suspected both. If they did not, we should have heard from some of the ten thousand conscientious and patriotic seceders, who have opened the door upon all its proceedings, of fathers leading their sons to the masonic altar. Among them all, the seceders have probably witnessed admissions into nearly every lodge in the union. No one has told you, that he ever assented at the initiation of his own son, or knew any other father do so, in relation to his son. Is not this a most honest, legible, and fatal condemnation of the order, derived from witnesses the most competent and credible though unwilling—even from the very hearts of its adhering members? What! would not a father initiate his son, the pride of his life, the hope of his age, the object of his prayers, into an association of honorable men most exclusively designed, and most wisely adapted, to the inculcation of science, charity, religion? How have good fathers done, who have become freemasons? Let each one look around among his acquaintances, and recall his past observation, for the answer. They have discontinued attendance upon the lodges. They have preferred other schools of science, for their children. They have resorted to better means of impressing the love and practice of clarity upon their hearts. They have looked higher for their religion. Either the best of fathers, who had joined the lodge, were anti-masonic in the bottom of their hearts, knowing the institution to be a base imposture; or they hated their children.

But how have members, who were most distinguished for public honor and private virtue out of the lodge, conducted, in relation to it? Franklin is said to have replied to his brother, who asked his advice about joining the society, "one fool is enough in a family." When the reputable and benevolent Jeremy Grille, was grand master of the Massachusetts masons, before the most criminal degrees of the order were known in our country, he was enquired of, by a young friend, whether it was worth his while to become a mason? and he answered NO—with this pregnant addition, "by aggregation to the society a young man might acquire a little artificial support, but that he did not need it; and there was nothing in the masonic institution worthy of his seeking to be associated with it." The enquirer, afterwards, by his bold and freedom-freighted thoughts, and the high bearing of his devoted expression of them, was the most prominent agent in carrying the declaration of independence, in the illustrious congress of '76.

But, Washington, and his brother officers of glorious memory, were masons. True. They were admitted to three degrees. None of them went higher, in the early days of our independence. Washington never visited a lodge but once or twice after 1768; and never presided in one. He afterwards in effect, renounced it; and so did a large majority of the officers before alluded to, in their voluntary determination to extinguish the Cincinnati society. To this society they were bound by stronger ties than masonry can offer to uncorrupted minds—by those of a natural and general and generous sympathy, of which the golden links were struck out and forged, in the welding fires of our revolutionary war.

The origin of this society was innocent; its objects were laudable; its laws were published; its meetings were not secret; it administered no oaths, imposed no bloody penalties, had no division into degrees, and its members were respected and honored as the benefactors of their country; but it introduced distinctions between its members and other citizens; its associates wore badges, a ribbon and eagle; it was hereditary; admitted honorary members; and had funds for charity. Thus constituted all the whigs of the country, in civil life, as soon as it was known to them, opposed it, as eminently dangerous to liberty. It had no political objects. The conduct of its members, and the true purpose of the association were excellent. But it was liable to abuse. Political means were resorted to, for its abolition. Governors of states denounced it; legislative bodies expressed their opposition to it, by resolutions; assemblies of private citizens reprobated it; the press sternly and universally rebuked it; the whole country was excited to a flame against it.

Washington soon became sensible that it might produce political evils, which the pure and strong motives, in which it originated, had hidden from the observation of its members. And he attended its first annual meeting determined to exert all his influence for its suppression. He did so exert it. And the order was on the point of being annihilated by the vote of the great majority of its members. Its complete annihilation was prevented, only by a sense of courtesy and consistency towards their foreign brother officers, whom the members had officially and formally invited to join it, before they had well considered the abuses of which it was susceptible, and the political tendencies, which it might foster. They did destroy its essential features, by resolving that the order should be no longer hereditary, and that no new members should be admitted. They discontinued wearing its badges, in this country; and left nothing of its existence, but its name, its meetings, which were changed from being annual to triennial, and its charitable funds, which were ordered to be deposited with the state legislatures. This fundamental modification, with the well known cause of its continuance, in the shape it was made to assume by its own members, appeased the public; though Jefferson, and many others, expressed a decided disapprobation of its continuance at all.

Compare this society with freemasonry, in its motives, its origin, its degrading ceremonies, its accumulation of titles, its numerous expressive though fantastic badges; its exacting obedience in the lower degrees, and irresponsible authority in the higher; its secrecy; its oaths; its penalties; its claims of exclusive allegiance; its long list of degrees; its means of private recognition, command, and universal concert; its affiliation with members in all foreign countries; its numbers; its boasted power; its crimes, and the pertinacity with which it is sustained, by its adhering members; and it is impossible not to be convinced, that it is exceedingly dangerous; and that those, who were willing to renounce the Cincinnati society, would be compelled, by the same patriotic motives, which controlled them, in that act, if they had lived till now, to renounce freemasonry. They would have insisted upon its total abrogation. It must be abrogated.

The unavoidable inference drawn by every prudent man, from observing the conduct of its best members, in all past time, is, that its character is bad. This inference is greatly strengthened, by the intelligible hints and friendly advice of the most trust worthy among them. It should be ripened into unhesitating conviction by a consideration of the secrecy, which it enjoins. Standing secrecy always implies shame and guilt. It is utterly inconsistent with social improvement, confidence and innocence. All the descendants of Adam inherit his nature. While he was innocent, he was ingenuous, communicative, without the need, or the desire, of concealment. For the first crime he committed, even before the sentence of banishment from Paradise, was pronounced upon him, he sought concealment.

But we are not left to our own reasonable inferences, or to hints, and a few honest but guarded expressions, from its members, to decide upon the character of freemasonry. That character has been revealed, under oath, by its adhering members, and by a great band of seceders. And how does it stand? Infamous beyond all parallel in human annals. Its principles are vicious, murderous, treasonable; and so far as they prevail, totally hostile to those of our government.

In the first degree, the candidate pledges himself under oath, and upon forfeiture of his life if he does not redeem the pledge, to ever conceal and never reveal the secrets of freemasonry, which he has then received, is about to receive, or may thereafter be instructed in. Among the secrets, which the candidate may, and must be instructed in, if he takes the second degree, is that of his pledge of passive obedience to the laws of the lodge, and all regular summons sent him by a brother of that degree. If he takes the third degree, among those secrets are pledges to fly to the relief of a brother of that degree, when masonically required so to do, at the risk of life; should there be a great probability of saving the life of the brother requiring, than of losing his own—to apprise a brother of all approaching danger if possible—and to conceal the secrets of a brother master mason, when communicated to him as such, murder and treason only excepted, and they left at his discretion. And if he takes the royal arch degree, among those secrets are pledges—to extricate a brother of that degree from danger, if he can, whether that brother be right or wrong—to promote* his political preference before that of all others of equal qualifications—and to conceal his secrets, murder and treason not excepted. Thus is the concealment of crimes made a masonic duty; and the candidates expressly disclaim all equivocation, mental reservation, or evasion of mind, both in the first degree, and in the last.

How do these parts of masonry affect the moral character of its members? In the first degree, and every other, no man knows any of its obligations, till after he has sworn to conceal them. It is a first principle in morals, that there is no accountability without knowledge and free will. Such oaths, therefore, are not binding, and no forms, or objects, or a few rites, can make them so. But what is the purpose of the order, in the ceremony of imposing them? Can it be good? It is certainly such as can be accomplished only by men devoid of all sense of accountability. The less of this sense the better, for all the purposes of fraud and crime—and the more of it the better, for all the purposes of integrity and virtue. These are truths, which nobody can gainsay. All the history of party, on the one hand, and of sin on the other, asserts them. They are obvious to the common sense of all men. This proceeding of freemasonry, is, therefore, obviously in hostility to good morals. It is more than that. To take such an oath deliberately and with an intent to perform it, is an attempt at the voluntary extirpation of the highest rights of the soul, and a complete foreclosure of the source of every duty. It is not possible to imagine a more aggravated crime. Rape, murder, treason, may be repented of, and their perpetrators reclaimed. But to forego the rights of knowledge and volition, in regard to every proposition, which can be offered to a moral agent, amounts to a desperate erasure of the image of God from the breast. It would necessarily preclude repentance, reformation, pardon, hope, and be death, in its most mangleable horrors. It would be as much worse than common suicide, as the value of the immortal spirit is greater than that of the corruptible body.

In the degrees, higher than the royal arch, the members swear to oppose the interest, derange the business, and destroy the reputation, of unfaithful brethren, through life,—to prefer the interests of a companion of the order, or of a companion's friend, for whom he pleads, to those of any mere man of the world, in matters of difference submitted to them—never to engage in mean party strife, nor conspiracies against the government or religion of their country, whereby their reputation may suffer, nor ever to associate with dishonorable men, for a moment, EXCEPT it be to secure the interest of such person, his family, or friends, to a companion, whose necessities require this degradation at their hands—to follow strictly every command of the illustrious knights, and grand commander, and especially to sacrifice the traitors of masonry.

Have these points of masonic obligation any political bearing? All the rights of man are founded in his moral nature. It is the intention of free government to secure him in the possession of these rights. Whatever is hostile to good morals is therefore opposed to the end and policy of freedom. We have seen large numbers of the most intelligent, wealthy, and respectable freemasons in New York, deliberating in their lodges and elsewhere, on the means of suppressing a written disclosure of their secrets, by one of their number—we have seen notices of a slanderous character, simultaneously printed, a few days before the seizure and murder of Morgan, in newspapers a hundred miles apart, warning the public—against the designs of the author of this disclosure and especially directed to the masonic brotherhood—about the same time we have seen masons set fire to a building prepared by them with peculiar care for sudden combustion, because it was supposed to contain this disclosure in manuscript—we have seen them employ a masonic printer, who was a stranger and an alien, to go into the office where it was printing, with the offer to aid in that work by labor and money, for the sole purpose of stealing the manuscript—we have afterwards seen them kidnap the writer of it, carry him handwinked and bound, with the greatest secrecy and caution, through a great extent of populous country, to a fort of the United States—unlawfully and forcibly imprison him there—collect together in frequent deliberation, upon the means of his final disposition—communicate, while in this situation, with several members of a chapter of their body, then numerous,ly attended in the neighborhood—and resolve unanimously, though with painful reluctance, on the part of some, that their masonic obligations required them to murder him not for any offence against the state, but for the sole cause of his attempting to publish the secrets of the order, which he had a lawful right to do, and which, considering their character, he was bound to do, by every consideration of private morality and fidelity to his country. On the night of the 19th of September, 1826, they accordingly murdered him. To this fearful commutation none were privy, but those who had as masons, sworn to assist each other, right or wrong, and to conceal each other's murder and treason. After the murder, all the precautions possible was taken for concealing it; but this not being wholly successful, and legal prosecutions being threatened, the criminals frequently met and consulted together, for their mutual safety. The most influential among them invited, that it called by the legal authorities of our country to testify, they one and all must swear they knew nothing of the matter; otherwise they would be forever to masonry and might lose the life they would thus forfeit. As witnesses, as magistrates, as sheriffs, as grand jurors, as petit jurors, as legislators, these masons and others with whom they were intimate, would know nothing of it. In all their civil relations they violated their oaths and the most sacred duties. They flew to each other's assistance knowing their criminality. They gave each other notice of the approaching danger of legal prosecution. They spied away witnesses whom they feared, would disclose too much. They prepared themselves in court. They consciously refused to answer questions decided to be legal. They declined to answer, on the ground, that if they should, they would criminate themselves in relation to the murder. They prevented the judicial ascertainment, and punishment of the foul criminals. They made common cause in behalf of these criminals, against the rights of the citizen, and the laws of the land. Thousands of them were acquainted with some of the steps of these crimes against the state. Hundreds of them know the leading malefactor.

A good citizen cannot look on with indifference and see a fellow freemason kidnaped and murdered. He cannot know that such crimes are successfully protected, by an extensive, artful, and powerful conspiracy, without being exerted against it. The sympathies of a patriot embrace his whole country. The poorest man, the most defenceless woman, the weakest child in it, cannot be assailed with unlawful violence, without quickening his pulse, and stiffening his sinews, with indignation. His blood is up in every case of high crime; and it keeps up against the aggressor, till the law performs its office upon him. To the law he is willing to submit, because he knows it is the deliberate expression of the public will for the public good; the great shield spread by the hands of all, over the rights of all.

Individual rights are, separately considered, of immeasurable and indefinite worth. They partake of the infinitude of moral existence and responsibility. As contemplated by our government, a single individual, and one as much as another, is an august being, entitled to inviolable reverence, and bearing upon him the badges of a most majestic origin, and the stamp of most transcendent destinations. His safety, his liberty, his life, his improvement, his happiness, it designs, at all times and places, faithfully to protect, by the application of all its delegated means. The law is the beneficial instrument of this protection, and should be appreciated by every reflecting man as the sacred, living, and most venerable expression of the national mind and will. Break this, and the nation has but one right left, which it can peaceably enforce, the right of suffrage.

The masonic institution is answerable for the crimes to which we have referred. They were committed in obedience to its prescribed and specific oaths, and in fear of its penalties. The man-stealing and murder, were for no other than a masonic officer. The whole array of its frightful crimes, not of court, and in court, were no other than necessary means of carrying into effect the obligations it has deliberately and universally exacted of its members. All who uphold the obligations, uphold the crimes. No adhering mason has afforded the least willing assistance to the exposure and punishment of them. No lodge or chapter has called the criminals to account. Many of them are known to the public. Chesebrough, and Sawyer, and Lawson, and Bruce, and Whitney, have been convicted of the conspiracy to kidnap, and have been condemned and suffered infamous punishments, and the very murderers are known with moral, though not with strict judicial certainty. Not one of these men have been expelled. The grand lodge or grand chapter of which they were members, has the power of expulsion, but has declined to exercise it in relation to them; and such of them as are still living, are, in masonic estimation, worthy members of the order.

But the fraternity have gone much farther to make that crime their own. In 1827 the grand lodge gave 100 dollars to one of its members then under public accusation for kidnapping Morgan; and afterwards convicted of that offence; and the grand chapter, by its vote, placed 1,000 dollars at the control of another of its members, ostensibly for charitable uses, of which a part has been proved, in a court of justice, to have been applied for the benefit of other kidnappers; and the trustee of the charity has never been called to an account by the grand chapter, for any part of the sum, though in all other cases such accountability is enforced by the chapter. The records of this last body, apparently relating to this transaction, have been produced in court, and were seen to be mutilated.

The fraternity have also employed and paid able counsel to defend the criminals.

In this way, while the chief magistrate of the state of New York was, by proclamation, offering money, for the conviction of the offenders, the highest masonic bodies, in that state, were offering, and in their associate capacity actually paying money to protect and support them. Can it be justly thought surprising, then, that so few convictions have followed upon such enormous offences, and that no more of the facts have been ascertained in legal form?

The criminals, in all these atrocities, testified their devotion to the institution, and by its own laws are only the more entitled to its good regard, by all the hazards they involved. That care has been extended to them in every form of expression tending to their relief and comfort. Besides the exertions of their brethren already alluded to, adhering masons have, at great expense, established and circulated newspapers to vitiate all who were engaged in exposing the crimes, and to call into action the entire resources of the fraternity, in behalf of those who committed them. These newspapers have, with the most unflinching hardihood, asserted the innocence and praised the virtues of the convicts, several of whom they knew to have confessed their offences. They have commended the most stubborn refusal in court to reveal the truth by masonic witnesses, as many firmness. They have in every form of misrepresentation, which they could devise, labored to darken all knowledge of the facts relating to the outrages; and to blot out the moral sense of the community.

Hundreds of the brethren in different counties in the state of New York, have published addresses, under their names, in which they have deliberately contradicted facts established judicially, by many of their adhering brethren and by many avowed masons; and which, under the sanction of a lawful oath, and subject to cross examination before the public, they would be compelled to admit. Similar falsehoods have been published in an address of a committee of the grand lodge of Rhode Island—and the grand secretary of the grand lodge of New York has recently issued an official letter, in which he represents that body as extending its deprecations, confident in its strength, and determined to outwage all the consequences of their detected guilt, and the public indignation. Nothing could account for this universal course of falsehood, but the unhappy truth, that the men who are engaged in it, have sworn, under the penalty of death, to conceal the secrets of freemasonry, a most essential branch of which consists in the crimes of its members. This course is countenanced by the president of the U. States, who is a mason, and who has recently appointed as heads of the departments in the national government, a majority of distinguished masons. One of these heads of departments—the post master general, the only one retained of the late cabinet, has removed a large number of his most competent and faithful deputies, in New York, for the sole cause of the zeal and patriotism with which they sought to bring into just exposure the crimes and institution of freemasonry.

The course of these transactions is rapidly corroding and wearing away the very basis of all public and private virtue in our country; and eradicating that moral confidence, upon which the business of life, its peace, and its enjoyments essentially depend. When men refuse to bear testimony in court, to public offences, of which they know the perpetrators, and are proved for it—when they perjure themselves, and are not disgraced—when they are convicted of a conspiracy to kidnap a free citizen, and are applauded as victims to the prejudices of their countrymen—when the distinctions between right and wrong are practically superseded, by the systematic and solemn injunctions of a wealthy, intelligent, numerous and powerful society, diffused and sustaining itself in all the places of social influence and honor—when in pursuance of this injunction, the laws of the land, in the solemn places of their judicial application for the punishment and punishment of the most flagrant offences, are foully baffled, set aside and scorned—then, the social fabric is trembling—then there can be but one alternative, that of reform or ruin—then, looking beyond, but not forgetting, all the considerations of attachment to the policy of encouraging this or that branch of national industry—this or that scheme of financial management,—this or that exposition of the principles of our political organization—this or that subject of all our foreign and domestic policy, the considerate friend of his country will govern himself primarily, by the obvious necessity to which he is reduced of preserving for his country the power of determining for itself upon any course of policy, and of disengaging the heart of the body politic from the fangs of a monster more blood thirsty, remorseless and insatiable, than any, which has ever come to prey upon the hopes of men.

There is a bearing of freemasonry, not yet embraced in this address, which is repulsive to the most distressing apprehensions. There is located, in Boston, a masonic body denominated the African grand lodge, which dates its origin before the American revolution, and derived its existence from a Scottish duke. This body acknowledges no allegiance to any of the associations of American masonry. Its authority is co-extensive with our union. It has already granted many charters to African lodges. We are afraid to intimate their location, to look in upon their proceedings, to count their inmates, or to specify their resources.

What are the means of removing these dangers? The dangers are confined to no one place, in our country, and to no one department of our social interests; but extend to all places, and infect every department. Common prudence demands, that the means should be capable of reaching them, wherever they exist, and susceptible of a safe application, in their utmost extent. Such means we have; and we are familiar with their use. They consist in the honest exercise of the right of suffrage, and the most patriotic employment of official patronage. The evils of freemasonry operate upon the moral and political condition of the nation, and can be removed only by moral and political means. It is the exalted excellence of our political institutions, that they are especially designed and adapted to secure our rights, all of which pertain to us as moral beings. In voting, every elector should always be governed by a knowledge of his rights, and the desire of preserving them. There can be no higher political duty than this.

But the use of our right of suffrage against freemasonry is termed proscription. Proscription cannot be imputed to a party, because it justly opposes what is wrong. It is not proscription to be resolute and active in detecting and denouncing opinions of which the obvious tendency is to enslave society; or to resist, by every lawful means, the influence of men, who commit crimes, and contribute to support each other in their commission. To call such detection, denunciation and resistance, proscription, could never satisfy an honest mind. It would be like stigmatising, with an opprobrious epithet, those public benefactors, who teach men, that all violations of duty are criminal and disreputable, and make their best exertions to discourage them. Proscription can apply only to those, who oppose and lessen the influence of their fellow citizens, because they innocently and with good motives, think and act differently from themselves. Such proscription deserves reprehension, because it invades the equal rights of others, and is averse to the improvement and happiness of all.

The offences of freemasonry upon our individual and national rights, if they had been committed by a foreign nation would, by the law of nations, have justified a public war to avenge them. Shall we fall in love with crime because those who commit it are near us? Shall we spare the destroyer because we can subdue him peaceably? Freemasonry can be destroyed by the votes of freemen, and by nothing else. All who are truly opposed to it, will always vote against it. And they deceive nobly but themselves, who profess opposition to it, and yet dare not express that opposition by their vote.

No good reason has been rendered, or can be rendered, why a freeman, who is opposed to freemasonry, should not vote against it. The application of the right of suffrage against it is just, peaceable, effective and may be as comprehensive as the evils which alarm us. And no other means can be described, or imagined which unite these characteristics. Voting is the only decisive means by which public opinion can be distinctly ascertained upon the subject. And since many persons not initiated into the society, openly connect themselves with its fortunes, and make every exertion in their power to sustain it, by their votes, we cannot safely, if we would, betake ourselves to any other resort but the ballot boxes for its destruction. These persons affect to consider themselves as entitled to the praise of all candid and unexcited minds, by the course which they adopt; and profess to be neither masons nor anti-masons; claiming the respect of the community for their indifference to its rights and welfare. If it had not been for the support of the order, by interested and profligate politicians, who were not members, the forfeiture of public confidence justly incurred, by its crimes, would have been so early borne to the minds of its most worthy members, as long ago to have induced its entire dissolution. It is an undoubted fact, that the men, who are neither masons nor anti-masons, are answerable for the continuance of the order. They have kept it from sinking into annihilation by its sins, and are thus equally consumable with its members. No association of men, however impudent and hardened, can withstand, for years, the indignant, well loaded, universal rebuke of their fellow citizens. So treated, the worst members would be driven from the face of the sun, and from public observation, into the hostesses and caves of the earth, to take upon themselves the skulking habits, along with the flagitious purposes, of felons; and the best would be compelled to abandon it.

It is attempted to make anti-masonic odious, because it is political. But these attempts must recoil upon those with whom they originate. None but tyrants can think the use of political means degrading. And there seems to be peculiar effrontery required to impeach it, in a country where every thing most memorable, in its history has been inseparably connected with political movement, and every thing most animating in its prospects, is dependent upon political action and supersession. The exertions of our fathers to establish our independence, were political exertions. Even the revolutionary war and the war of 1812, were waged for political objects. The constitutions, by which our civil and religious rights are secured, are political constitutions. And this independence, these constitutions, and rights, can be preserved and perpetuated only by political means.

Voting for our public servants is the highest exercise of sovereign power known in our land. It is the paramount distinctive privilege of freemen. In countries where only a small minority of the people are authorized to vote, if oppressive measures are adopted, by their rulers, they must either submit, or fight. In countries where all the citizens are authorized to vote, if they are oppressed, they can throw off the oppression, by their votes. And if the frowns of power, or the calumnies of malefactors have force to dissuade them from using their votes to throw it off, they are fit for slaves, and can be only slaves. The highest functionaries of the general and state governments are amenable to the people, for the proper discharge of their duties. But a freeman, when he votes for a candidate, exercises the right of selecting, among those who are eligible, subject to no authority under heaven. For his choice, he is accountable only to his conscience and his God. And why should he not, in the most sovereign act he can perform, do himself the great justice of giving expression to the honest conviction of his soul? If having the will, he cannot do it, he is a slave. If having the power, he will not do it, he is corrupt.

An enlightened exercise of the right of suffrage is the constitutional and equitable mode adopted by the anti-masons to remove the evils they suffer, and produce the reforms they seek. But this mode, to be availing, must include a judicious selection of candidates. After diligent inquiry and mature deliberation we have selected, and now nominate, for your support, as a candidate for the office of president of the United States, at the next election,

WILLIAM WIRT, of Maryland;

And for vice president,

AMOS ELLMAKER, of Pennsylvania.

These citizens we deem eminently possessed of the qualifications before set forth, as most essential for the offices, with which they have associated their names—and confident of their devoted attachment to the principles of administration contained in this address, and their concurrence in our views of the crimes of freemasonry, and the necessity of their removal, by directing against them the sovereign and free remedy of public suffrage, and the bestowment of official favors, we earnestly recommend them to your support. Their election would be a great step towards the rescue of our republic from the odious and formidable power which endangers it; and we will labor to accomplish it, in the spirit of freemen. In this labor we invite you to participate.

Our free principles cannot be preserved without constant vigilance, and a continuance of the same disinterested and determined action, by which they were established. They are the best possession of the rich, and the only wealth of the poor. They are the common and peculiar property of the nation, embracing all its rights, its virtues and its fortunes.

Neither the price of our liberties nor their fruits will permit them to be regarded without emotion, by any intelligent mind. They have been purchased by ages of just, and earnest thought, of brave and generous effort, of vicissitude, and suffering, and blood. Nor have they been purchased in vain. They have taught man to form a just estimate of his own worth, and of that of his fellow beings, to estimate the value of a reasonable and responsible creature, not by the place which he may hold in an artificial and unnatural state of society, but solely by the faculties conferred upon him, by his Maker, and the intelligence and virtues of his character. And while they have abased the proud from his stilted and haughty elevation, they have brought up the poor to the exalted standard of human rights and human hopes; and thus opened the way for the whole family of man, "to run the great career of justice." We have set out first in this career. Let us remove every impediment, which would obstruct our progress in it, and by the attractions of our success invite all nations to embrace it. If we are true to ourselves, our institutions, our fathers and our posterity, this is to be our glorious destiny.—The influence of our example is already great. In our foreign conflicts and negotiations, our vigor, prudence, and wisdom, have made us respected and illustrious. Let not these qualities be wanting in their proper domestic applications, that the value of our example may be enhanced, and its influence increased. Providence has manifestly cast upon us the high responsibility of determining the most interesting problem of social life, that of man's capacity for self-government. If we suppress all unsocial conspiracy and selfish faction, from within, as we hitherto have done all dictation and tyranny from without, we shall determine it in favor of liberty. Such a determination the great and good of every nation expect from us; and they are beginning, in the face of all their foes, to hazard upon it, their possessions, their honor and their lives. Let us neither disappoint them, nor betray ourselves. A disinterested and faithful adherence to the principles which we inculcate, and to the modes of sustaining them, which we recommend, becomes both our cause and our responsibility; and irresistibly commending itself to the honest and the free, it will give that cause success. If it fails, then, right, duty, improvement, self-government, happiness, are phantoms. We shall be compelled to repudiate the memory of our immortal sires, and forgo the great inheritance they have bequeathed us. But it will not fail. Freedom is not more the friend of man, than the favorite of heaven. It is equally our highest glory, our most sacred duty, our most assured hope and our promised possession.

THE MISSIONARIES.

From the (Georgia) Recorder of September 24.

Trial of the Missionaries, &c.

Our correspondent writes to us from Lawrenceville on the 16th instant as follows:

"An interesting trial took place yesterday before the superior court of this county, in the case of the state against Elizar Butler, Samuel A. Worcester, James Trot, missionaries, and eight other white men, residents of the Cherokee country the latter with but one exception, have been charged with Cherokee women.

They were tried upon and found guilty of the territory occupied by the Cherokees within the charter of limits of Georgia, in violation of a law passed at the last session of the Legislature, which required them to take an oath to support the constitution and laws of the state. It was contradicted by counsel in their behalf, that the law was unconstitutional; that the state had no right to exercise jurisdiction over that territory, and to make such an execution of them, inasmuch as it was not required of other citizens. The court in the end decided that it had been the uniform practice for years past, to enforce the criminal jurisdiction of the state over that a portion of country; that individuals similarly situated had been punished for a violation of the laws, they cited authorities to prove the right of the state in this respect, and that other states had, under precisely similar circumstances, exercised both civil and criminal jurisdiction. A jury had been called and had taken about 9 o'clock in the morning, appeared to be impartial and as little biased by prejudice as any that could be obtained. The argument did not close until after 12 o'clock at night. Judge Clayton then delivered to the jury in the case, pronounced the law and which the prisoners were arraigned to be, in his opinion, clearly constitutional, cited numerous decisions in similar cases heretofore determined, and directed the jury to decide for the lives from the evidence in the case, as to their guilt or innocence. The jury after fifteen minutes absence, returned, finding the whole guilty. The prisoners were to-day sentenced to undergo four years imprisonment in the penitentiary. When they were arraigned to receive sentence, and the question was put by the court why they should not be pronounced, Mr. Worcester rose and replied to the following effect:—I did not in the previous trial. I am guilty of the charges which have been made against me in the argument of this case, but not alleged in the indictment, then I have nothing to say why the sentence of the law should not be pronounced against me. But I aver before my God and my country, that I am not guilty of those charges. I therefore say what I have heretofore said, that the state of Georgia has no right of jurisdiction over the territory in which I reside, and therefore this court has no right to pass sentence upon me."

It has been intimated here that these prisoners act under the advice of high counsel—that their rate is expected to be removed by writ of error and they released—some of them not desiring the executive clemency.

Counsel for the prisoners, Messrs. Harden, Chisler, Harris and Underwood. For the state, Messrs. Squire, Travis, Hulings and Holt. Mr. Monroe also addressed the jury, but merely with the view of cautioning them against being influenced by any degree of prejudice in their decision."

	Sentence of the court.
The state,	vs.	Indictment,
The missionaries.		In Guinneth superior court.
Verdict—Guilty.

As I sincerely believe this prosecution has been sought and conducted, I will not say in an unchristian temper, but certainly in a great spirit of opposition to the laws, for political effect, I deem it my duty to make a few remarks on this occasion, not by way of vindication of the public authorities, for they need none, but to prevent a universal opinion of public opinion, and with a hope that it may and will excite many an innocent and innocent individual, who has been accused into a similar transgression, by the high example of this infamous abuse-dictator. I mean no reprimands, the penalty of the law is punishment enough for the offence, and my respect for misfortune always inclines me the rather to reduce than increase its sufficiency. I shall speak a free and decided language, unmingled however with the least temper of unkindness. Forseeing, as I think I do, one of the main objects of this singular perversion, I will endeavor, as far as in my power to counteract it by a full and plain history of the case. I will not pretend to discuss the right of jurisdiction; that matter is a thorn; but that every body may see the true nature of this whole transaction, I proceed to give the following narrative: In the year 1828, the late venerable president Monroe, commenced to engage in the design which had been the subject of deep reflection by that benevolent sage, of ameliorating the condition of the Indians bound on the east of the Mississippi, by way as he emphatically expressed, "of atonement alike due from our justice and humanity, for the long train of injuries inflicted on that race, by the discovery and settlement of America. I wish my limited powers could have done more for the whole of this document, but I can only give a few of its outlines. He commences thus: "being deeply impressed with the opinion that the removal of the Indian tribes, from the lands which they now occupy within the limits of the several states and territories, to the country lying westward and northward thereof, is of very high importance to our union, and may be accomplished in a measure to promote the interests and happiness of the tribes, the attention of the government has been long drawn with great solicitude to the object. For the removal of the tribes within the limits of Georgia, the motive has been peculiarly strong, arising from the compact with that state." After stating many considerations in favor of this plan, such as the future peace and contentment of the Indians; their removal from all the causes which disturb their quiet, hasten their peace, support their religious instruction, and finally their removal from the influence of the white people, he clearly demonstrated, that in their present state it is impossible to incorporate them in such masses in any form whatever, into our system. It has also demonstrated with equal certainty, that without a timely anticipation of, and provision against the dangers to which they are exposed under circumstances which it will be sufficient to say, it is not possible to control, their degradation, they would be gradually and inevitably brought to the point of being greatly attached to their native soil, from a variety of motives, yet "to prevent intrusion on their property, to teach them by regular instruction, the arts of civilized life, and to form them into a regular government, were considerations of so powerful a nature, as to induce them, and especially their elders, who had attained sufficient intelligence to discern the progress of events, to acquiesce in the plan, and by yielding the debt of justice, due to the future of the government, to prevent them from inevitable destruction."

"To the United States, (he said) the proposed arrangement offers many important advantages in addition to those already enumerated. By the establishment of such a government over these tribes, with their consent, we become in reality, their benefactors. The relation of conflicting interests which has heretofore existed between them, and our frontier settlements, will cease. There will be no more wars, and the peace of the United States. And it may be fairly presumed that through the agency of such a government, the condition of all the tribes inhabiting that vast region to the Pacific, may be essentially improved, their peace preserved, and our commerce extended." Here then is the beginning and foundation of that wise and humane policy laid by the general government, so worthy of the heart and heart that conceived it in the first place, and so worthy of the debt of justice, due to this unfortunate people. Is it not just? Is it not humane? Ought it to be frustrated? I put these questions to all candid and reflecting minds. But this is not all; this policy has the sanction of other great names. Mr. Calhoun in the same year as secretary of war, made a report to congress on the same subject, and stated among other facts, that the whole nation of Indians to be removed in the United States, did not exceed 22,000, and the population of Rhode Island, and the sum of 90,000 dollars would effect the object, and concluded by a declaration that if fixed principles are adopted to effect the object, such as had been suggested by the president and himself, the basis of a system might be laid, which in a few years would entirely effect the object in view, to the mutual benefit of the government and the Indians, and which in its operations would effectually arrest the calamitous course of events, to which they are now subjected without a radical change in the present system." The next statement we find recommending this highly benevolent object, is president Adams, and in accordance with his views, the committee on Indian affairs, to whom that part of his message was referred, called upon Mr. Barbier then secretary of war, for such report and specific plan as was best calculated to accomplish the purpose, to labor, their removal, and submitted it with very able and judicious remarks, warmly recommending the plan, and enforcing it by a variety of considerations replete with justice and wisdom. Among which he urged that "next to the advantages to be gained by ours lives the future residence of these people—will be for ever undisturbed, that there at least they will find a home, and a resting place, and being exclusively under the control of the United States, and consequently free from the rival claims of any of the states, they form a new and happy people, faith that it shall be theirs forever, and they guarantee it therefore given;" he concluded then his able report, with the following impressive language: "I will add, that the end proposed, is the happiness of the Indians—the instrument of its accomplishment—thence progressive, and finally their complete civilization. The obstacles to success, are their ignorance, their prejudices, their repugnance to labor, their want of industry, and the uncertainty of the future. I would endeavor to overcome these by schools, by a distribution of land in individual right, by a permanent establishment, which should require the performance of social duties, by assigning them a country of which they are never to be deprived, and cherishing them with parental kindness. In looking to the possible results of this plan, I am cheered with the hope, that most good may be effected with comparatively little injury. Our difficulties in their present form will be diminished or removed."

Though the policy adopted toward the Indians originated with President Monroe, it was continued by President John Quincy Adams. Adams, was approved by his successor, Mr. Adams, and as vigorously defended by his ex-ministers, Messrs. Barlow and Pater, yet when President Jackson signified his approbation of this generous work, and really effected nothing more than the relaxation of what he conceived had been already begun and put in progress by his predecessors, then indeed, it was an act of barbarism. It was only the most unbecoming and unbecomingly all too human and divine. And persons lost to the obligations to obey the laws of their country have been found to finally deluded, as to believe they had the right to oppose all exactions employed by the government to effect this highly useful and favorite purpose. When all the circumstances attending this transaction are fully and fairly considered, it presents a subject to say the least of it, the most astonishing weakness. Let it be remembered, that the most important and fundamental of all the exonerations of the ex-Indians and the ex-creators of war, had so far acquired the confidence of the people of the Union as to have produced in its favor a public act of Congress. That in obedience to this act, a letter home had been addressed to the Indians as well as full compensation for that which they should have, as reported in the foregoing chapter, been supplied with many articles not only of cost, but of property highly useful to them in the conduct of their future life. And one year's promise made them, arising as their new honors, and then forever threatened to receive the constant protection of the general government. This in fact, they had assumed from the government, upon which they could rely, of a permanent settlement, such as so future exactions could disturb, for removed from all causes which could possibly thwart its realizing operation; and in the event of their removal, out of the country, the ex-Indians believed that the government signally contradicted the effect of missionary labors. Apart from the striking advantage to them, we have seen in the views of the great statesmen already mentioned, that much was expected to the interest of the government in its relation of peace, commerce, union, and above all, in the discharge of a long deferred compact with the state of Georgia, which has been so superstitiously, as to produce a spirit of discontent, and a spirit of opposition to the state, and the state in the fidelity of the general government, but greatly to disquiet the repose of the Indians themselves. Are not these considerations enough to have induced a doubtful and orderly citizen, if not disposed to and in such a benevolent object, at least to have restrained his opposition? But it seems they were not; a spirit of resistance and disobedience has been infused into the Indians by the white men at the nation; they have had political and religious teachers, who have been so far from being the missionaries themselves have had a public meeting, and resolved that they viewed a removal of the Indians over the "discovery" of an ancient to be most earnestly deprecated. The resentment of the Indians have been excited to the highest pitch by public and private harangues against the laws of the state, and against the present and past administration of the state government, not only in character belonging to both governments have been insulted and calumniated in their councils as by their priests, and when an attempt has been made by Georgia to remove this influence from among them, it has been met by the most decided and prompt opposition. The state has been defiled, and a territory over which she has the exclusive jurisdiction has been openly declared by these white men to belong to the United States, and that the state government is a usurper, not only independent of Georgia, but of the U. States. Yet, through this malicious influence, a constitution and government has been formed, and lest we might not be sufficiently notified of its existence by the usual method of manifestos, they have dragged our citizens, before their tribunals, and inflicted disgraceful and cruel punishments, unknown to our laws. Such have been the refractory and high handed usurpations of the state government, that it is at length compelled, in measure of self-defense, to take the rule of a country to which, by the annual as well as public documents of the government, she has the most undoubted right.

I am willing to make all due allowance for the diversity of human opinion, in matters of government, as well as in religion; but I cannot see how any individual, what shall be the consequence if he is not indulged, was allowed to judge for himself, whether he would obey the laws or not, especially after they had been pronounced by the only competent tribunal to be constitutional? If these individuals have the right to do it, all the rest in the community have; and what I repeat, would be the consequence? Anarchy and confusion, and then what becomes of the examples of "holy writ"? Wherein are we required to "submit ourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king, as supreme, or unto governors, as unto him that is sent by him for the punishment thereof, and for the praise of the Lord?" And why? "For, that with well doing, ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men—as free and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God." P. 1. ch. 13, 14, 16.

One of these individuals replied to the governor, that "if I suffer in consequence of continuing to preach the gospel, and suffer in consequence of continuing to obey the word of God, for it may be truly said that 'word,' especially when it enjoins upon the citizen, 'to keep the king's [state's] commandment, and that in regard to the oath of God, be not hasty to go out of his sight, stand not in an evil thing, for he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him. Whence the word of a king is, there is power; and who may say unto him, thou art doing wrong?'" fuse the word of God amongst this people, I trust I shall be sustained by a conscience void of offence." Now in this speech there is all manner of unkindness, and the meanness that directs "to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's" would have required a more ingenious answer, if not for preaching the gospel, that the governor wished him either to remove or "suffer." As the executive power of the state, solemnly sworn to execute the laws, he only informed the individual that there was a law which required all white men, without distinction—for laws to be just must be equal—residing in the nation, to take an oath to support the constitution of the state, or to leave the territory; and he was doubtless very hopeful that this person's actual reading, as well as his love of the gospel, would have reminded him that "every soul must be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resisteth shall receive to themselves damnation. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Will it then not be afraid of the power?" Rom. xiii. 1, 2, 3. The governor seems to have suspected that there were some of the good citizens of Georgia who felt themselves "under no moral obligation" to respect the "enactments" of the state, by reason of their apprehending that she had "no rightful jurisdiction over the Indian territory"—he therefore warned them that as the executioner of the law, "he beareth not the sword in vain," and would consequently be compelled as "a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." (Wheeler's letter.) ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake." There is in every part of the moral and pious community of the United States, but especially at the north, an unusual anxiety to colonize another description of people in this country, whose condition is better than that of the Indians; and yet, strange to tell, the same object attempted for this declining race, by some of the wisest and best of our countrymen, backed by the patronage of the whole government, under much more favorable auspices, meets with the persevering opposition of this same community. This is either strange inconsistency, or the colonizing of Africans speaks one thing, while it means another.

To my mind, and I would fain believe to every dispassionate man, there is no good reason for putting upon the severe penalty of this law, and foolishly defying its execution, which cannot be excused upon any principle of sound religion or a rational and discreet desire to serve the cause of piety, for surely that religion which requires us to "render tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor," never could demand such resistance to the laws of the land, as would involve in delinquent a forfeiture of all the enjoyments of liberty, and impose in their stead all the hardships of an ignominious slavery. I do exceedingly regret that the warning voice of this court, at its last session, of the governor, of the law, and I would add with great reverence, of God himself, had not induced these individuals to pause before they plunged themselves into such a reckless calamity. Both governments have been deeply engaged in the work of removing the Indians, for causes they need never be ashamed of avowing, and before God and man, if they are sincere in the motives which impel them to this undertaking, they are rendering the only atonement in their power for the long suffering of a much injured people, and such, in my humble opinion, as high Heaven itself will own and bless. To prevent then the accomplishment of a work so deplorable, is not only presumption, of the highest character, against the sacred will planned by, but is cruelty to the Indians, ingratitude to the country, and what is worse than all, seems when persisted in, to involve a consequence with which no prudent man should dare to trifle.

The eleven persons against whom sentence was pronounced, were brought to this place by the sheriff of Gwinnett county, on Thursday last. Nine of them were pardoned, after giving assurances that they would not again violate the laws. But two of the missionaries, Messrs. Worcester and Butler, declining to give any such assurance, and appeared not disposed to profit by the executive clemency, which would have been extended to them, in common with the others, if they had given such assurances, were committed to the penitentiary. Subjoined is the governor's letter to the inspectors of the penitentiary and their answer.

Executive office, 22nd Sept. 1831.

Gentlemen—I understand that a number of persons have been lately convicted in Gwinnett county, for illegal residence in the territory occupied by the Cherokees within the state, and will very soon be placed within the penitentiary, unless they should be considered proper subjects for the exercise of the executive clemency. As it is possible that some of these persons may have committed the offence of which they have been convicted, under mistaken opinions of their own duty, or of the powers of the government, I am desirous of pardoning such of them as may have thus acted, and will now give assurances, that they will not again violate the laws of the state; if they should be found worthy of such clemency.

You are requested to see each of the prisoners, and converse with them alone, and ascertain from them whether they are disposed to promise not again to offend the laws if they should be pardoned. You are also desired to ascertain as accurately as you can, what has been the general character of each of the convicts, and the motives which have influenced them in their opposition to the authority of the state.

The result of your enquiries and conversation, you will oblige me by communicating as early as convenient. Very respectfully, yours, &c. GEORGE R. GILMER.

Messrs. James Camak, Benj. A. White, Tomlinson Fort, inspectors of the penitentiary.

Penitentiary, 22nd September, 1831.

Sir—In compliance with your request of this date, we met at the penitentiary, and investigated the cases of each of the individuals brought from Gwinnett, separately. Enclosed, we send statements of James J. Trotter—Samuel Mays (No. 1), Edward Doolier (No. 2), Sully Eaton (No. 3), Thomas Gann (No. 4), A. Copeland (No. 5). You will find also, a written petition in favor of S. Mays, enclosed in No. 1.

We have personally examined Benjamin F. Thompson, James A. Thompson, and John F. Wheeler. The above persons all request your clemency, on condition that they will not again violate the laws. They are all recommended by Mr. Trotter and Mr. Butler, to be respectable, honest citizens.

With regard to Mr. Butler, he authorizes us to state, that he could not take the oath of allegiance to the state, without perjuring himself, as he views the case—he cannot consent to a change of residence with his present feelings.

Mr. Worcester states, that he has taken the course he has pursued, from a firm conviction of duty—he had been disposed to submit, but would not have proceeded so far—he has applied to the supreme court, and expects to hear from his application.

Mr. Wheeler states that his family is within the chartered limits, and that he intends to return there, but will not subject himself to another arrest. Respectfully, your obedient servants,

BENJ. A. WHITE,
JAMES A. WAK,
TOMLINSON FORT. } Inspectors.

The convicts. The rev. Mr. Potter, a missionary to the Cherokees, who recently passed through this city, informs us that he saw Messrs. Worcester and Butler, a few days ago in the penitentiary at Milledgeville. He says they are cheerful and happy. This we expected. We have often read of others devoted to the same path, inspired by the same feelings, singing and rejoicing amidst the flames that devoured them. We are glad, however, to learn, that they are treated with even the respect due to citizens and clergymen. They were equipped in the coarse uniform of the prison, with the usual badges of criminals attached. One of them is employed in making bedstraws, and the other in turning a large wheel-grinding, like Samson, in his prison house.

Putting them to the hardest labor in the prison, accords with the instructions of gov. Gilmer, to inflict upon them the penalty of the law in its utmost severity. But it should be remembered that these subjects of Egyptian oppression have been mostly accustomed to sedentary pursuits. Their minds, it is true, are trained to severe labor and strenuous exertion; but their bodies, and even the health of one of them, are at that very moment comparatively delicate and feeble. To the harshness of their treatment, under such circumstances, must be added the violent deprivation of their liberty; their confinement within the narrow limits, and foul, gloomy precincts of a prison; their being associated with thieves, robbers and murderers; and the wicked attempt to brand their memories forever with the name and infamy of criminal convicts. On this latter point, however, Georgia is mistaken. She has got in her own hands, to the hot end of the branding iron, and her mad cupid is inflicting on herself a mark of disgrace which will dishonor her name till the sun's self shall be blotted from the heavens. Already is public indignation stamping its ban upon her conduct; we had almost said, upon her forehead. [Washington Spectator.]

CENSUS OF 1830.

From the New York Observer.

Washington, Sep. 16, 1831. Editor—I have obtained from one of the principal clerks of the state department, a friend of mine, the following condensed account of the census, which, he says, in this complete form has not been published. The whole will not be finished till submitted to the next congress.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 10—Vol. V.

BALTIMORE, NOV. 5, 1831.

[Vol. XLI. Whole No. 1,050]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

The convention adjourned sine die at 2 o'clock, P. M. on Tuesday last—but various circumstances will prevent my return home until after you will have been compelled to put this week's number of the REGISTER to press. The occupation of my time has been so close, that I have not had power to present even a slight sketch of our proceedings for the information of my readers. It may be generally observed, that about four hundred and fifty persons never before, perhaps, assembled in a more united and better spirit to support a cause of vital interest, (as we believe that it is), to all the American people,—or separated, after a week's severe attention to business, with greater satisfaction to themselves—instantly pleased with one another. The moral effect of such an extensive association of intellect and respectability must needs be powerful.

The facts that will be presented to the public, in consequence of this convention, cannot fail to astonish those who have made the highest calculations on the progress and extent of the American System. Sanguine as I have long been, and sanguine as many have thought me,—my expectations were far short of the realities about to be distinctly made known, through the permanent committee, founded on the reports of the very important and numerous committees of the convention, and other sources of authentic information,—for means have been, or will be, adopted, to collect a body of statistical facts immensely important to the people, and absolutely necessary to a discreet national legislation.

The address to the people of the United States was presented on Monday, by Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, and the reading of it by him occupied nearly two hours. The hall was filled to overflowing—and yet the most profound attention was given during that long period, except when the reader was interrupted by the spontaneous cheers of the audience. Twenty thousand copies of this address were ordered to be printed at Baltimore, under the supervision of Mr. Kennedy.

This splendid and masterly production, I understand to be the joint work of Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Kennedy, of Maryland, and Mr. Dutton of Massachusetts; and many good judges regard it as the ablest paper ever presented on a like occasion. Without any direct reference to the address of the "Free Trade Convention," it tears its arguments into tatters, and scatters them to the winds of the heavens; and, while it is generally beautiful, and often sublime, there is a plain practicality about it that will carry its matter to the home and heart of every friend of the free industry of the American nation; and I must think will bring many to a pause whose opinions seem to have been exclusively regulated by mistaken notions concerning slave labor. Some of these will believe that the "American System" as fully embraces their interest as that of any other class of persons in this community. As the address originated at New York, it is ordered that it shall be first published in that city, though to be printed in Baltimore. It will probably be laid before the public about the middle of next week.

I have not an opportunity to say much more. As the time of adjournment approached, the feelings of the members of the convention seemed to be greatly excited—and many new friendships formed, were promised a lasting duration. No small degree of gravity prevailed—but it was generous and kind, built upon the universal belief that a great public good would result from the proceedings just about to be concluded. Then came the brief, but appropriate and excellent address of the president, to whom the thanks of the convention had been voted, and we were dismissed with a most feeling and eloquent appeal to the AUTHOR OF ALL GOOD by the rev. Mr. Schroeder, formerly of Baltimore, all which will appear in the journals.

VOL. XLI.—No. 13.

But I must stop. Particulars shall be given hereafter. I wish you to publish the list of the members according to the copy sent herewith. Though much care has been exerted to render it entirely correct, I fear that it is not so; but errors in the list, or otherwise, will, I hope, be excused by my indulgent friends—because of the peculiar and anxious and busy situation in which I have been placed, and from which I am not even yet relieved.

Philadelphia, Nov. 3, 1831.

MR. CALBURN. In accordance with the plan of publishing both sides of a question, we give place to the reply of this gentleman, to that part of major Eaton's appeal which related to him, and in order that a full view of the ground may be presented, we have appended the note of Mr. Evans, the brother-in-law of the latter gentleman.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. In another part of this week's impression the reports of the president and chief engineer of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company will be found.

Too much praise cannot be awarded to the president, directors and officers of the company for the intelligence and zeal with which they have prosecuted their arduous labors.

The subjoined paragraph, will shew the advance made in the completion of the road, since the date of these reports.

"We have the sincere satisfaction to state that the assurances given in the late annual report of the president and directors to the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, that the second and third divisions of the road would be opened for use by the first of November, have been realised.

"In a letter which we have seen from a gentleman who performed the trip, dated the 30th instant, he says the "Pioneer car" passed yesterday (Saturday) morning on the line as far as to the foot of the inclined plane, No. 1, at Parr Ridge, being a distance of forty miles from Baltimore.

"The fourth division of the road, which extends to the Monocacy, as well as the inclined planes over the Parr ridge, and the lateral road to Frederick, are in such a state of forwardness as to leave no doubt that the entire route to Frederick will be opened within the month of November.

"The graduation of the fifth division, extending from the Monocacy river to the Potomac, is nearly completed, except at a single point of about 2 or 300 yards, which will soon be graduated, and the travelling on the road will, without any doubt, be established to the Potomac river within a few weeks." FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York and Philadelphia, bring Dundee advices to the 24th September.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

As we had been reluctantly induced to believe, by the former advices, Warsaw, the capital of Poland has fallen. It capitulated on the 7th September, at 6 o'clock, P. M. after a most sanguinary conflict of two days duration, during which the Russians carried, by assault, all the entrenchments designed to protect the city. The Polish army followed by the diet and the members of the government, retired through Praga on the night of the 7th, and early on the ensuing day the Russian army entered, maintaining perfect order, and respecting both person and property. The Poles were retiring upon Modlin and Plock, where it is said they will make an effort to maintain themselves. How far they will be able to realise such expectation, remains for time to unveil; but the hope of successful resistance, after such a blow as the fall of their capital, will prove illusory—it is a most fearful blow, and we fear will prove fatal to their cause.

On the 5th of September, the Russian commander in chief, Paskewitch, sent a confidential officer to Warsaw, to demand the submission of the city and consequent surrender, promising, in the name of his majesty, amnesty and pardon. This proposition was indignantly rejected by the brave Poles, and on the 6th, at day break, the Russians marched to the assault, made themselves masters of four redoubts which lay upon the line of attack, as well as the first line of entrenchments which surround Warsaw, and of which Wola is a perfect fortress. The task did not however end with the carrying of these; there remained a second line of entrenchments, and a broad moat around the city defended by bastions. On the 24th day of the assault, count Paskewitch received a concussion from a cannon ball, which struck his left arm in the first quarter of an hour of the combat, he retired from the field of battle, leaving the command to general Toll. After the entrenchments and outworks were carried by the Russians, the Poles retired into the city, whereupon the former occupied the ramparts and erected batteries for 80 pieces of cannon to operate against Warsaw, should it still hold out.

In the course of the night general Kruchowiecki sent a flag of truce, informing the Russian commander in chief that the diet had dissolved itself, and that he as dictator, governed alone. At day break orders were issued to the Russian army to cease hostilities, as the capital and country had submitted to the emperor. The Russian account states that the dictator caused a report of the Polish army to be delivered to the field marshal, and that the intention of their marching on Plozsk, is, to await the pleasure of the emperor. The loss of the Russians is supposed to be between four and five thousand.

The sensation produced in London by the receipt of this unwelcome news, was great, and heavy censures were cast on the government, for gaily witnessing the sacrifice of this brave and generous people; but in Paris it had produced a state of intense feeling, amounting to phrenzy—a phrenzy said to be equal to that excited by the publication of the Polignac ordinances.—The Parisians view it as a national calamity—as a national disgrace of which each individual must bear his share. The majority of the shops were shut—public business in some degree suspended, the ministers insulted, laughed at, threatened, and laughed in effigy—crowds thronged the streets with crape hat and arm bands; some pillaging gun makers' shops, others busy in listening to the ardent appeals of the newspapers—the theatres were closed—the black flag hoisted in some of the streets—the drum beating hourly to arms—the Marseillaise is publicly sung in the palais royal—the troops of the line are in motion—and to sum up all—the ministry had been twice defeated on points which it had strongly at heart. M. Casimir Prier, and Sebastiani had had a narrow escape for their lives.

FRANCE.

The peerage bill was progressing slowly. France has threatened Spain, in case that government interlopes in the approaching contest between Don Miguel and Don Pedro, that a French army will cross the Pyrenees. The French army was still in Belgium, its withdrawal is, however, stated as fixed upon.

ENGLAND.

The passage of the reform bill was considered certain in both houses of parliament. The death of the mother of Lord Wellington is announced in the London papers. The secretary for foreign affairs had held a council with the ministers of France, Russia and Prussia. Washington Irvine, our charge d'affaires had presented Mr. Van Buren to viscount Palmerston. A part of the jewels of the princess of Orange, had been seized by the police of Liverpool—they were found in possession of the man and woman who left New York some weeks since, on the arrest of Carrara. The lot seized is supposed to be worth £20,000. The parties are to be sent to Brussels for trial.

BELGIUM.

The kings of Belgium and Holland have agreed upon a cessation of hostilities for six weeks. In the mean time, the former is organizing an army of 75,000 men and a park of artillery of 100 pieces, so as to be able to resist another invasion should the king of Holland attempt it.

TURKEY.

An attempt had been discovered, it is said, by the French government to induce the Porte to declare war against Russia—the plan failed owing to the interference of sir Robert Gordon.

MADEIRA.

A revolt had taken place in the island of Madeira, in favor of Donna Maria—it had, however, been quelled. The governor of Madeira had imprisoned the consul of England, for having circulated the news which gave rise to the insurrection. He was imprisoned in his own house, which was surrounded by a strong guard of soldiers, who deny all ingress and egress. The consul is to remain in custody until orders are received from Lisbon.

MR. CALHOUN'S REPLY TO MAJOR EATON.

From the Pendleton Messenger.

Major Eaton has, in his late address gratuitously dragged my name into his controversy with a part of his associates in the late administration. The station which he recently occupied, and the relation in which he is well known to stand to the head of the executive branch of the government, are calculated to give more weight to his representations, at least with many, than what belongs to the anonymous communications of the day; yet I would not have deemed his statement worthy of my notice, had he confined himself to the vague insinuations, which constitute the great body of his address, as far as it relates to me. To give color to his general charges, he has resorted, in a few instances, to descent into detail, and to give statements of facts, but in a manner wholly erroneous; which, however, might be received by the public as true, were I to remain silent. They have, in fact, been already so received in some respectable quarters. I am thus compelled, in self defence, to correct the errors of his statements as far as they concern me. The occurrences which are the subject of his address, are of a character to render me solicitous, that the part I took in relation to them, should be presented in the light which truth and justice require. The memory of them will probably outlive the present day; and a decent regard for the opinions of those who are to succeed us, naturally makes me desirous that I should not seem to have any other connection with events, little calculated to do credit to the history of the day, than what I in reality had.

It is impossible to doubt that the main drift of major Eaton's address is to hold me up as the real author of all the discord which is alleged to have prevailed in the late cabinet, and to which he endeavors to trace its dissolution, and which, he would have the public believe, originated in a loss and misdirection of my agency, on my part, in relation to the succession to the presidential chair.

With this view, and in order to give a political aspect to the refusal of Mrs. Calhoun to visit Mrs. Eaton, he states that she and myself called in the first instance on him and Mrs. Eaton, during their absence at Philadelphia; intending it to be inferred, that his declining intercourse afterwards, we were actuated by political motives, and not by considerations connected with duty. Unhappily for major Eaton, his statement is not correct. Mrs. Calhoun never called on Mrs. Eaton at the time he states, nor at any other time before, or since, nor did she ever leave her card for her, nor authorize any one to do so; and she is entirely ignorant through what channel, or by what agency, her card could come into his and Mrs. E.'s possession; to which I add, that it was not done through my agency, or with my consent or knowledge. If major Eaton had reflected, he would have seen that there must have been, to say the least, an imposition somewhere. He states, that our visit took place while they were in Philadelphia, and, of course, preceded their call, which, as he represents, took place after their return, and which, he must know, according to the usage that governs intercourse at the place, could not occur. The senators and their families invariably make the first call on the vice president and his family; and in conformity with this rule, major Eaton had called on me, on my arrival at Washington, before his marriage, which I afterwards returned; and, not finding him at home, left my card. This was, probably, while he was absent at Philadelphia, and was the only intercourse I had with him, as far as I can recollect, during the whole session, except what took place in the senate chamber, or when we casually met at parties.

This is not the first time, that Mrs. Calhoun has contradicted the statement that she had visited Mrs. Eaton. It was reported at the time, that she had visited Mrs. Eaton, and that her card had been left. She then, on all suitable occasions, contradicted it, as directly and pointedly as she now does, and in particular to two respectable ladies from Tennessee (sisters of members), who then resided in an adjoining boarding house.

The erroneous statement of major E. compels me to give a correct version of what actually occurred; but which I never intended to intrude on the public, and now state, with great reluctance, even in self defence. When he and Mrs. Eaton made their visit, I was not at home, as he states, and did not return till after they had retired. When I returned, Mrs. Calhoun mentioned they had been there, and said she would not have known who Mrs. Eaton was, had she not been with Mr. Eaton, as the servant had not announced their names. She of course treated them with civility. She could not with propriety, do otherwise. The relation which Mrs. Eaton bore to the society of Washington, became the subject of some general remarks. The next morning she informed me, that she had made up her mind to return her visit. She said that she could not do so in the light of a stranger in the place; that she knew nothing of Mrs. Eaton, or the truth, or falsehood of the imputation on her character; and that she conceived it to be the duty of Mrs. Eaton, if innocent, to open her intercourse with the ladies who resided in the place, and also had the best means of forming a correct opinion of her character, and not with those who, like herself, had no means of forming a correct judgment. I argued, that I approved of her decision, though I saw the difficulties in which it would probably involve me; but that I viewed the question involved, as paramount to all political considerations, and was prepared to meet the consequences, as to myself, be they what they might.

So far from political considerations having any influence in the course adopted, could they have been permitted to have any weight in the question, the very reverse course would have been pursued. The road to favor and patronage lay directly before me, could I have been less enough to tread it. The intimate relation between general Jackson and major Eaton was well known, as well as the interest that the former took in Mrs. Eaton's case; but, as dignified as I would have felt myself, had I sought patronage in that direction, I could not have engaged in it. I had already adopted the course we did from any other motive, than a high and a sacred regard to duty. It was not in fact, a question of the exclusion of one already admitted into society, but the admission of one already excluded. Before the warlike, while she was Mrs. Timberlake, she had not been admitted into the society of Washington; and the real question was, whether her marriage with general Eaton, should give her already excluded on that; or, in other words, whether official rank and patronage should, or should not, prove paramount to that exclusion, which the sex exerts over itself; and on which, all must acknowledge, the purity and dignity of the female character mainly depend. Had the case been different had a scheme been formed to exclude Mrs. Eaton with political views, and to be maintained, the fully could have been repelled only by its profligacy. Happily for our country, this important citizenship is too high and too pure to be influenced by any political considerations whatever. It is equally beyond the scope of power, or influence, to exclude the virtuous and unsuspected female from society, as experience has found it to raise the suspected to that station. This point may now be considered settled, and it is for the public should pay the most grateful attention to that has been achieved, in favor of the morals of the country, by the high moral independence and virtue of the ladies of Washington, to be out by personal and false representation of the real question at issue.

With the same view, and not much less erroneously, major Eaton has given a statement of my application to him in favor of a friend in the place of chief clerk of the department. He has so drawn up my statement, as to make an impression, that I suspended all official intercourse with him, because he refused to comply with my application. The latter is altogether false. It is true, that at the request of my friend, who was also a warm and devoted friend of general Jackson, and had suffered from his attachment to me, I did present his name to major Eaton; and that I had no intention to interfere with him in that respect, but a very different reason from that he alleges for a reason which every individual, who has even a moderate share of self-respect, must deem amply sufficient, as a brief statement of the facts will prove. The application was made, not at the early period he states; (which was necessary to make the impression he intends), when it was known he was to be appointed secretary of war, but after he was appointed, and took possession of his office; and it is material, long after Mrs. Calhoun had declined to return Mrs. Eaton's visit. I called at his office a day or two before I left the city; I informed him that I called at the request of my friend, simply to state my impression of his qualification and not to urge his claim. After I had stated my impression in my friend's favor, he told me he was well satisfied with his qualifications; but that he had offered the place to another gentleman, whom he named, but informing me, at the same time, that if he should decline, my friend would receive the appointment. I remarked, that the person to whom he had offered the place was perfectly qualified, and that I could not say a word to weaken his claim. Besides his qualifications, his relation with me was at least as intimate and friendly, as his whose name I had presented; and as between them it could not possibly be a serious question, that the former was selected; which, all would admit, will admit, when I say the gentleman selected was col. Gadsden. The next day I received a letter from gov. Hamilton, then a member of congress, to whom maj. Eaton alludes as my friend, stating that he had made application to maj. Eaton in favor of the person for whom I had applied, with the favorable result of his application. On the strength of this, as well as his promise to me, I wrote to my friend, requesting gov. Hamilton's letter, and informed him he might call on the appointment with confidence: as I felt almost certain that col. Gadsden would decline the office. He did decline; but, contrary to promise, another person was appointed, without giving me any explanation, then, or since. It was this breach of promise, remaining still unexplained, which intervened a barrier on my part to further official intercourse between us; and not as major Eaton represents, the mere refusal to grant the appointment, which I could never have had the least effect with me. If there should be any doubt as to the promise, or the time of the application, the letter of governor Hamilton to me, and mine to my friend, both of which I suppose to be in existence, will establish the correctness of my statement.

But it seems that I am to be held responsible for the supposed friends of the late cabinet and its dissolution, because, as maj. Eaton states, an ardent friend of the vice president said in 1829, that maj. Eaton is not the friend of Mr. Calhoun. It would have been much more satisfactory, if maj. Eaton had given the name of this supposed friend, with the time, place, and circumstances, not only to enable him to give his statement of the occurrence, but to afford me an opportunity of judging how far I ought to be responsible. It would have been both to him and me an act of simple justice, which, as far as I am concerned, would have been particularly desirable, as I must object to the competency of that person as an accuser, if he is not, in fact, one of those who are not my friends. They appear particularly liable to error on this point. But a short time since it was gravely charged, in an almost official quarter, that my friend had a meeting to expel him from the cabinet, when it turned out, on further disclosures, that they were all gentlemen from the western states, (I name, Kentucky, and Louisiana, and devoted friends to gen. Jackson, actuated solely by a regard for the interests and honor of his administration, a step, of the existence of which I was ignorant till after the meeting, and of the particulars, till disclosed by the recent publications. If to this I add maj. Eaton's own liability to fall into error in determining who are, or are not, my political friends, as disclosed in his late address, it will not, I am sure, be thought unreasonable, that I should object to his competency to make any statement, if it is necessary to hold me responsible for scenes, the odium of which he shows uncommon anxiety to shift to the shoulders of others, he errs, on that point, in relation to two of his late associates in the administration. If, in his anxiety to implicate me, he mistakes the political relations between Mr. Branch and Mr. Brien, and myself, gentlemen of whose sentiments one would suppose he could not be ignorant, I may reasonably suppose that he is equally mistaken in the case under consideration.

The inference he would draw from gen. Green's course, in relation to myself, can scarcely deserve more than a passing notice. Gen. Green's course has been of his own choosing, without any attempt on my part to influence him. Such an attempt would, indeed, if it was to be permitted, be equally as much to be held up and by base and selfish views, how could I influence him? I had nothing to give, where he had much to lose. On the contrary supposition, that he was governed by a sense of truth and justice, an attempt to influence him was unnecessary. My course, I trust afforded ample motives of that description. If it could, it would have been in vain in me, on the supposition of his loyalty, to have attempted to obtain his support; as it clearly would have been, on the opposite, to have obtained it at all. As I have been compelled to speak of gen. Green, it is due, in justice to him to say, that I believe gen. Jackson had no friend more zealous and honest in his cause. When very may be his personal feelings, I know from his own declarations, that he was very and deeply enlisted in favor of his reelection. His own exertions to influence him in that direction, as I believe late views of public policy shows, he has never changed his opinion, many causes may be found, in what has since transpired, without attributing it to any imaginary influence over him, on my part, when it must be apparent to all, with the whole power and patronage of the government against me, I had nothing through which to exercise it.

Having corrected the errors of major Eaton's statements and in relation to myself, he has drawn out into particular, a body of reasons, which he has endeavored to present, as a basis, remains to reply his general charges and insinuations, which I did by a direct and positive contradiction. It is not true, that I attempted to exercise any control in the formation of the late cabinet, or to influence its patronage, or that I made any attempt to embarrass the administration in the senate, or elsewhere, or am any way responsible for the dissolution of the late cabinet; unless, indeed, the refusal of Mr. Calhoun to visit Mrs. Eaton on grounds exclusively connected with the dignity and purity of her sex, or the vindication of my character against an unprovoked and unfounded attack, should be considered sufficient to render me responsible. These are my only offences. In truth, the reverse of all of these general charges and insinuations is true. Gen. Jackson never consulted me, as to the formation of his cabinet. He never consulted me, as to the formation of his administration, or as to the policy which he has since pursued. As he did not consult me, I had too much self-respect and regard for the dignity of the office I held, to intrude my advice; while the disinclination of my particular friends freed me from all solicitude on the score of patronage. As a body, they met; they sought no reward office. The most prominent of them, and who had taken the most decided and efficient part in favor of general Jackson's election, had openly avowed their determination not to take office. In supporting him, they were actuated by far different, and much more elevated motives, than the low and sordid ambition that looks to power and patronage. Their object was to maintain principles which they believed to be essential to the liberty and happiness of the country, to restore the administration of the general government to the true principles of the constitution, and to arrest that course of events which was rapidly bringing the great lot rest of the country into the most dangerous a whirl; and so much higher did they hold these considerations, than the elevation of any man to power, that, as is well known, pending the election, whilst zealously supporting general Jackson, they refused to advance his interests by the least abatement of their principles. Nor is the charge of embarrassing the administration less remote from truth. I was most anxious for the success of general Jackson's administration; and though I saw much I could not approve, yet I continued to give him my support, whatever I possibly could, consistently with duty,

That such was my course, I appeal with confidence to all who were intimate with me, to the members of the body over which I preside, and especially to the two senators from Tennessee, both devoted friends of general Jackson, both men of great sagacity, and both having ample opportunities of forming a correct opinion of my course. In fact, every consideration, public and private, of honor, duty, and interest, led me to desire the success of general Jackson's administration. I had contributed all in my power to the success of his election, and felt, to the full, the obligation which it imposed.

It is with pain that I have forced myself to touch on the prominent subject of this communication. The question involved in Mrs. Eaton's relation to the society of Washington belonged, I conceived, exclusively to her sex, and could not be involved in political considerations, or drawn into public discussion, without painful consequences. I acted on these views in my correspondence with gen. Jackson. I could not be ignorant of the use made of it by those, who, by their artful machinations, have placed gen. Jackson and myself in our present relation; but the desire to do nothing on my part that could tend to draw the question from the tribunal to which it properly and exclusively belonged, restrained me from making the least allusion to it in the correspondence, though calculated to throw light on the controversy between us and to strengthen me in the conflict.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Letter from the rev. F. S. Evans.

Mr. Blair:

Sir:—As it is fully in my power to substantiate the statement of Mr. Eaton, relative to Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun's calling upon Mr. and Mrs. Eaton, I herewith furnish you with the facts as they occurred. Mr. Eaton was married on Thursday the 1st of January. On Monday the 5th, Mr. Calhoun's carriage drove up to the door of Mr. O'Neal, and enquiry was made for Mr. and Mrs. Eaton, on being told that they had gone to Philadelphia, Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun's cards were handed to the servant, who brought them in and gave them to my wife. Those with many others left during their absence, were handed to Mr. and Mrs. Eaton on their return.

October 29, 1831.

TARIFF CONVENTION.

The delegates from the various states to attend the convention of agriculturists, mechanics, manufacturers and others favorable to the protection of the national industry, assembled in the city of New York on Wednesday morning the 26th of October, 1831, at 10 o'clock.

On motion of col. Murray, of New York, gen. Talmadge was called to the chair, and Mr. Niles, of Baltimore, on like motion, chosen secretary.

The convention being thus temporarily organized, Mr. Shaw of Massachusetts then moved, that the chair nominate a committee of three from each state represented in this convention, to report the mode and manner of conducting the business of the convention.

At the request of the chair, the delegates from the several states presented the names of such persons in their respective delegations, as they would recommend to compose said committee.

The chair then announced that thirteen states were represented; and subsequently added that a delegate was also in attendance from the District of Columbia.

The following persons were nominated for said committee.

From Maine—Jos. Wingate, Isaac Halsey, Jos. Chaf. New Hampshire—Samuel Grant, John Williams, John B. Wheeler.

Vermont—Heman Allen, Martin Chittenden, Charles Paine.

Connecticut—Calvin Goddard, S. B. Sherwood, Samuel D. Hubbard.

Rhode Island—Chas. Eldridge, Nathan F. Dixon, Z. Allen.

Massachusetts—Robert G. Shaw, Samuel Hoar, A. H. Everett.

New York—P. H. Schenck, Jesse Buel, G. Tibbetts.

New Jersey—J. Hornblower, John N. Simpson, S. Swain.

Delaware—E. J. Dupont, John Gordon, P. Ringgold.

Maryland—Thomas Ellicott, Hez. Niles, John Bryan.

Pennsylvania—B. W. Richards, Walter Forman, J. Roberts.

Ohio—George Endley, Holland Greene.

District of Columbia—Peter Force.

Virginia—William Lambdin John McLure.

The committee retired, and the clerk proceeded with the call of the members, which was continued until the return of the said committee. Whereupon the call was suspended, and

On motion of Mr. Dwight, the nomination of the committee was unanimously approved.

Mr. Dwight moved that the committee of three from each state be authorised, in addition to other duties, to nominate candidates to fill the several offices of the convention—carried.

The chair announced, that a list of the delegates from New Hampshire, with their places of residence, had been presented to him, and the other states were requested to hand in theirs in like manner.

Mr. Carey, of Pennsylvania, moved that the secretary have printed for the use of the members, a list of the delegates with their places of residence; and that such list, as members arrive, be enlarged from time to time.

The secretary, then proceeded to call off the names of the members appointed, in order that those in attendance might answer, stating their place of residence.

At 1 o'clock the calling of the delegates was suspended for the purpose of hearing the report of the committee of organization: Whereupon, the chairman reported that the committee recommended the appointment of a president, four vice presidents and four secretaries, and that the following persons be nominated.

WILLIAM WILKINS, of Penn. president.

JOSEPH KENT, Maryland,

JAMES TALLEMADGE, New York, } vice-presi-

LEWIS CONDUCT, New Jersey,

HENRIAN NILES, Maryland,

ROBERT TILLOTSON, N. York,

JOSHUA W. PEIRCE, N. Hampshire, } secre-

CHARLES PAINE, Vermont. } taries.

All of whom were unanimously agreed upon.

On the election of the president, the chair nominated Jonathan Roberts of Pennsylvania, and Benjamin W. Crowninshield, of Massachusetts to conduct the president to the chair; who made a very short but appropriate address to the convention.

On motion of Mr. Crowninshield, of Massachusetts, it was directed that until otherwise ordered, the convention meet at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. Austin, of Massachusetts, said he was about to submit to the consideration of the convention, a resolution, previous to which he would make some general remarks on the subject. Mr. Austin proceeded to make a strong and powerful appeal to the assembled delegates. He said that the American System was national in its character—that this body had met to congratulate each other on the present prosperous and successful situation of our country, growing out of that system, and not to groan or repine over misfortunes and disappointments which it had tended to produce. That the free trade party had said all that could be said in favor of their own system; and that if it exhibited imbecility it was owing to an innate weakness, and not to the want of talent in defence. That free trade never did, nor never could exist. It was like freedom from public war—freedom from ill, &c. all desirable objects; but never to be obtained until the accomplishment of the millennium. That measures for the protection of our manufacturing establishments was as necessary now, as they were to our commerce. But, said he, we are told that this protection is unconstitutional. Is it unconstitutional in its abstract? We have been taught that those who framed our constitution, were the wise, the great, the good, and the patriotic. Is it possible that such men in framing the constitution, could have abandoned the right or power to protect the home industry of our country? The right, said he, by the constitution to regulate commerce, is absolute, unlimited, and unqualified. Where do the advocates of free trade, find the authority, or right to interpolate the constitution, or to limit or restrict the power conferred, in relation to the levying of duties.

The constitution, said Mr. Austin, grew out of the necessity of giving protection to American industry. A wide field in our commercial operations, was occupied by foreign nations. The American ship builder and ship owner required protection. One of the first acts of the government was to afford protection. The manufacture of ships was fostered, protected and secured. This was done by laying a discriminating duty between American and foreign vessels. It was this act that secured to us our extensive coasting trade. It was this act which precludes the employment of any but an American ship or vessel in the trade. It was this protection which has given us the glory of our marine. This protection, the American ship manufacturer is a part of our system and we will not surrender our share of the glory arising from that protection to any free trade advocate.

Our other manufacturers required a like protection. If refused, they will be underworked by the half starved miserable laborer of foreign countries. We are not to place our population in comparison with the English and Asiatic laborer, who work 16 or 18 hours a day. They cannot and will not be degraded to a level with such men.

After some further remarks, Mr. Austin moved, that a committee of — members be appointed to consider and report what business may come before this convention, and in what order it shall be arranged.

On motion of Mr. Dwight, the resolution was so amended as to refer the subject to the committee already appointed.

On motion, it was ordered, that the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and assistant aldermen, of New York, be invited to take seats on the floor—that one of the galleries be prepared, appropriated exclusively for the accommodation of the ladies—and that the president be authorized to admit such persons within the bar, as he may think entitled to such attention: and then the convention adjourned until 4 o'clock P. M.

Four o'clock P. M. The convention met.

Mr. Woodward, of New York, moved a resolution, to admit editors of papers within the bar, which was afterwards substituted by one in more detail by Mr. Buckingham, of Massachusetts, which being accepted by the mover, was assented to.

It was then determined to continue calling the roll.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, proposed that a committee of three be appointed by the chair to report rules and regulations for the government of the convention, which motion was laid on the table, on the suggestion that the committee of organization would probably have the subject under consideration, and report in the morning.

Mr. Brown, of Pennsylvania, stated that a convention had recently been held in Philadelphia, by persons interested in the manufacture of iron; that the states of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, and Maryland, were represented by delegates in that convention, and that it had been deemed expedient to adjourn to this city, for the purpose of conference and intercourse, with the present general convention; he therefore, moved,

That such of them as were not already members be requested to take seats on the floor, as additional delegates from their respective states.

Mr. Paine objected, and wished the resolution, for the present, to lie on the table. After some few observations, from different gentlemen, pro and con, the resolution passed almost unanimously.

Convention adjourned until 10 o'clock, to-morrow morning.

Thursday morning, October 27.

The convention met at 10 o'clock, when the minutes of yesterday were read.

The committee of organization report, That committees be appointed to prepare and report memorials on the following subjects:

1st. To prepare an address to the people of the United States, affirming the constitutionality and expediency of the tariff laws, respecting the interests of the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of the nation—carried.

2d. To inquire into and report any evasions of the tariff laws—carried.

3d. A memorial to congress enforcing the propriety of continuing the protection to articles of home manufacture, whatever may be done in regard to foreign products—carried.

4th. To inquire into and report upon the effects of the existing tariff laws upon the agriculture, commerce, mechanic arts and foreign trade of the country—carried.

It was then ordered, that the committee under the first resolution, consist of one member from each state—that that under the second resolution, consist of seven members, and that the committees under the third and fourth resolutions, consist of one member from each state.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, called up his resolution of yesterday evening, for appointing a committee of three to draft rules for the government of the convention—but it was ultimately lost, it being considered that as the meeting of the committee was so short, such formality was not necessary. Points of order were, therefore left to the chair.

Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, moved that the committees created this morning, be appointed by the chair, which being carried, the convention adjourned until 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Four o'clock, P. M. The convention met.

The chair announced that it had appointed the committees under the 1st, 3d, and 4th resolutions passed this morning, and that they consisted of 1st resolution—Committee to prepare an address to the people. Messrs. Moses Emory, of Maine, Saml. Grant, of New Hampshire, Herman Allen, of Vermont, Warren Dutton, of Massachusetts, Samuel D. Hubbard, of Connecticut, Nathan F. Dixon, of Rhode Island, Daniel Kellogg, of New York, Joseph C. Hornblower, of New Jersey, Charles J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, Andrew Gray, of Delaware, John P. Kennedy, of Maryland, John McLeure, of Virginia, George Endly, of Ohio, and Peter Force, of the District of Columbia.

3rd resolution—Committee to prepare a memorial to congress. Messrs. Joshua Wingate, of Maine, Robert Rice, of New Hampshire, Mark Richards, of Vermont, Alexander H. Everett, of Massachusetts, Benjamin Cozzens, of Rhode Island, Samuel B. Sherwood, of Connecticut, Jesse Hall, of New York, John S. Darsey, of New Jersey, Joseph Hemphill, of Pennsylvania, E. J. Dupont, of Delaware, Luke Tiernan, of Maryland, William Lambdin, of Virginia, and Holland Green, of Ohio.

4th resolution—Committee to report on the effects of the existing tariff. Messrs. Josiah Calc, of Maine, Floyd W. Wells, of New Hampshire, C. F. Hammond, of Vermont, Henry Shaw, of Massachusetts, James D'Wolf, of Rhode Island, William C. Gilman, of Connecticut, C. A. Davis, of New York, Samuel G. Wright, of New Jersey, Robert T. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, Andrew Gray, of Delaware, Thomas Elliott, of Maryland, John McLeure, of Virginia, and Holland Green, of Ohio.

The president stated that the committee had been arranged geographically: he not intending to designate the chairman leaving each committee to make its own selection.

Mr. Brown, of Pa. offered a resolution instructing the committee appointed to prepare an address to the people, to represent a clear and comprehensive view of the tariff, or American System, shewing that it is constitutional and a part of the plan of our government, &c. Mr. B. enforced the propriety of his resolution at some length. He shewed by documents in his possession that the system of protecting the home industry of the country was a part of the revolutionary plan of our government—referred to the articles of the old confederation to shew that the several states had the right to regulate trade; that it was objectionable on that account, New Jersey contending that that right should be exercised by the general government—that this difficulty was obviated by the present constitution which contains the power, and that the system had been sustained by the people for half a century.

Mr. Sharpe was opposed to the resolution. He thought the gentleman should have waited for the report of the committee, and if that was not satisfactory, he should have moved an amendment. He was opposed to instructing the committee; he hoped the proposition would be withdrawn, and moved that it lie on the table—which motion was lost.

The resolution was then amended and agreed to.

The committee on organization, made a further report, in part—They recommend the appointment of committees to consider and report on the following subjects:

1st. Upon the production and manufacture of iron.
2nd. Upon the growth and manufacture of wool.
3rd. Upon the growth and manufacture of cotton.
4th. On cash duties.
5th. On the culture and growth of silk, hemp, and other agricultural articles used in the manufactures of our country.

6th. A committee to devise ways and means to defray the expenses of the convention.

The chair then announced the names of the following: Committee upon exactions of the revenue. Mr. Brown, chairman of this committee, Messrs. Brown, of Mass., Scheuck, of New York, Allen, of Rhode Island, Barr, of Maryland, H. Reeves, of Pennsylvania, Wain, of do. Ellsworth, of New York.

Mr. McCulloh, of Maryland, moved that the general committees have permission to sit during the business hours of the convention.

Mr. Lynch proposed to divide the resolution in relation to wool; in such manner that there should be a committee on the growth, and another on the manufacture of wool—carried. And each committee ordered to consist of fifteen members.

The committee on iron and cotton were each ordered to consist of fifteen members.

Mr. Lynch moved to divide the committee on cotton, as in the case of wool.

Mr. McCulloh was opposed to the proposition. He said the new species of cotton, from which hankins could be advantageously manufactured, promised to become a great object, as such hankins might be substituted for those of China. He thought it probable that much valuable information might be obtained on this subject, from the manufacturers of the article; and this information being communicated to our brethren of the south, would reach them, for practical purposes, much earlier than it could through any private channel.

Mr. Lynch explained his views. He thought it would be better to keep the enquiry, as to the growth and as to the manufacture, separate and distinct.

Mr. McCulloh contended that these enquiries were so intimately connected, that more useful information would be obtained by keeping them united, than by a separation, and therefore could not consent to the proposed amendment. If these enquiries should elicit any material fact, the communication of which would be beneficial to the people of the south, that result would be well calculated to conciliate them. He hoped the amendment would not prevail. The question on the amendment was put and lost, and then the original resolution passed.

The fourth resolution was adopted, and the committee ordered to consist of seven members.

The fifth resolution passed, and the committee ordered to consist of fifteen members.

The sixth resolution passed, and the committee ordered to consist of one member from each state.

Mr. Carey moved, That a committee be appointed on the production and manufacture of leather, and such other manufactures as are not embraced in the previous resolution.

Mr. McCulloh wished the article of leather kept separate from all other articles, as it was one of vast magnitude. He had occasion, recently, to make some inquiries into the subject, and he found that it was estimated in Maryland alone, at one million three hundred thousand dollars annually. We have (said he) almost taught ourselves to believe that the manufacture of leather was of no importance; because those concerned in it were not grouped together in large massy buildings. I should like that great body of men who minister to our daily wants and necessities, to feel and to know that they are supported and maintained by the American System.

The proposition to confine the inquiries of the committee to leather only was carried; and the committee ordered to consist of one member from each state.

Mr. Bitterell, of Pennsylvania, moved a committee on the production of lead, and the articles, in the manufacture of which it was a component part.

Mr. Simpson proposed to add copper. After some desultory remarks, separate committees were ordered, each to consist of three members.

Mr. Bruen, of New Jersey, proposed a committee on the manufacture of salt.

Mr. Breck, of Pennsylvania, thought the convention ought not to descend to all these details. He said the committees already appointed would be sufficient to embrace all the items, and therefore moved the reconsideration of the two last resolutions on lead and copper.

Mr. Roberts said it was not necessary to reconsider. Any new subjects to which the attention of the convention might be called, could be referred to some committee previously appointed.

The resolution, in its original form was carried, and the committee ordered to consist of three.

Mr. Tyson moved a committee, on the state of Chemistry, as connected with manufactures and the arts in the United States.—Carried. The committee to consist of five.

Mr. Crolius moved a committee on the manufacture of hats. He proceeded to point out the propriety of his motion; and remarked, that the time was, when we could not wear a hat without a British crown in it, one of that description he had accidentally seen this day, and he presumed it belonged to a member of the convention.

Mr. McCulloh was favorable to separate and distinct committees on all these subjects. They would illicit information. Give the people (said he) facts. Give them light. By doing so, you will ask them to think, and thinking, you may safely trust their judgment. We are convened at a period that will be an era in the history of our country. The sages and patriots of our revolution feared to be subjects, but dared to be citizens. They, indeed, made sacrifices and endured sufferings. But what have we, or do we suffer? Let us, at least, make the trifling sacrifice of time, in examining the matters that properly come before us, and not return home, after making a few formal reports, without being able to explain to those who sent us here, the grounds upon which we have acted. Let us, then enter into details; they will enable our rulers to legislate wisely.

The resolution was carried, and a committee of seven added.

Mr. Cox, of Pennsylvania, proposed a committee on the production, manufacture, and consumption of sugar in the United States. He remarked, that last year we had produced ninety millions of pounds, and that within five years we should raise a quantity equal to our consumption. The resolution passed.

And then the convention adjourned until to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock.

Friday, October 28.

The convention met at 10 o'clock. The proceedings of yesterday being read, the chair announced the appointment of the following committees:

On salt.—Messrs. Brewer, of New Jersey, Stewart, of Pennsylvania, Kellogg, of New York.

On hats and cabinet furniture.—Messrs. Crolius of New York, Darrach of Pennsylvania, McKee of Pennsylvania, Rogers of Maryland, Randall of Connecticut, Rankin of N. Jersey, Knowler of New York, Dunn of Pennsylvania, Williams of Maryland, Loril of New Hampshire, Cross of New Jersey, Baylies of Mass.

On expenses of the convention.—Messrs. Wingate of Maine, N. Gilman of New Hampshire, Chittenden, Vermont, Crowninshield, Mass. C. E. Robbins, Rhode Island, Bosman, Connecticut, Smith, New York, Jackson, New Jersey, Hupfinger, Pennsylvania, Kennedy, Delaware, Kelat, Maryland, McClure, Virginia, Endly, Ohio.

On cash payment of duties.—Messrs. Bunker of Pennsylvania, Evans of Maryland, A. Lawrence of Mass. Breck of Pennsylvania, Z. Allen of Rhode Island, D. D. Broadhead of Massachusetts, Paine of New York.

On lead.—Messrs. Wetherell of Pennsylvania, Phelps of New York, Brackenridge of Pennsylvania.

On sugar.—Messrs. Cox of Pennsylvania, Biddle of Penn. Taylor of Maryland, Herttelt of New York, White of Mass.

On iron and steel.—Messrs. Dunlop of Pennsylvania, M. Richards of do. Valentine of do. Jones of do. Haldeman of do. Stewart of do. Kien of do. Kenney of N. Jersey, Richards of do. Leach of Massachusetts, Chas. H. Hammond of Vermont, Townsend of New York, Newall of R. Island, Boyle of Maryland, E. T. Elliott of do. Holly of Connecticut, J. R. Coates of Pennsylvania.

On motion, the subject of the preparation of molasses, was added to the duties confided to the committee on sugar.

On motion, it was ordered, that the committee on iron report, also, on the manufacture of steel.

On motion, Mr. Cox of Pennsylvania, was added to the committee on iron and steel.

A member from Somerset, N. J. moved, that a committee be appointed on the manufacture of various kinds of cutlery in the U. S.

This department of industry, he said, deserved particular attention. As had been remarked on hats and leather, it entered into general use and was essential to the comfort of every individual. It was incumbent on us to do something which would efficiently advance the interests of our cause. He lived in a part of the country where reports, in general terms, would not be understood by one in a hundred, whereas, if we spoke to them of particular things, in plain terms, their interests and our object would be secured. The resolution was agreed to and the subject referred to the committee on iron.

Mr. R. Swartwout held a resolution in his hand, which he should offer after the other was disposed of,—the object of which was to propose that the members of the convention, at their respective homes, should prepare and forward to the secretary of the convention, Mr. Niles, statements of the condition of every branch of manufacture in their vicinity. He submitted it for consideration, and it was laid on the table.

Mr. Smith of New Jersey, moved that a committee be appointed to prepare a statement of the duties on exports from the U. States, into the ports of Great Britain, Russia, Holland and Belgium, and also the duties on similar articles imported from these countries into the United States.

Mr. Cox said the information was embraced in the report from the treasury department of 1828.

Mr. Carey stated that the report of 1828 embraced only the tariff of England, France, Russia and Naples, and that the tariff of England had since been modified.

The resolution was agreed to, and a committee of three ordered to be appointed under it.

Mr. Saunders of New York, moved, that a committee be appointed to prepare and report what bounty ought to be paid for the culture and production of articles intended for the use of manufacturers.

The mover said indigo, wool, and other articles could and would be produced in abundance under a bounty.

Mr. Barker, of Penn. was opposed to the proposition. He doubted the constitutionality of the measure.

Mr. McCulloch advocated in strong terms its adoption. He said the government had the power, and ought to exercise it, of raising the way and means to grant bounties; and he referred to the opinion of Mr. Madison, Mr. Hamilton, &c. in support of the assertion. He contended, that such bounties would produce, in great abundance, indigo, the almond, the mulberry, the olive, and water rotted hemp and flax, &c.

Mr. Saunders said we ought to encourage the culture of such articles as might be raised in the south with facility. He said that in two years the British nation could supply themselves with cotton, to such an extent, that not one pound, except Sea Island, would be required from the United States.

Mr. Paine moved to lay the resolution on the table. He was fearful we would be involved in constitutional difficulties.

Mr. Carey said, the constitutional question could be settled in a moment. Early bounties had been granted to foster the fisheries.

This resolution was laid on the table in order to give time to gentlemen to examine the question.

A motion was made and laid on the table to recommend to congress the establishment of a home department.

A resolution was referred to the committee on internal trade, to examine into the coasting trade of the U. States, and how far the protection of American manufactures have tended to improve that trade.

The chair reported, as members of the committee on copper.

Messrs. Simpson, of New York, McKim, of Maryland, Crocker, of Massachusetts, and Binney, of Mass.

It was then ordered to refer the resolution on cutlery, to the committee on iron.

Mr. Leach, of Mass. was added to the above committee.

Mr. Myrick was added to the committee on copper.

Mr. Hopkins offered three resolutions; the substance of which were—

1. That a committee prepare and report the value of each class of American manufactures produced in the United States, with or without machinery, and which are now exported, and the amount exported.

2. What articles, after the payment of the national debt, may be safely prohibited from importation.

3. Upon the culture of the vine, and the manufacture of wines from the grape.

Laid on the table.

Mr. Beech moved, that the convention recommend to our friends in the south, south-western, and western states, to assemble in convention, and to express to congress their sentiments on the important subjects, which engage the attention of this body.

The proceedings of the tariff meeting in Cumberland county, Ohio, was read.

Mr. Williams, of New York, moved that a committee be appointed to prepare and report on the moral influence of manufacturers in the United States.

After some desultory conversation, the subject was referred to the committee appointed to prepare an address to the people of the United States.

Mr. Dwight moved that the members of the convention be requested, as early as possible, to give the several committees all the information they possess on the several subjects referred to them.

Mr. Carey moved that a committee be appointed to enquire into the foundation of the charge against the protecting system, of encouraging smuggling. Laid on the table.

Mr. Inlet, from the committee on the arrangement of business, reported as follows:

That a permanent committee of correspondence and statistics be appointed (to communicate with the several state committees hereafter to be provided for) whose duty it shall be to collect and disseminate information, from time to time, and as soon as convenient, in relation to the statistics of the United States, concerning agriculture, manufactures and the mechanic arts, as combined with, or united to, the internal and external commerce and navigation of our country—showing as far as possible, the general effects of the protecting system on its population and prosperity; the number of persons employed in the several branches of industry, (designating the sexes and ages) with the average or aggregate of the wages earned and the value of the commodities produced by them—the amount of capital variously invested or employed, and the bearings of the several great branches of productive labor upon one another.

That the aforesaid permanent committee shall appoint (with the approbation of the convention), the several state committees as they think most expedient, and generally arrange the matters submitted to them, that the objects of this convention may be accomplished.

That a committee be appointed to report upon the currency of the country, as affecting or affected by the protecting system.

That a committee be appointed to collect and publish information on the culture of madder, wool and weld, and other vegetable dyes, used in our manufactures.

And that all reports made to the government, shall be delivered to the central committee; and also, that all reports of committees of the convention not prepared in seasons to be presented at this time, shall be sent to the central committee, to be collected, revised, and published by them at their discretion.

Ordered, That the central committee consist of seven; the committee on currency, of five; the committee on vegetable dyes, of three.

All of which propositions were agreed to.

And the convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Saturday, October 29.

The convention met at 11 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, stated, as the organ of the committee to prepare an address to the people of the United States, that the committee would be prepared to make their report on Monday morning at nine o'clock.

Mr. Everett, as chairman of the committee appointed to prepare a memorial to congress, reported, in part, that as the basis of this memorial will be founded on the general reports which will be made to this convention, by three different committees, it is deemed inexpedient to prepare a memorial, until after the rising of this convention.

Mr. Cox moved that the report be accepted, and that the committee be authorized and requested to prepare and produce such a memorial to congress.

Mr. Roberts said it would be a subject of regret that such a convention as the present should adjourn without an opportunity of affixing their signatures to something like a memorial to congress. He contended that the power proposed to be delegated was of a delicate nature. He, however, had no proposition to offer.

Mr. Woodward was opposed to characterizing this convention, which was strictly national, by committees. Such committees might be operated upon by local circumstances. He wished the convention to settle the principles and then delegate the power to draft a memorial.

Mr. Everett said the general scope of the memorial is to be found in the resolution appointing the committee. The committee wished to obtain certain facts which they would use in the memorial, and which would be derived from the labor of the general committees. It was also supposed that the contemplated paper would be in part an answer to the Philadelphia memorial, which was to be presented to congress and which was not yet made public.

Mr. Roberts contended that the facts alluded to by the gentleman, (Mr. Everett), were not necessary to be introduced into the memorial, which should be brief. The facts might be, and ought to be prepared and placed in form for the use of congress. He therefore moved to recommit the report, with instructions to prepare and lay before this convention the draft of a memorial.

Mr. Haugh of Pennsylvania moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Crowninshield hoped the subject would not lie on the table. It would open a field for unnecessary discussion.

Mr. Waugh withdrew his proposition.

Mr. Forward of Pennsylvania, did not attach weight to names as he did to the arguments, and he was therefore in favor of granting the committee time to collect the necessary facts.

Mr. Everett, with perfect deference to the worthy gentleman who moved the re-commitment, would suggest to him that the report already made was considered by the committee to be in conformity to the directions of the general committee.

As a member of the committee on business, he would say that it was his understanding; and as he believed, it was the general understanding that the memorial was to be prepared after the rising of the convention; that it was to embrace facts to be collected from the various reports made to the convention from other committees; and that it was to furnish a reply to the arguments which might be urged in the "free trade" memorial.

Mr. Waugh, of Pennsylvania, was opposed to delegating to this committee the power of drafting a memorial, until after the facts and arguments it was to contain was to be decided upon by this convention. Such memorial might contain statements and opinions that would conflict with the expectations of his constituents.

Mr. Woodward hoped the assembly would do nothing to mar its own dignity with the people. Its source was primary—the body itself was primary; all its acts should be original, and conclusive. He held it to be second in character only to that congregation of patriots who signed the Declaration of Independence. Suppose that body had delegated its powers to a committee, where would this nation and its liberties have been? We should have been the humble minions of England. Let the convention act as became republicans, fresh from the purest fountain on earth, the primary assemblies of the people. Mr. W. stated that he had himself drawn all the memorials, (but one), which had gone to congress from this city on the subject of protection; and he had thought it respectful to the high organ of the nation not to prescribe to it in detail, but to convey in general propositions the cardinal principles held and urged by the memorialists. He was not for a microscopic dissection of the subjects to be handled; there were hundreds competent to that task. What he wished was to have the dignity of this body preserved, and its leading sentiments stricken out with a bold hand. He thought the convention would lose in the eye of the nation by consenting to delegate its powers. Let them reverebrate the report upon the committee, and wait for a memorial, breathing the spirit of national independence and of national economy.

Mr. Richards, of Pennsylvania, was favorable to granting the time required by the report of the committee.

Mr. Sharpe wished a re-commitment of the report, with instructions.

Mr. Everett, in reply said, the gentleman proposed to defer the preparation of the memorial till the other reports from which its facts were to be collected were made, that is, to the last hour of the session. It was morally impossible for the committee to perform the duty without some interval of time. He also repeated the fact that the paper was intended to be an answer to another which was not yet in existence. The address to the people would express the opinions of the convention, and would be authenticated with the names of all present; but the memorial to congress was intended to subserve another purpose.

Mr. Roberts said this was a subject on which gentlemen could differ with perfect deference to the opinions of each other; but he must repeat that the purpose of answering the free trade memorial was not contemplated by the committee. We were not to proceed, in this business, in a lawyer-like way, by reply, rejoinder, rebuttal and un rebuttal. We wish to make a declaration of our views in reference to the anticipated revision of the tariff. We wished merely to state the principle on which we wished that revision to be made when it is made. Such a memorial was not an ordinary species of manufacture. Its importance was not to be estimated by broad measure. It was not to be got up in counting houses, schools or other places of less repute. It was to be an expression of the wishes and opinions of an assembly representing more than half the states. It was a document which could not be imitated nor counterfeited, and there could be no substitute for it. The members of this body, one and all, would, with enthusiasm, place their signatures to it.

Mr. Goddard, of Connecticut, would place his signature to the paper with as much enthusiasm as the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but he wished the paper to do honor to the convention. A very able committee had been charged with the preparation of a memorial to congress on behalf of the friends of "free trade;" and our memorial, he hoped, would transcend it in the manner of its execution as much as it would in the merits of its cause. If gentlemen would wait here till it could be framed, he would not say that he would leave them; but he believed they would have to send to many and distant parts of the United States to procure the signatures of the members now here. What was the committee to say on all the topics which are now in the hands of committees of fifteen? Were they to frame a memorial without reference to those topics? They could doubtless easily draft a memorial. So could the gentleman behind me, (Mr. Woodward), who has drawn so many of them; and he would furnish a very good one; but he would prefer to give the committee time and materials for preparing a document which would do signal honor to the convention and service to its cause. If tears were entertained that the committee would transcend its power let them be specially instructed. If it was feared they would propose alterations in the tariff, let them be instructed on this point. He, himself, reposed confidence in the committee, and believed they would do nothing in opposition to the general instructions of the convention.

The question was here loudly called for.

Mr. Woodward. The gentleman who just sat down, was, I believe, deputed as the bearer of the memorial of the Hartford convention to Washington. [Here Mr. W. was interrupted by a general and simultaneous burst of indignation from all parts of the house. He attempted several times to proceed, but there was a continual hissing, and being called to order severally by the chair, he took his seat; the house, as with one accord, manifesting their most decided censure of his conduct.]

Mr. Goldard. Will the chair excuse me. Several gentlemen said, "not a word." The chair said, as the personal remarks of the member had been arrested, a reply to them was unnecessary.

Mr. Woodward rose again to speak, but was put down, the convention refusing to hear a word from him.

Mr. Roberts' motion to re-commit was put and lost.

Mr. Roberts begged the indulgence of the meeting. He spoke against the impolicy of referring this subject to a committee scattered over the union; that it was too indirect a way to attain our object. We ought to be frank, nothing was lost by being so. We ought not to devolve on a committee what we ought to do ourselves. That congress would be governed more by the character of the body from which the memorial issued, than by the arguments employed in it. This was not the time for elaborate arguments.

Col. Murray proposed that the committee present to the convention on Monday, a paper containing the principles which they intended to embrace in their memorial.

Mr. Everett objected to this course, in as much as the nature of the duty of the committee was prescribed in the resolution creating it. This motion was laid on the table.

Some further remarks being made by Messrs. Cox and Roberts,

Mr. Dunlop, of Pennsylvania, said the people of the United States expected that the memorial would be drafted with great care. A memorial which will meet their expectations cannot be drafted in 48 hours. My venerable colleague says, that congress would not read our paper, if ever so fine and flourishing. But it was not congress we intended, but the people; they would read it, if congress did not. He wished to have a report which would do honor to the convention, and put down those miscreants—not our southern opponents—but the British serpents who are endeavoring to strangle our national energies while in their cradle. He wished facts to be collected and laid before the people, that they might see the immensity of their resources. This convention had no conception of the energies of the nation, if protected. What member knew that, in one establishment in Connecticut, one hundred thousand axes were yearly made. Another factory with which he was acquainted used a hundred tons of steel in a year. Himself, though a small man, make thirty or forty thousand dollars worth a year of edge-tools. I have the marks of the hammer on my hand, and am proud of them; I have put down entirely the British article of hatchets. I put two thousand dozen of hatchets into the market this year, in the face of British competition, and without the protection of a duty; for the treasury department held that hatchets were not axes, and as hatchets were not named in the tariff, they were not liable to a specific duty. But I can prove that the British can't touch me with a hatchet. Are the public aware of the fact that the rolling mills of Pittsburgh alone can roll out as much iron as would supply all England and America both? They could each roll forty tons a day; that sum multiplied by three hundred, and the product by eight, the number of the mills, gives you a million of tons of iron which they can roll in a year, in Great Britain only half a million a year was rolled; all such facts as these should go to the people, and they could not all be crammed into a paper not bigger than his hand. It was easy to prepare a general memorial; his venerable colleague could do it very well; but we wanted no abstract propositions; we wanted facts, as Solomon says wisely, "can any man write a little book." Those who would undertake to write on this subject, would find the volume swell fast in their hands. We had laid down the principles of the memorial in the resolution, and he would trust the committee to keep within them.

Mr. Roberts did not see how the remarks of the gentleman last up bore upon the subject; though they were calculated to entertain an assembly whose attention was not seriously engaged. There was another saying of as high authority as Solomon's, which the gentleman would find more applicable to the subject, "Oh that mine enemy had written a book." Books were two-edged swords; they might be made to cut both ways. He was willing to show hands with the gentleman. He had never followed any other occupation than that of a mechanic and farmer; and to this day, he supported, by his own labor, a large and young family. The gentleman does me the honor to say that I can draw a general report; yea, sir, and a special one too, if need be.

Mr. McCulloh was in favor of having a concise memorial, setting forth the plain principles, and bearing the signatures of the members. This would distinctly pledge each and every member of the convention to the principle of protection. This, he believed, would meet the object of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania. The sole objection of those who opposed the report he understood to be that the memorial would want the authority of the signatures of the members. He could easily imagine that a document, thus authenticated, would have great weight with congress, especially if unanimously approved by us. Thus the question would be settled, that we unanimously sustain the principles of the tariff and are opposed to any alteration of it, conflicting with protection. After this was done, the report embracing detailed facts, could be improved and printed at leisure.

Col. Dwight concurred in the views of the gentleman from Maryland, and with regret differed from the venerable member from Pennsylvania. We had come together to get information, which we could get in no other way; not to make fine speeches—though we see that we can have sharp arguments as well as sharp edged tools, and both from the same source, (alluding to Mr. Dunlop). This convention, he considered as the most important assembly which had met since that which met to frame the constitution. Its object was to protect ourselves from the operation of a system established in other countries for the purpose of enervating the labor of this country. Mr. Brougham had well said that every axe put in motion in America, put in motion a wheel in England. But the axe was put in motion for the benefit of England alone, if also refused to admit into her markets the produce of our farms. If our corn cannot go to that country, it is our duty to exclude the products of their workshops from a competition with those of our own. He wished that every gentleman who could work as well and speak as well as the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Dunlop), would address the convention, and communicate to us the information in his possession as to the state of our industry. He admired the sinewy style of his remarks, and was still more gratified with the facts which he advanced. He trusted the convention would present to congress a full view of the products of the industry of this country; and they would feel the force of our statements, if they did not read them.

Mr. Roberts, with a view to conciliation, withdrew his objections to the report, with the understanding that the course suggested by the member from Maryland, (Mr. McCulloh), should be pursued.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. Lyman, to accept the report and authorize the chairman to prepare and present a memorial to congress, it was decided in the affirmative, without division.

Committees appointed by the chair will be given to-morrow.

The chair, on announcing the central committee, asked whether it was the intention of the general committee that the central committee should consist of those residing in the vicinity of each other, in some of the cities, or whether they should be distributed throughout different parts of the country. This question gave rise to some conversation between Messrs. Roberts, Coxe, Niles, Wetherall and Goldford—and which issued in the nomination from the chair of the committee he had appointed—consisting of Messrs. Niles, Cary, Dwight, Dupont, Hubbard and McCulloch.

Mr. Clattenden, from the committee on finance, made a report.

Mr. Coxe, from the committee on sugar and molasses, made a report which was read, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCulloch offered a resolution, referring to a special committee the subject of anthracite coal, and the amount of tonnage employed in its transportation.—Laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. McCulloch, the resolution offered on Thursday by Mr. Swartwout, was ordered to be referred to the committee of three from each state, with directions to report on such subjects enumerated in that resolve as had not already been submitted to other committees.

The convention then adjourned, to meet in the afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Four o'clock, P. M. The convention met.

The chairman of the committee on chemicals, reported that the great extent and diversity of their inquiry would prevent the committee from discharging the duty devolved on them during the session of the convention; that certain subjects had been prescribed to the several members of the committee, and that the result of their labors would be transmitted to the chairman, and by him be laid before the central committee.—The report was laid on the table.

Mr. Morris, of Pa. after consulting with some of his friends thought it proper, that the convention should now fix a limit to the duration of their session, and offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the convention adjourn sine die, on Monday next, in the afternoon.

On motion of Mr. Stevens, the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion, Messrs. Thompson and McIlvaine were added to the committee on the growth of wool.

Mr. Forward, of Pa. submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the friends of American industry to form associations in their respective districts, for the purpose of collecting such statistical facts as tend to illustrate the benefits of the American System.

Mr. Forward said a crisis had arrived in our history: that unless the attention of the people could be drawn to this subject, the whole system of protection would speedily be subverted; our enemies were all active and their interests united in opposition to us. Two interests of this description ever separated by jealousy were now united and moving in rapid array against our protective system; and how long was it, sir, when the southern agricultural interest was hostile to the northern navigating interest? Now they were united, and making movements which, unless counteracted by efforts on our part, must destroy our system. Although the country was so prosperous, yet the same arguments were urged against the tariff. The same opposition was made now which was commenced fifteen years ago. Theoretical ruin and bankruptcy were still held up, notwithstanding our prosperity. The people were tempted with the prospect of low prices. He wished to see facts collected and inquiries instituted which would satisfy the people on this subject. The "free trade" gentlemen assured us that the self-fixed prices; but the fact was, prices were regulated by causes independent both of buyer and seller. The amount of cotton goods manufactured in this country, at present, is from thirty to thirty-five millions a year. Suppose the space occupied by these goods was opened to the fabrics of Great Britain. It was obvious the prices would not be lower. The American supply would be replaced by a supply from abroad, and the prices remain the same. All supposed that prices would rise in consequence of an increase of duties; but in this the anticipations both of friends and enemies were disappointed, our markets were more abundantly supplied by the tariff. The markets had been glutted and their prices had declined. The effect had an obvious cause—a reduction in the price of foreign labor. The profits of manufacturing in England had been greatly reduced by the establishment of manufactures here; and this country had been more abundantly and cheaply supplied than before. Perhaps, therefore, prices were lower, at this time, in Great Britain than here; but the question was not what is the price in Great Britain, but what it would be if our market was thrown open to her. During the first rush of the flood, the prices would be lowered, and when the inundation had passed the prices would rise; and having got the command of the market, they would keep it.

It was demonstrable, in his opinion, that the repeal of the tariff would result in the great and permanent enhancement of prices. The effect of this system on agriculture was most flattering. In New England alone, as he had learned here, the importation of flour from the southern states, during the last year, exceeded a million of barrels. This single market of New England was, therefore, the best in the world for American flour. Suppose manufactures to be destroyed, this market would be cut off, and not one barrel would be added to the quantity of flour exported from the United States, nor could any one find out the spot where our exports have landed in consequence of our adoption of the tariff system? He wished that the people might be made acquainted with the facts showing the operation of the American System; and they would not be deceived by the representation that it obliged them to buy at high prices and sell at low prices. Before the establishment of the cotton manufacture here, the East India cottons were imported; none of the American cotton entered into the fabric of the cotton cloths which we imported.

Here Mr. Forward made some remarks on the absurdity of the constitutional objections urged against the north. It there was any faculty of beneficence in our government it was truly a subject of apprehension. The government may make war—eternal war—war of ambition and conquest. In mischief it was omnipotent. But in power to do good, it was according to the doctrines of our opponents, feeble. The same gentlemen opposed the exercise of any other beneficent power. They opposed any measure which was intended to bind together distinct parts of the union, by ties of commerce and intercourse. What would be the condition of the country if these doctrines were established? Are the millions multiplying on the Ohio and Mississippi afraid of a foreign invasion? Do they want the aid of a general government for their protection from foreign arms? They might say to the government, we owe no obligations to you; nothing for our soil, for that we paid you; and nothing for the air we breathe and the light that shines upon us. Was there nothing paternal and beneficent in the government? Was the American laborer to be told that he stood on the same footing, as to protection, with foreign laborers; that he was to be patronized in the same degree as the foreign operatives? The government then exacted from us our blood and our money in return for the mere permission to occupy the soil. He hoped the resolution would pass.

The question being taken on the resolution it was agreed to.

The committee on cash payment of duties on imports, reported, That the measure would, in their opinion, materially aid American industry; but as the high interests of commerce were peculiarly connected with the matter, they consider it expedient to postpone any measure on the subject, with a view to have in it the co-operation of the commercial community.

A motion was made to recommit the report.

Mr. Woodward attempted to speak, but was interrupted by a loud and general call for the question, and finally put down.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, it was decided in the negative.

The question then being on the acceptance of the report, Mr. Coxe begged leave to say a word against the report. The country was now full of capital, and the credit system was unnecessary. It was destructive of the interests of the manufacturers. A man would get a letter of introduction to some manufacturer in England, take goods to the amount of 50,000*l.* sterling, on credit—then get credit for duties here, and sell the goods at auction. There was nothing, he said, more injurious to American industry than the facility thus given to importations on credit. It rendered the tariff a nullity, so far as the interests of the manufacturers were concerned.

Mr. Richards moved that the report be laid on the table.

Col. Dwight begged that the convention would consider the interests of the American merchant as well as those of the manufacturer. The subject was of that importance that it would require our attention for months. He hoped it would be laid on the table.

Mr. Barker, of Pa., made some remarks in favor of the report; after which it was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. Lockwood, of New York, unlimited the following resolution, that a committee be appointed to report to the convention on what articles and to what extent the present duties could be reduced without prejudice to agriculture, or manufactures, and what would be the effect of the reduction on the revenue.

Mr. Cox said that a communication had been received by Mr. G. Stuart, his colleague, from Mr. Graham, giving a list of articles on which he proposed a reduction of duties.

Mr. Shaw thought the resolution might be productive of benefit if slightly modified, so as to require that the committee appointed under it should report to the central committee.

Mr. Lockwood had supposed, he said, that this subject was one of the great objects of the convention. If the inquiry had been prosecuted at first, a great part of the embarrassment experienced this morning would have been prevented. It cannot be supposed that public opinion will be satisfied unless we do, in some way or other, directly or indirectly, record an opinion on this subject. It would be no excuse for us to say that we had been so busy in discussing points of order here, that we had no time to consider the mode of reducing the tariff.

Mr. Dunlop said the duties of the convention were already so much perplexed, that it would require a southern constitutional lawyer to elucidate them. He could show that the question proposed in the resolution had already been submitted to the convention, in the second resolution of the general committee; after reading which, he said he would defy any gentleman not bred south of the Potomac, to show the difference between it and the resolution moved by the member from New York.

The resolution was laid on the table.

The convention then adjourned, to meet at nine o'clock on Monday morning.

Monday, October 31.

At half past 9 o'clock the convention was called to order, and the journal of Saturday having been read,

The chair requested that the members of the several delegations would enable the secretary to correct any errors which may have occurred in the list of delegates, and also to add to it the names of those (not present) who were appointed to attend the convention.

On motion, Messrs. Richards of Vermont, Kelsö of Maryland, and Wingate of Maine, were added to the committee on the growth and manufacture of wool.

On motion, Mr. Cox, of Pennsylvania, was added to the committee (No. 4) on the effects of the tariff.

Mr. Crosby, of Massachusetts, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution offered on Saturday, by the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Forward) was adopted.

Mr. Crosby said his object was so to amend that resolution so as to embrace within its scope an inquiry into the subject of commerce;—the resolution, as it stood, recommending associations for collecting information on the subject of agriculture and manufactures, exclusively. There were many who stood ready to cavil at all the doings of this convention. This resolution, as it stands, may enable them to say that our system is hostile to commerce—but he wished to be able to follow them into their own camp.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to. Mr. Crosby then moved to insert the word commerce after the word agriculture; but, at the suggestion of a member, he varied his motion so as to charge the associations with the collection of such facts "as tend to illustrate the benefits of the American System."

Mr. Keener of Maryland, spoke in favor of the motion. He had prepared a similar one, which he had intended to offer. It was at variance with the third resolution reported by the business committee, which resolution restricted our enquiries to "articles not conflicting with American industry." This restriction we must remove, unless we wish to appear before the nation as advocates of exclusive and particular interests. He expressed his satisfaction that one member of the convention, (col. Dwight) had avowed that he considered commerce as going hand in hand with manufactures, and equally entitled with them to our support. It was necessary not only to say this, but to leave it on our records.

Mr. Austin suggested to his colleague (Mr. Crosby) that the inquiries of the associations should be limited to some precise subject. The treasury department, with means which no voluntary association can possess, year after year, laid before congress full commercial statements. He hoped the form of the resolution would not be varied.

Mr. Ellsworth, of Conn. stated for the information of the convention, that the friends of the American System in Connecticut were so much impressed with the expediency of forming the associations contemplated by the resolution, that they had already taken measures to form them in that state.

The resolution was then put and lost.

Mr. Keener, in reply to the suggestions of the member from Boston, (Mr. Austin), said, if we wished to carry force with our proceedings, we must carry nothing with them which is forbidding. All he asked, was, that we should not bar the way to our influence by exciting prejudices against our system.

Col. Murray, rose to express his wish that the resolution might be so amended as to extend to agriculture, commerce, manufacturing and the mechanic arts. The gentleman from Maryland was gratified to find that there was one member in the convention friendly to commerce. He hoped there were many such. He could answer for the New York delegation that they were advocates of the commercial interests as well as of the interests of manufactures. Commerce, sir, is the tree in which our eagle builds her nest, and we are her nestlings. He could not sit down under the imputation implied in the remark of the gentleman from Maryland. The tariff he supported, because he believed it to be one of the best supports of commerce. It was well known that the want of a permanent tariff was one of the greatest evils to which our commerce was exposed. A vacillating and continually fluctuating tariff, discouraged and disappointed the merchant. It might undergo a change between the commencement and the completion of a single voyage.

Mr. Crosby accepted the modification proposed by the member from New York, and the resolution was amended so as to embrace "agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts;" and, as thus amended, was adopted.

Mr. Keener now moved a reconsideration of the 3rd resolution reported from the general committee; his object being to amend it, so as to strike out the words "not conflicting with that industry." The motion was put and lost.

Mr. Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, chairman of the committee appointed to prepare an address to the people of the United States, communicated the address, which he read from the secretary's table. The reading occupied two hours.

The reading of the address was suspended, while ex-president Adams, was conducted to a seat in the convention, by general Tallmadge. The convention rose, and received him with long, continued and hearty applause.

Mr. Hemphill, of Pennsylvania, moved that the report be accepted, and that 20,000 copies be printed for the use of the convention.

Mr. Core, though he much admired the report, thought it expedient to lay it on the table, that some little inadvertencies which had escaped its authors might be corrected. He moved that it lay on the table, and that 500 copies be printed for the present.

Mr. McCulloh hoped the motion would not prevail. He thought it more proper that it should be printed under the direction of the committee from which it was reported, and by whom any corrections, which might be necessary, would be made.

Mr. Ingersoll said it was his intention, at a proper time, to move that the address be printed by our friend, Mr. Niles, of Baltimore, and under the direction of Mr. Kennedy, of Baltimore, who had been the most important contributor to the report.

Mr. McCulloh said that there were some allusions in the report which had better be omitted. He referred to the remark that "no enlightened mind could tolerate" certain errors. Such errors had been tolerated by men of the highest intelligence and purest patriotism. He also objected to the allusion to "convulsions of nature." The late anti-tariff convention, as he hoped and believed, met with the most patriotic motives. When public feeling becomes too warm, it is best that those men whose influence, in a great measure, can control it, take the subject into their own hands. He did not regard the convention, which sat at Philadelphia, as a subject of reproach.

Mr. Ingersoll begged leave to interrupt the gentleman with a suggestion which would save the trouble of any further argument on the subject. There was not, in the whole paper, the most distant allusion to the convention which met at Philadelphia; there was nothing in the paper which could bear such a construction. It was not in the power of man to suspect, from any phrase contained in it, the most distant allusion to that subject. He was behind no man in respect for the individuals composing that body; many of whom were his intimate and highly valued friends. He was the last man in the world who would be likely to say, write or imagine any thing disrespectful or unkind in regard to the Philadelphia convention.

After a few words from Mr. Paine and Mr. Roberts, the motion to print 20,000 copies under the direction of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. D'Wolf, of R. I. from the committee on the effects of the tariff, on agriculture, commerce, manufactures, internal trade and the mechanic arts, submitted a report, which was read and laid on the table.

Mr. Wilkinson, of New York, moved that the secretary of the convention be requested to affix to the address to the people, the name and residence of every member of the convention, present or absent, who should by letter, post paid to the secretary, express his wish to that effect.

Mr. Roberts hoped it would not be considered an intrusion, if he once more made a feeble attempt to get something indicative of the views and principles of this convention, within so small a compass, that it would go into every village sheet in the union. The address reported, able, luminous, and cheering as it was, was too voluminous for this purpose. Twenty thousand copies would go but a little way towards placing it before the people. 'Tis the weekly press at last upon which we must rely for spreading our views over those districts of the country where they are most needed. In large cities, and populous districts it was impossible that there was not already light enough. He remarked on the motion before us, that he could see no use in having the signatures of the members appended to the address. It could be as well authenticated by an enthusiastic and unanimous vote to accept it.

Mr. Wilkinson modified his motion so as to require the secretary to affix to the address, the names of all those members of the convention, who should not otherwise direct the secretary, and, as modified, the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Williams, of New York, it was resolved that it be recommended to the friends of American industry, in the northern, southern, western and north western states, to convene in the city of Cincinnati, on the 2d day of January next, for the purpose of concentrating and expressing their views on that subject.

Mr. Robbins, of Massachusetts, from the committee on the manufacture of wool, reported that it was impossible, during the session of the convention, to collect and embody in a report, all the information which it was desirable to have, and that the committee asked leave to report to the central committee. The report was accepted.

Messrs. Kennedy of Baltimore, Allen of R. I., H. W. Evans and Thomas Ellicott of Baltimore, and Mr. Merrick of Philadelphia, were, on several motions, added to the central committee.

On motion of Mr. Hemphill, it was ordered, that the central committee depute some person or persons to attend the session of congress in support of the views of the convention in regard to American industry.

The committee on the product and manufacture of leather reported, that they had not been able to collect facts on which to predicate a report satisfactory to themselves or to the convention; and they, therefore, asked permission to report to the central committee. Report accepted.

Mr. Prince, of Albany, rose and said; as our sister states of the extreme south were not represented in this convention, and as he entertained the most exalted opinion of those in whose veins flow the blood of the greatest statesmen and purest patriots of our revolution, he was unwilling that the convention should adjourn without making some provision for their advantage. He would "set them to manufacturing—manufacturing slaves into freemen." But, as their property consisted partly in slaves, it was proper that they should be remunerated for them. We could do nothing better with the surplus of the revenue accruing from duties on imports than to appropriate it to the object of "manufacturing slaves into freemen;"—and to this end he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That congress be requested to appropriate a specific portion of the revenue arising from duties on imports to the purchase of slaves over five and under twelve years of age, for their education, and for setting them on the land of their fathers.

This resolution was received with such marked disapprobation, that, for some minutes, no one could be heard. Mr. Ingersoll, having succeeded in obtaining attention, said, he had no doubt the member moved this in a good spirit; but he assured him it was in vain and more than in vain. It would be impertinent and cruel in us to meddle with this affair, in which we had no interest, and by which we could be exposed to no peril. It was too, a most flagrant outrage on the constitution and on justice to take their own money to buy their slaves. We had ten thousand times better never have met here, than to meet to discuss or countenance such a project as this. He new the southern people, sires and sons, and was attached to many of them by the warmest ties of friendship; and he could assure the member, that his project, so far from bringing a benefit to them, would scatter firebrands along their borders.

[Several gentlemen attempted to speak in opposition to the resolution, but the call for the question became so general and decided, that the chair was about to put it, when]

Mr. Prince withdrew his resolution, protesting that he had not the least intention to imply any censure on the southern people for holding slaves; he did not blame them for the existence of slavery, but those who had introduced it. If there was any objection to the mode by which he had proposed to relieve the south from the evil, he would withdraw the proposition.

The convention then adjourned to meet at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Afternoon session.

General Lynch, of New York, in compliance with instructions from the delegation of the city of New York, begged leave to state, that several citizens of the city of New York were desirous, with the leave of the convention, to defray the expenses attending its sitting here, to the end that the entire fund already collected may be appropriated to printing and other future expenses of the convention, at the discretion of the central committee; and he moved that permission be granted.

After some words from col. Dwight, expressive of the sense of the convention, in regard to the kind treatment they had received from the citizens of New York, gen. Lynd's motion for the permission required, was agreed to.

On motion, it was ordered—

That the thanks of the convention be presented to the New York delegation, and the citizens of New York, for the generous interest taken by them in the objects of the convention.

Mr. Simpson, of New York, from the committee on copper, reported that the short time allowed for obtaining the information was insufficient for that purpose, and that they had appointed a sub-committee to collect facts for a future report; that the whole quantity of copper imported was 800,000 lbs. that there was copper ore in Massachusetts, Maryland, New Jersey, Vermont, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Maine, and that before many years our mines would furnish enough for the whole consumption of the country, and for exportation. The report was accepted.

Mr. Ellicott, from the committee on the currency, made a report in part, which was accepted.

Mr. Cozzens, of Rhode Island, offered a resolution, for recommending to the friends of protecting national industry, by law, to procure an expression of sentiment from their several state legislatures, in favor of the continuance of the same, and that each member of the convention render his aid to this end. The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Carey, from the committee appointed to prepare a schedule of the rates of duties charged on our staples, when imported into certain foreign countries, and the duties on their staples when imported into this country, made a report, which was read and accepted.

The committee on the growth of wool, reported that they had taken measures to enable them to bring before the central committee full information on this subject; and that in their opinion, it is inexpedient at present to alter the tariff in regard to wool in any other way than to prevent the evasion of the law. The report was accepted, and on motion, Messrs. Kryer, of Md. and Johnson, of Md. were added to the committee.

Mr. Dunlop, from the committee on iron and steel, made a report on each branch, which being read,

Mr. McCulloh questioned the correctness of the statement in the report on steel that the materials for furnaces could not be obtained in this country; and he then made some statements on the subject, derived from Mr. Samuel Moore, of Baltimore. Being up, he would also mention that it was proposed in Baltimore that the delegation from that city should set on foot an inquiry into the amount and description of articles made in this city for home consumption and exportation. In Massachusetts a plan had been formed for obtaining similar information in that state. When this information as to the value which our labors added to materials was obtained, it would appear how vastly important they were to the support of our commerce. So far from being hostile to foreign trade, he wished to see this city surpass London in commercial grandeur. He wished to see our imports embrace all the luxuries of life and the raw materials for our manufactures, while our exports received the last touch of human skill. Why do they talk of the hostility of our system to commerce? Does not England command the exchanges of the world, through its water-power and fuel, and the industry and ingenuity of its mechanics?

Mr. Dunlop was under obligations to the gentleman for the interesting facts which he had mentioned. But his memory as to the report on steel, to which he referred, was not correct. The report stated that there was abundance of clay similar to the Stowbridge clay in Lyncoln county, Centre, Clearfield, and in Penn. As the gentleman who preceded him, had been suffered to wander from the question; and as this was the last time he should ever address so many of his fellow citizens, from so many sections of the country, he would allude to some intimations which had been thrown out in the newspapers of this city, in reference to opposition made in the convention, to the acceptance of the report offered by the committee on the memorial to congress. He alluded to a newspaper published in this city, the very title of which, in his part of the country, was unknown. It was edited, he believed, by one Moses—he did not recollect the name—or Manassah, or Morlecai—or some such cabalistic name. It says, that "the eastern delegates had stolen a march on the Pennsylvania delegation." They had stolen no march upon us; but they had stolen our hearts. They had stolen many a march on their enemies, but it was the first time they had ever been accused of stealing a march on their friends. He spoke in the name of his delegation, when he said, that on all the leading principles which had come into discussion in the convention, the gentlemen from the east had cordially, firmly, and most efficiently united in supporting the views and interests of Pennsylvania. The intimation that the committee could not be trusted to frame the memorial, particularly that part relating to iron, was gratuitous and absurd. The interests of Massachusetts, in reference to the duty on iron, had become the same with that of Pennsylvania. In one iron establishment, owned by a single individual in Massachusetts, 3,000 individuals were employed. Their interests were our interests in reference to the protection of iron, salt, hemp, and other articles. He had opposed giving to the committee any written instructions, feeling the utmost confidence in their ability, discretion and fidelity to the cause. The same paper, sir, says that I am no statesman, because I am willing to trust my friends.

The report on iron and steel was accepted.

The committee on the culture of silk and hemp, reported that in consequence of the late day of their appointment, and the difficulty of procuring information, they asked leave to report to the central committee. The report was accepted, and Mr. Prince, of N. York, was added to the committee.

Mr. Crofta, from the committee on hats, made a report which was read and accepted.

Mr. Everett, of Mass. moved a vote of thanks to the New York delegation, for their kindness and liberality to the other delegates composing the convention; and in a few remarks with which he accompanied the motion, adverted with severity, to the attempt made by one of the public papers in this city, to misrepresent his course, and that of the committee on the memorial to congress, in such a manner as to excite jealousy on the part of the Pennsylvania delegation, and of the members from the eastern country.

Mr. Goddard, in seconding the motion, animadverted upon some unpleasant personalities which had been exhibited in the convention; but bore testimony to the general courtesy which had marked the deportment of all the members. The motion was agreed to.

A vote of thanks to the president of the convention, for the ability, impartiality and dignity with which he had administered the duties of the chair, was carried by acclamation.

Col. Dwight expressed it as his opinion that the convention ought this night to adjourn, sine die; all its objects which were now attainable, having been attained. But he made no motion to that effect.

Mr. Ellsworth, of Conn. moved a vote of thanks to the corporation of the city of N. York, for the accommodations which they had furnished to the convention; accompanying the motion with the following remarks:

Mr. President: The citizens of New York through their honorable delegation, have with a liberality, as generous as it was unexpected, offered to pay the expenses of the convention during its sittings. Though strangers, desirous of making compensation, we find ourselves among friends, whose kindness can only be remunerated, by the expression of our grateful acknowledgments. We have enjoyed the convenience of this spacious hall and the rooms adjoining, by the kindness of the honorable corporation of the city of New York—we cannot do less, and are not allowed to do more, than to tender them the assurance of the gratitude we feel for the favor they have conferred on us. Permit me therefore, Mr. President, to offer this resolution, which I trust will meet the entire approbation of this convention.

The motion was agreed to.

The convention then adjourned to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Tuesday morning, Nov. 1.

The convention met at 10 o'clock. A communication from a meeting in the county of Kanawha, Western Virginia, was read; also a communication from the Agricultural and Manufacturing society of Washington county, Pennsylvania.

Mr. Schenck, from the committee to inquire into any evasion of the revenue laws, reported in part, which was read. The report states that difficulties had arisen in obtaining direct evidence of the frauds, but notices many methods resorted to for fraudulent purposes, and requesting further time to report in full.

Mr. Core observed, that he had received a letter from Mr. Ingham, late secretary of the treasury, stating that the treasury was defrauded by means of the rate of exchange on England.

Mr. Ellsworth went into a statement of facts in relation to frauds practised in the importation of woolen goods, by false swearing at the custom house. The auction system was also spoken of by Mr. E. as a powerful engine by which such frauds were disguised and shielded from detection. The auction system forced into this country the refuse stocks of every market in the world. The collector of this port has hitherto been unable to perform his duty, on account of a public sentiment against scrutiny; but within the last six months a more correct feeling had prevailed, and frauds had been discovered within that, the duty on which would amount to very nearly eight thousand dollars. He spoke of a case tried in Philadelphia, in which the deposition of a clerk in England had influenced the opinion of the jury. Enough of such dispositions, he said, might be obtained in England, to load a cart, for expense a-piece. An old importer told Mr. E., that on a visit to England, he was urged by the manufacturers to buy goods worth nine and ten shillings per yard, and have them invoiced at 6s 8d. He expressed surprise at the offer; but the manufacturers said, they were doing it for his neighbors every day. This individual had declared, that if this system went on much longer, he must decline business.

Mr. Ellsworth concluded his remarks by presenting to the convention, for the acceptance of each member, a pamphlet containing some flagrant cases of violation of the revenue laws in the importation of woollens.

After further debate, the report and resolution were accepted.

A report by Mr. Brice, chairman of the delegation from Kanawha, in Virginia, on the manufacture of salt, was presented and referred to the central committee.

Mr. Crolius made a report on cabinet wares, which was read and accepted.

Mr. Sayre, of New York offered a resolution, which was unanimously adopted, that before this convention finally adjourn, the president be requested to invite some clergyman to return thanks to Almighty God for his bounties to this land, and to implore the continuation thereof.

Mr. Roberts, of Pa. presented a resolution authorizing the central committee to call a meeting of the friends of the American System in the year 1832, if they deem it expedient, at such time and place as they may see fit. Agreed to.

Mr. Sibley, of Mass. after having made some preliminary remarks, in which he stated that attempts had been made to sow discord among the members of various sections, and of various party sentiments, offered a preamble and resolution setting forth that the convention met with one object, and acted with one object; and that they viewed with contempt the efforts to produce discord. This resolution was seconded and supported by Mr. Everett, and adopted.

It was moved that the thanks of the convention be presented to MATHEW CAREY, esq. for his early, zealous and able efforts to create, diversity, and promote objects of American industry.

Col. Dwight said this was the best reward he could receive for his labors; and it was the only reward he sought. He believed it would be awarded to him spontaneously.

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

On motion of Mr. Paine it was resolved, that the thanks of the convention be voted to HEBERTIAN NILES, esq. for his long, able and invincible efforts in the cause of his country, especially in developing its internal resources.

Mr. Niles rose and said, as he was not accustomed to express his ideas in speaking, he would say, after returning his acknowledgments to the convention, for the honor which they bestowed on him, that he should endeavor to merit it.

After some other similar matters, the president announced that the hour of adjournment had now arrived, and

Mr. Crowninshield having made the motion for adjournment, the president before putting the motion addressed the convention as follows:

Gentlemen—The moment of our separation being at hand, I feel myself called upon to say something to you; but, though accustomed to public speaking, I, on this occasion, feel myself at a loss for modes of expressing my feelings. I shall ever cherish the memory of my meeting with you, as one of the happiest circumstances of my life. If, on other occasions, in other stations, I shall be able to make use of the information I have borrowed from you I shall be truly happy; but, I will add that I shall never, I hope, use it to overthrow the interests or happiness of any section of the union. I received the honor bestowed on me in my appointment to preside over your deliberations with unforgotten diffidence and, in the administration of the office, I am sensible that I should have failed, had I not received from you aid and support, for which I tender you my hearty acknowledgments. Wishing to each one of you a safe return to your ha-miles, I bid you farewell. God bless you.

The rev. Mr. Schroeder made a appropriate and impressive prayer, and the convention adjourned pace du meeting with all the wharves, and intersecting all the principal streets which extend northwardly and southwardly, as far down as the public property south of Jones's falls, at which place there have been conveyed to the company, by the corporation of Baltimore, two squares of ground, favorably situated for the convenient and economical transaction of an extensive commerce. An uninterrupted communication will thus, within a few weeks, be opened along the whole extent of the road, between the port of Baltimore, the Potomac river at the Point of Rocks, and the city of Frederick.

Upon this line a double set of tracks is nearly completed over a distance of twenty-seven miles; and a single set of tracks is also so nearly finished over the remaining forty-six miles, as to leave no doubt of its early completion. The requisite arrangements have likewise been made to secure the construction of the second track, along the whole line, to the Potomac river, during the ensuing spring.

When the work shall have been finished to the Point of Rocks, the operations of the company, which have heretofore been interdicted beyond that place, by the injunction issued at the suit of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, must necessarily be suspended, unless a decision of the question of right should, in the mean time take place, or the canal company agree to compromise the dispute. The delay which this litigation has already occasioned, is the more to be regretted, as there is no reason whatever to doubt, but that if a spirit of accommodation existed on the part of the canal company, sufficient room would be found, for both works along the ground in dispute, even should that company still adhere to the idea of extending the work to Cumberland—indeed, so far as the examinations have been made by the engineers of the two companies, it is fully ascertained that there is ample space for both the rail road and the canal at a very inconsiderable additional expense.

The very great improvements which, within a few years past, have been made in the construction of rail roads, and in the machinery employed upon them, have given to this system of transportation, so decided an advantage over all the other artificial means of intercommunication heretofore attempted, as to have inspired an almost universal confidence in it, both in our own country and in Europe. A railway is now constructing between New York and Philadelphia, another across the peninsula between the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, to connect with the steam boat travelling between Baltimore and Philadelphia; these works are fast approaching towards completion; and will, when finished, ensure an easy and rapid communication between those three great commercial emporiums, reciprocally beneficial to them all, and vastly increasing the travel and intercourse between them. By constructing a railway from Baltimore to Washington, this line of communication would be extended from New York to the capital of the United States.

Impressed with the importance of accomplishing this last object, in which the convenience of the whole community is so deeply interested, and believing that the road, if judiciously located and constructed, would afford a fair remuneration to the stockholders, the board have directed that during the present season the necessary examinations and surveys should be made for the purpose of ascertaining the facilities which the intermediate country offers for a rail road, and the approximate expense of its construction. In this duty the chief engineer of the company with an efficient force has for some time been engaged.

The legislature of Maryland, during the last session, passed an act which, among other provisions, authorised the Baltimore and Washington turnpike road company to subscribe $100,000 to the stock of the proposed road to Washington, and reserving to the state the right to subscribe for five-eighths of the cost of the road from its intersection with the Baltimore and Ohio rail road to the line of the District of Columbia, amounting perhaps to a moiety of the whole proposed expenditure.

The directors being desirous of procuring their steam machinery, as far as practicable, of American workmanship, and anxious to direct the mechanical genius of this country to its further improvement, offered a premium for the best constructed locomotive engine, which should be placed upon the road on or before the 1st of June 1831, limiting the performance to a certain rate of speed and power of traction. Only one engine has yet been offered, which on trial, appeared to be adapted to the structure of our road, this engine it is believed, taking into consideration its weight, is, in point of efficiency nearly if not quite equal to any locomotive yet tried.

From the experiments which the board have been enabled to make with it, they have fully ascertained that steam power may be used, on the Baltimore and Ohio road, at a rate of speed and economy of cost, which will fully realise the most sanguine anticipations of the company; arrangements are accordingly now in train to procure a sufficient number of locomotive engines of a weight and construction suitable for the travel and transportation on the road. These it is expected will be in readiness by the time the two sets of tracks shall be completed to the Potomac river, and until then, the transportation on the western divisions of the road will be effected by horse power.

The graduation of the inclined planes at Parr ridge is nearly finished, and they will very soon be in readiness to receive the rails. It is contemplated to place the necessary stationary engines with their appropriate fixtures there, as early as possible; and in the mean time horse power will be employed in passing them.

Considerable progress has been made in the improvements at several of the depots of the company, by the construction of substantial and appropriate buildings, and other requisite accommodations, adapted to the commerce of the road; and from the warehouses of the company upon Camden street, a rail-way will be laid up that street for the convenience of the return trade. These arrangements will, it is believed, secure to the public, in the use of the road, every necessary facility and convenience.

As it was early foreseen that a very considerable commerce would be attracted to the city of Frederick, when the road should be completed to that place, the interests, both of the public and of this company required, that a sufficient extent of ground should be procured, and the improvements necessary for the operations of the company erected there. The municipal authorities of that city with a liberality not less honorable to themselves than gratifying to this board, generously offered to convey to this company, free of cost, six acres of land, immediately adjoining to that city for a depot: several of the citizens of Frederick also offered to obtain, without any charge to this company, the right of way for the lateral rail leading from the main stem to this depot—these valuable grants were accepted by the board, and the necessary conveyances have been duly executed.

The depot at Frederick is so situated as to secure from it, an easy communication by lateral railways into all parts of that city; the company will therefore be enabled to receive produce or deliver freight upon any street where the inhabitants may extend the railway, and open suitable warehouses for the accommodation of the trade.

The system organized for the regulation of the business of the company, and for the government of its agents, has, in its operation been found to be efficient and practicable, clearly defining the duties of the several officers and maintaining a strict responsibility in every department. It is also with sincere satisfaction, the board can inform the stockholders that notwithstanding the complicated operations of the company, requiring numerous agents, whose duties rendered it necessary they should be dispersed over an extensive district of country, the utmost harmony and fidelity, with the exception of a single instance referred to in the accompanying documents, have pervaded all the departments; and a most laudable disposition has every where been manifested by the officers and agents employed, zealously to co-operate in the advancement of the work, and in reciprocally giving to each other a cordial and efficient aid and support in the discharge of their several duties. This disposition has greatly facilitated the operations of the company, and very much abated the labors of the board.

Upon reference to the report of the chief engineer of the company, and to the reports of the superintendent of graduation and masonry, and of the superintendent of construction, which are hereto annexed, the stockholders will find a minute and circumstantial exhibit of all the operations of the company, in relation to the location and construction of the road, subsequent to the time of the last annual report, down to this date, as well as of several highly valuable improvements which have, within the same period, been made in the machinery and moving power employed upon it. By these reports it appears that the actual cost and graduation and masonry upon the 71 miles between Baltimore and the Point of Rocks, including the lateral road to Frederick, will not exceed $1,101,615 or $15,500 per mile;* and that the cost of a double set of tracks upon the main stem of the road, and of a single set on the lateral road to Frederick will not exceed $805,238 or $11,623, per mile of road with a double set of tracks, thus making the total cost of graduating the entire line of these portions of the road and of laying the rails upon them $1,906,853 or $27,123 per mile. About one third of this line will be laid with stone rails, and the remaining two-thirds with wood.

In this charge is included the heavy expenditures incurred on the first division of the road. According to the report of the superintendent of graduation and masonry, heretofore referred to, it appears that the graduation and masonry of the 2d, 3d, 4th and 5th divisions of the road, embracing the entire line between Ellicott's mills and the Potomac river, and extending over a distance of 54½ miles, will cost $465,443 or $8,540 per mile: if to this be added $11,623, the average cost of laying a double set of tracks, on the entire line between Baltimore and the Point of Rocks, the actual cost of graduation, masonry and laying a double track of rails on the road between Ellicott's mills and the Potomac, will be $30,168 per mile, and this district, it is believed, may be assumed as affording a fair specimen of the labor and expense which will be incurred on the remaining line of the road from the Point of Rocks to the coal mines in Alleghany county.

The entire line of the road, from the depot of the company, near the intersection of Pratt street and the Washington road, at Baltimore, to the Point of Rocks is 67½ miles, to which is to be added for the distance thence to the eastern termination of the railway at the city block 2 miles, and for the branch road to Frederick 5½ miles, making the whole distance finished and under construction 73 miles. The excavation, embankment and masonry upon nearly 46½ miles of which have been completed within the last twelve months; and upon which there has also been laid 45½ miles of single tracks of rails within the same time.

In deciding upon the materials of which the rails should be formed, the board have continued to pursue the determination adopted soon after the commencement of the undertaking, which was in all cases where stone rails could be procured, to use them, and in those districts where stone of a suitable kind could not be obtained to use wood of the best and most durable quality the country afforded. Throughout the district intermediate to the Patapsco and Potomac at the Point of Rocks, no stone of a quality suitable for rails has been discovered, and consequently upon this district wooden rails have, of necessity, been substituted. For the same reason a wooden viaduct, supported by substantial stone piers and abutments, has been constructed across the Monocacy river.

Although the first track on the 3d division of the road was completed several months since, yet as both tracks on this section will be of stone, and the second one has not yet been finished, it was found that the running of passenger cars upon this part of the road greatly interrupted the work, and would considerably retard its completion; the general travelling has, therefore, not been extended beyond the first division of the road, a distance of 13 miles.

Upon reference to the report of the superintendent of transportation, hereto annexed, it will be seen that 81,905 passengers have passed on this division since the first of January last, and that within the same period 5,931 tons have been transported upon it, yielding an income of $51,405 24 and involving an expenditure of $10,994 87.

With the foregoing results before them, the board have no hesitation in assuring the stockholders of their entire confidence, that when the legal obstructions, which now arrest the progress of the work, shall have been removed, the remaining distance of the road, between the Point of Rocks and Cumberland may be completed, with a double set of tracks, within three years; and they are fully confirmed in the opinions heretofore expressed, "that a rail road upon the plan contemplated by the citizens of Baltimore, between that city and the Ohio river, is easily practicable—that its powers and facilities will be found to be equal to all the anticipations that were formed of its capabilities, when the work was first commenced, and that the most sanguine calculations of its importance, and utility, whether the object be regarded with reference to its national and local advantages, or its profits to the stockholders, will be realized."

PHILIP E. THOMAS, president.

October 1, 1831.

Second annual report of the chief engineer of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road.

Engineer's office, Baltimore and Ohio rail road, Baltimore, October 1, 1831.

To PHILIP E. THOMAS,
President of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road co.

In accordance with the regulations of the company, I now present my second annual report, detailing the proceedings of this department for the last twelve months, and embracing such operations as will claim attention within the next year.

Every effort has been made to realize the expectations which were formed, and the assurances that were given, that the road would be opened for travelling both to the Point of Rocks on the Potomac river, and to the city of Frederick within the year 1831; and notwithstanding the generally unfavorable state of the season during the last autumn and the unusual severity of the winter, the work has been prosecuted with such activity that fully as much has been accomplished as was expected; leaving no reason to doubt but that the road will be opened to those places with a double set of tracks on the first and second divisions, and with a single set of tracks on the other portions, within the time anticipated.

The details of the proceedings of the company since the last report, will be stated under the following heads:

1. The graduation and masonry.
2. The construction of the railway.
3. The location of the route.
4. The machinery and moving power.

And I shall also embrace the subject of the introduction of the railway into the improved parts of the city of Baltimore, as well as that of the proposed railway to Washington.

The graduation and masonry.

Previous to the last annual report, the graduation and masonry had been completed upon the city division and

*Upon reference to the annexed report of the superintendent of graduation and masonry, a detailed statement of the separate cost for graduation and masonry upon the several divisions of the road, intermediate to the city of Baltimore and Potomac river, as well as of the lateral road to Frederick, will be found.

By this report, it appears that the graduation and masonry upon the first division of the road, embracing 13 miles, and extending from the city of Baltimore to Ellicott's mills, has cost $46,354 56 per mile, whilst the graduation and masonry upon the other four divisions, embracing 54½ miles, and extending from Ellicott's mills to the Potomac, will cost only $8,532 16 per mile.

That the graduation of 12½ miles of the road near to Baltimore has cost as much as the graduation of the remaining 54½ miles will cost.

That the masonry on 8½ miles of the road near to Baltimore, has cost as much as the masonry on the remaining 53½ miles will cost.

And that the graduation and masonry together, has cost on the first 11 miles of the road $33,000 more than it will cost on the remaining 56½ miles.

upon the first division to Elliott's mills, a distance of thirteen miles; and likewise, with the exception of the great rock excavation at Elliott's mills, upon the second division, to the forks of Patapsco.

Fifteen miles of the third division, in continuation from the second division, had also been placed under contract; so recently however, that very little progress had been made upon it.

Since the last annual report, the excavation of the Tarppean rock at Elliott's mills, and the graduation and masonry on the fifteen miles of the third division, completing a distance of forty miles from Baltimore, have been finished.

During the last autumn and winter, a distance of about sixteen miles, reaching to the Point of Rocks on the Potomac, and comprising about five miles of the fourth division, along the ravine of Bush creek from Hams' mill to the Monocacy river, together with the whole of the fifth division from thence to the Point of Rocks, as also the viaduct across the Monocacy, were placed under contract.

The graduation and masonry on the five miles along Bush creek, and upon a part of the eleven miles of the first division were completed during the early part of the present year, and the entire residue, including the viaduct, will soon be finished.

In the month of June last, the graduation and masonry of the residue of the line between Baltimore and the Point of Rocks, comprising a distance of twelve miles, including the inclined planes across Parr's ridge, were contracted for. The dividing point of the third and fourth divisions is on the top of that ridge; and of the twelve miles just mentioned, about 3½ miles are on the third, and 9½ miles on the fourth division.

About the same time the work upon the lateral road to Frederick, a distance of 3½ miles from the main stem at the Monocacy, was likewise placed under contract.

The work upon these portions of the line has been prosecuted with uncommon vigor, and with a view to its being prepared for the reception of the railway in time for the attainment of the object herein before mentioned.

The graduation, masonry, and bridging, being under the superintendence of Casper W. Wever, the report which that vigilant officer is expected to make to the board, will complete the necessary details in relation to this branch of the service.

The construction of the railway.

In the early part of the last year, a double track of railway was finished from Baltimore to a point near the Patapsco, and a single track from thence to Elliott's mills was also completed. Contracts had also, in August 1830, been made for laying down the residue of the second track to Elliott's mills, including about 6½ miles, and likewise for laying the first track on the second division from Elliott's mills to the forks of Patapsco; in length twelve miles.

These tracks have been completed in a substantial manner with granite sills, except for short distances on high embankments, where wood was preferred.

It was expected that the two tracks to Elliott's mills and the first track to the forks of Patapsco would be completed during the autumn of 1830; but the length of time required to procure the sills from the existing quarries, and to construct the track in so substantial a manner, rendered this impracticable. The consequence has been, that the completion to Elliott's mills took place in the winter, whilst the 12 miles of track above the mills were not finished until the middle of June last.

A contract has also been made for laying down the second track of the second division, with granite sills. This work has been judiciously prosecuted by Enoch Sweat, who had heretofore evinced his ability and zeal as a contractor in the service of this company. Of the 12 miles of tracks embraced in this contract, only 1½ miles remain to be laid; and the entire double track to the forks of Patapsco, 25 miles from Baltimore, will probably be completed by the 1st of November next.

The first track to be laid on 15 miles of the third division was contracted for in the last autumn; but owing to circumstances which will be explained in the documents accompanying the report of the superintendent of construction, a disappointment has been experienced in this part of the work. From the measures which have been adopted however, and which will be pursued with regard to the work on this division, it is believed, that the first track will be completed by the 1st of November next. Of this track 5½ miles will be laid with granite sills, and the residue with wood. Materials are in preparation for a second track on this division.

Contracts have also been made for laying the first track on the remainder of the third, and on the whole of the fourth and fifth divisions, to the Point of Rocks, and likewise upon the lateral road to Frederick; together with the second track upon a part of the distance embracing Parr's ridge; and it is expected that these contracts will be completed by the close of the year 1831.

From the circumstance, that stone suitable for sills, had not been found contiguous to the upper part of the third division, nor upon the fourth and fifth divisions, including the lateral road to Frederick, it became necessary to lay the first track through these distances, with wood instead of stone; and from the necessity there will be for having the use of a second track, previous to the time when it could be finished with stone to be brought from a great distance, by means of a conveyance on a single track, which would at the same time be much, if not fully, occupied with the public traffic and intercourse, it is worthy of consideration whether it will not be for the interest of the company and the public, that the second track on part of the third, and on the whole of the fourth and fifth divisions, should not likewise be laid with wood.

The reason for this step will be much strengthened from the consideration, that the facts developed on the first and second divisions indicate, that embankments should be allowed a period of from two to three years at least, to settle, previous to receiving a railway constructed of stone sills.

In this way, the road would come into profitable use at an earlier period, and it is believed that the advantage to accrue from this circumstance would more than compensate for any loss that would be consequent on the decay of the wood.

When the wood shall decay, the track can be repaired of stone sills, or any other method that shall have been approved.

About 40 miles of single track will have been laid with stone sills, by which the relative advantages between their use and that of wood in the formation of the railway, will be tested, as regards the first cost, durability, repairs, and facility to the motive power.

Since the last annual report, a contract has been made with John McCartney for the extension of a single track of stone and iron railway along Pratt street within the improved parts of the city. This enterprising contractor is executing the work in a very satisfactory manner, and already the track has been laid to the basin.

During the present season there have been erected a permanent carriage house, weigh house, &c. on the ground conveyed to the company by James Carroll, esq. A depot has also been established at Elliott's mills, on which there has been erected a permanent warehouse. There has likewise been a depot established at the city of Frederick as well as within the city of Baltimore, near the basin, upon the latter of which a suitable house is erecting.

For a more full account in relation to the construction of the railway, depots, &c. I refer to the report of Jacob Small, superintendent of construction, hereto annexed, marked A, and to the documents accompanying the same, in which will be found a lucid narrative and statement by his principal assistant, James P. Stabler.

Location of the route.

In accordance with a resolution of the board, the requisite steps have been taken to revise the location of the residue of the third and the whole of the fourth and fifth divisions to the Point of Rocks, and also to locate the lateral road to Frederick city.

For this purpose it was arranged that Casper W. Wever, superintendent of graduation and masonry who had just closed the field duties requisite for the revision of the location upon the greater part of the third division, should continue his labors in this service. And in order that due time might be allowed for the consideration of questions relating to the system of inclined planes across Parr's ridge, a random line of survey and levels was by him extended across the ridge and down Bush creek to a point beyond any supposed influence to arise from the system of planes which might eventually be adopted in passing that ridge.

From this point near Ijams' mill, to the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth division, on the west bank of the Monocacy river, and including a distance of about five miles, the line was duly revised and staked out for contract by that officer, according to the principles which I approve.

This part of the line occupies the most narrow and crooked part of the ravine of Bush creek and extends to the junction of that stream with the Monocacy. It required the exercise of no ordinary skill and judgment to lay the line and in such manner as to give space for the passage of the stream on the one hand, and so as not to encounter, to an improper extent, the precipitous and rocky projections of the hill, on the other; and at the same time to keep the curvatures sufficiently gentle and regular.

The location has been made so as not to have the radius of curvature less than 440 feet. One point of hill is passed with a few hundred feet having this radius, whilst in every other part, the radius of curvature is greater than 500 feet.

In the experimental lines which had been previously run, curves of radii less than 440 feet had been here employed. The grades were also reduced so as not to exceed a descent towards the Monocacy at the rate of 24 feet per mile in any part.

The superintendent also continued the location on the fifth division from its commencement to Ballinger's creek, a distance of about $\frac{1}{2}$ miles. In addition to which he also attended to the necessary surveying and levelling required for the location and staking out for contract the route of the lateral road connecting the main line at the west bank of the Monocacy, with the city of Frederick.

The field notes and levels of these several parts, and the maps and profiles of the route of the main line from Ijams' mill to Ballinger's creek, have been reported and are on file in this department.

The assistant engineers, Henry J. Ranney and Ralph S. Smith, who had aided in the field duties of the revision of the third division, and George T. Dunbar, John W. Smith, and Benjamin A. Alderson who had assisted in the calculations, were detailed to continue their services under C. W. Wever in the revision of the main line.

The revision of the line from Ijams' mill to Ballinger's creek, as before mentioned, having been concluded, and having also just been placed under contract for the graduation and masonry, it was no longer convenient, on account of the press of business appertaining to his office, for the superintendent to continue the field operations upon the location of the main line after the 30th of November.

I therefore resumed this duty personally, and completed the location and staking out for contract the residue of the fifth division from Ballinger's creek to the Potomac river at "the Point of Rocks," a distance of about $\frac{3}{4}$ miles, in which service I was aided by the assistants already named, and by Benjamin H. Latrobe, who had recently been employed as an assistant in superintending the laying of the railway on the second division.

The line throughout the fifth division passes over a country the surface of which is undulating; nevertheless the route is remarkably direct; and as regards curvature, it is almost equivalent to a straight line. There is no curvature in eleven miles, the extent of this division, of less radius than 1,146 feet, and only about one-fourth of a mile having a less radius than 1,310 feet, whilst the entire length of the straight parts is eight miles. The maximum grade upon this division and upon the lateral road is 30 feet per mile, and will therefore be within the advantageous range of the action of locomotive steam engines.

The maps and profiles have been executed, and are, together with the notes of the survey and levels of the located line from Ballinger's creek to the Point of Rocks on file in this office.

These surveys were completed on the 27th of December last, the time having been considerably extended in consequence of the shortness of the days and the inclemency of the season.

During the last spring the necessary examinations, surveys, and levels were made to effect the final location of the remaining part of the line between Baltimore and the Point of Rocks, to wit, the part including the crossing of Parr's ridge, in length about 12 miles. The staking out for contract of this part of the line was completed on the 6th of June last. The maps and profiles have been executed, and are, with the notes and calculations, deposited in this office.

In making this part of the location I was assisted by the gentlemen already mentioned, with the exception of B. H. Latrobe, who had been detailed to run and stake out the centre line and curvatures of the graduated surface of the third, and parts of the fourth and fifth divisions, preparatory to the laying of the railway.

For a description of this part of the line, and the principles which governed in its location, reference is made to my report dated the 6th of June last, and which is herewith annexed, marked B.

The document just referred to contains statements of the sections and quantities of excavation and embankment as calculated at the time of making the location, to be necessary to effect the graduation.

Similar statements for the residue of the fourth division, for the fifth division, and for the lateral road to Frederick, are contained in the tabular exhibit marked C, annexed.

I also annex a tabular statement, marked D, prepared by B. H. Latrobe, and containing the distances, grades, and radii of the curvatures on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road from the depot first established on Pratt street, to the Point of Rocks, and to the city of Frederick.

I herewith further present a map and profile of the final location of the line to the extent just mentioned, as drawn by Joseph Shriver, who, it is proper to say, also assisted B. H. Latrobe in tracing the centre line on the graduated surface of the third division, to guide in the laying of the railway.

Having been charged with the investigation of the eligibility of introducing the railway into the improved parts of the city of Baltimore, that subject was attended to, and received the consideration due to its importance. A copy of my report upon this subject dated the 5th of February last, accompanies this report, and is marked E.

Immediately on my completion of the location of the fifth division to the Point of Rocks, I was instructed to make a reconnaissance of the country lying between the city of Baltimore and the city of Washington, with a view to ascertain and report upon the apparent facilities afforded for the location and construction of a railway that should connect Baltimore with the seat of the general government.

This duty was performed to the extent which the inclemency of the winter, at the time, permitted; and a report thereon was made on the 22d of January.

In making this reconnaissance, I was assisted by B. H. Latrobe; and was also aided by the facts developed in the survey of a route for a canal, made for the United States, by Dr. Wm. Howard. And I take this occasion to acknowledge myself indebted to that gentleman and also to capt. Wm. Gibbs McNeill, and to col. J. Abert of the U. S. topographical bureau for a view of the maps and profiles of that survey.

After the location across Parr's ridge was completed, I was directed to take the necessary steps, without loss of time, towards effecting the location of the route of the proposed railway to Washington.

Two parties were accordingly organised, the one under the immediate direction of Henry J. Ranney, and consisting of Ralph S. Smith, leveller; John W. Smith, surveyor; Benjamin A. Alderson, draftsman; and John Small, jr. and Charles G. Hanson, calculators; and the other under the immediate direction of B. H. Latrobe, composed of Albert M. Lea, leveller; George T. Dunbar, surveyor; Oliver C. Morris, draftsman; and Henry H. Krebs and William K. Coulter, calculators.

These officers commenced the preliminary surveys and levels on the 15th and 18th days of July last, respectively, and continued their operations with due diligence until about the 1st of September, when, from the unhealthiness of the season and of the country bordering on the Patuxent, several of them became seriously ill of bilious fever; and it was therefore necessary to suspend the field operations until a more healthy season should return. These operations, it is hoped, may soon be resumed; and they will be unremittently prosecuted until the location, together with the calculations, maps, and profiles, shall be completed.

I had expected to have personally superintended and directed all the preliminary surveys which would be required previous to the location of the Washington road, but other duties claiming my attention, it became necessary that these surveys should be made under written instructions that would embrace, in a great degree, their extent, together with the manner, method, and principles, upon which they should be conducted.

In elucidation of this subject there is hereto annexed a copy of these instructions, dated the 6th of July last, marked F, to which is likewise necessarily attached a copy of my report of the 22nd January, heretofore mentioned.

The machinery and moving power.

Advances have been made since the last report towards the perfecting of the turn-outs, and likewise of those parts of the cars subject to friction, wear and fracture.

The turn-outs have been modified so as to adapt them more perfectly to the object. A single switch is used, the position of which is in the rail across which the turn-out is directed. The pressure of the inner side of the flange against the switch when thrown open, together with the greater circumference of the opposite wheel rolling with the flange on the cast iron plate, effectually guides the car in the direction of the turn-out, and with but little additional friction.

At first, it was thought to be necessary to lessen the breadth of the track at the turn-outs in consequence of the great play which had been given to the flanges on all the other parts of the road, to wit, $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches; experience, however, has brought us to adapt the same breadth of track at the turn-outs as in other parts of the way, namely 4 feet 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches between the iron rails; and an entire uniformity of breadth is now preserved throughout.

It has been found necessary to give some additional strength to the wheels and axles, to preserve the former from fracture, and the latter from flexure. The diameter of the axle has been increased from 2 3-4ths to 2 7-8ths inches, and the weight of the wheel from 175 lb. to 205 lb. The diameter of the wheel continues to be 30 inches, whilst the breadth and thickness of the rim and of the spokes have been somewhat enlarged.

The cylindrical and conical form of the face of the wheel remains as at the first, excepting that the rise of the conical part has been changed from a ratio of 1 to 6, to that of 1 to 5; whilst the breadth of this part, which was one inch, has been increased 3-16ths of an inch. The rise next to the flange is therefore now $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch instead of 1-6 as formerly.

This change was induced from a conviction that the motion of the cars would, in general, be rendered steadier, and with considerable velocities, easier in the extreme curvatures. It was also believed that the effects of chilling would be greater, whilst the cone would be more durable; at the same time, the experiments on friction justified the conclusion that no lateral thrust would result from this increase.

Experience so far, appears to confirm all these expectations; and it is believed, that a decided improvement has thus been effected.

The cone now used, will answer for three feet wheels upon curvatures of road of 400 feet radius, and hence, wheels of that diameter can be employed for the use of the locomotive engines.

In the use of the Winans' car, it was found that greater strength, and hardness of texture, in the friction wheel, were requisite, than was at first apprehended. Greater strength to withstand shocks, and hardness to preserve from the attrition and wearing at the periphery bearing upon the end of the axle. It is believed that these defects have been remedied to a great extent, and so as to secure the practical success of this improved car. Improvements in the box containing the friction wheel and the oil, have also been effected.

It is evident, that the durability of the road and of cars, and especially of the wheels, would be promoted by the use of springs interposed between the load and the running gear. This precaution would also increase the efficiency of the moving power.

The concussion upon the rails, caused by the undulatory action of a rigid frame, bearing a heavy load, are very considerable, and they are greatly augmented by an increase in the rapidity of the movement.

From unavoidable deviations of the plane of the surface of the rails from that of the bearings of the car, the pressure of the weight frequently becomes transferred to three and even to only two of the four wheels, and this transfer of pressure and consequent concussion, is continually varying upon the wheels diagonally across the carriage.

The employment of springs would however, not only greatly tend to equalize the pressure under these varying circumstances, upon all the wheels; but would likewise greatly lessen the concussion and its effects.

It has been found absolutely necessary to the comfort of passengers, that carriages used for their conveyance, should be mounted upon springs, or upon some equivalent elastic fixture. Now the jars and concussions that would destroy the comfort of the passenger, become increased with a load of stone, minerals, or of agricultural products, or with any other loading having a less elasticity than persons, and although the articles of traffic may not be damaged, yet, the effects upon the carriage and road will be injurious.

The chief disadvantage to be apprehended from springs, is their cost, but should this be more than returned in the increased durability of the cars the investment would be profitable.

Under these considerations, it is recommended that a number of burden cars shall be furnished with springs in order to test their advantageous use in such cars.

From experiments which have been made on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, the traction with the use of the Winans' car upon a level, straight road, was found to be the 1-45th; and making a reasonable allowance for unavoidable defects, it is believed, that in practice, the traction will be the 1-400 of the weight of the car and load.

It was mentioned in the last report, that two kinds of cars were used upon this road, and that it was intended each should receive its utmost improvement.

This subject has continued to claim attention, and will be pursued until a fair comparison can be made of the relative merits of each.

The other car works with an outside bearing and chilled boxes, and is more simple and cheap in its structure. The traction with this car, according to the experiments, was the 1-25th, which allowing for defects, may probably be increased to the 1-240th of the weight of the car and its full load.

The diameter of the end of the axle subject to friction, is the same in each of these two kinds of cars, to wit: two inches; and it is probable that a less diameter than this, would not answer in the Winans' car. The circumstances attending the wear of the parts in the chilled box car are, however, different from those of the other, and there is reason to believe, that a less diameter than at present, may be used. It is probable that a diameter of $1\frac{1}{2}$, or even of 1 5-8 inches, might be sufficient; and it so, the traction would at once be reduced from the 1-240th to the 1-295th, which would produce a gain in the effective power equal to about 23 per cent.

Experiments were also made to ascertain the resistance occasioned by a curvature in the road of a radius of 400 feet, and it was found when the Winans' car was used, to be equivalent to that which would arise on the straight parts of the road, from an ascent of 1 in 14.18, equal to 3.72 feet per mile; and of 1 in 356, or 14.83 feet per mile, when the other car was employed.

In order to test the practicability of turning the corners of streets in the improved parts of the city, with a track of railway, experiments have likewise been made to ascertain the facility of turning a right angle in a given space, by means of the flanges of two of the wheels rolling upon the longer rail, the curved part of the track being one-fourth part of the circumference of the circle.

It was found that a radius of 60 feet, which is very little more than a calculation upon the depth of the flange would give, was the most expedient length for this object; and that the passing of a car through the curve was attended with the least friction when the wheels which rolled upon their flanges, were guided in their proper direction, by means of the flanges being made to run in a groove in the rail, whilst the shorter rail remained of the usual form.

A turn-out and curve upon this principle has been laid down at Ellicott's mills, to communicate with a viaduct which the enterprising proprietors of the extensive merchant flour mills there, have constructed across the Patuxent. To pass through this curve requires a traction of 1.49 for the Winans' car, and of 1.45 for the present chilled box car.

It is proper to remark that the flanges of all the wheels used, are chilled, and that it is necessary that the grooved rail should also be chilled, to be durable.

In making these experiments, as well as in the arrangement of the machinery, I have been aided by my assistants John Elgar and Ross Winans. The latter gentleman is now engaged in planning the machinery and fixtures for the inclined planes.

Recently a chilled box car has been constructed in such a manner as to permit the axles to vibrate. This arrangement is quite simple, and is effected by permitting the box to move backward and forward through a small arch. In this way the motion of the wheels is more free, and the axles may conform more to the direction of the radius of curvature of the road, giving greater effect to the cone, so that the resistance in curvatures, and in passing through turn-outs, will be much reduced. This car works well, and the method bids fair to be a valuable improvement.

Full effect should be given to this plan, and at the same time it should be ascertained whether both ends of the axle should be allowed to vibrate, or only one of them.

Although this modification of the chilled box car with outside bearings, may ultimately enhance its value, and bring it more nearly into competition with the Winans' car as respects the amount of traction required, yet, further experience is necessary before their relative merits in all respects, and under all circumstances, can be ascertained.

It is, however, gratifying to know, that whilst our endeavour still to improve them, implies some degree of imperfection, the present state of either of these cars is in advance of that which would be necessary to ensure the success of railways.

For the report of John Elgar, assistant of machinery, see paper marked G. annexed.

In pursuance of the public call upon American genius, made by the directors, three locomotive steam engines were produced upon the rail road, one only of which has been made to answer any good purpose. This engine was built at York, Pennsylvania, by Phineas Davis, and after undergoing certain modifications, was found capable of conveying 15 tons 15 miles per hour, on a level. It has been employed on that part of the railway between Baltimore and Ellicott's mills, and generally has performed the trip out to the mills in an hour, with four cars, being a gross weight of about 14 tons. About 5 miles of the road ascends at an average rate of 17 feet per mile.

The engine is mounted on wheels made for the common cars of 30 inches diameter, and the velocity is attained by means of gearing with a spur wheel and pinion upon one of the axles. The axles work in friction wheels, similar to those of the Winans' car. The curvatures are traversed with facility by this engine. Its greatest velocity for a short time, on the straight parts of the road, has been at the rate of 30 miles per hour, whilst it has frequently attained that of 20 miles, and has often travelled in the curvatures of 400 feet radius, at the rate of 15 miles per hour. The fuel used is the anthracite coal, which has been found to answer the purpose well.

The performances with this engine, have, therefore fully confirmed the opinions advanced in the last annual report, that locomotive engines may be successfully used on a railway, having curves of 400 feet radius.

This engine, however, weighing only about 3½ tons, is too light for advantageous use upon ascents.

Taking into view the strength of the road where wood is used in the construction, it is believed, that it would not be advantageous to employ engines of greater weight than about 4½ tons, and the engine now upon the road affords a good index as to the requisite quantity of steam, and likewise of the proportions of the various parts, which should prevail in these that are to be constructed.

As a further illustration of the machinery and fixtures herein referred to, and now used on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and of the methods employed in constructing the railway, I have annexed the following drawings, executed by B. H. Lathrobe, to wit:

1st. A drawing of the friction wheel of the Winans' car showing

A vertical section of the friction wheel and box.

A lateral view of the same.

Plans of the lower and upper divisions of the box.

2d. Drawings of Elgar's improved turn-out—comprising a general view of it, and representations of its several details.

3d. Drawings of the chilled cast iron car wheel—exhibiting different parts by appropriate views and sections.

4th. Drawings of the car used for the transportation of flour, shewing—an end view, side view, and plan of the car—together with the manner of stowing the barrels.

5th. Representations of the various modes of constructing the railway employed on different sections of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, displaying the details of construction—

Of stone sills.

Of wooden string pieces and sleepers.

Of wooden string pieces and stone blocks.

The work to be performed in the ensuing twelve months, and for the probable cost of which, estimates are annexed, marked H, will consist of the completion of the gradation and masonry on the main line to the Point of Rocks, and on the lateral road to Frederick.

The completion of the two tracks of railway to the Potomac at the Point of Rocks, and of the single track to the city of Frederick, together with the necessary depots.

The requisite stationary machinery to be placed upon the inclined planes at Parr's ridge.

The continuation of the railway within the improved parts of the city.

The construction of cars and locomotive steam engines, to be carried on as fast as practicable and expedient.

The location of the route of the lateral railway to Washington, which it is expected will be completed at an early day, so that the work of construction may be commenced within the year. No estimate can however, be made of the probable cost of constructing this work, until the surveys and calculations shall have been finished.

Respectfully submitted,

J. KNIGHT, chief engineer.

STEAM BOILERS.

Treasury department, October 12, 1831.

The house of representatives, by a resolution of the 4th of May, 1830, directed the secretary of the treasury to collect and communicate to the house such information, and report his views on the same, as, in his opinion, regulations for the navigation of steam boats or steam vessels, with a view to guard against the dangers arising from the bursting of their boilers.

Such measures were accordingly taken as were thought best calculated to obtain the requisite information. But, although some highly interesting and valuable communications have been received, the department has not succeeded in collecting the facts sufficient to enable it to fulfil the directions of the house.

In consideration, therefore, of the difficulty of obtaining the requisite information, by any means within the power of the department, and of the deep interest which the community, and more especially those engaged in steam navigation, have in the subject, it is thought best to make this public application to all who may be able, and are disposed, to promote the benevolent object of the resolution.

Accidents, like those which it is the desire of the house to prevent, have, unfortunately, been so numerous that many persons will have it in their power to state the causes and circumstances of such casualties; and these, collected from various parts of the union, cannot fail to be highly useful.

With a view to assist in giving that information, a precise and explicit character, the following queries were prepared.

It is not intended, however, to confine it to the points presented to them, or to the form of communication which they may seem to indicate. On the contrary, the department will be happy to receive any information within the scope of the resolution, and communicated in such manner as the writer may be pleased to employ.

It is desirable that communications on this subject should be transmitted by the first of December, or early as may be thereafter.

LOUIS McLANE, sec'y of the treasury.

Interrogatories in relation to the bursting of steam boilers.

1. Are you acquainted with the nature and use of steam engines? In what employment have you been engaged? Were you present, and in what capacity, at the bursting of any steam boiler, or collapsing of a flue; or have you been made acquainted, by other means, with the facts in any such case? If so, in what case?
2. In that case, was the water in the boiler above the gauge cocks? If not, at what height, compared with the lower gauge cock?
3. If the boiler contained a flue, what was the difference between the height of its upper side and that of the lower gauge cock?
4. What was the weight per square inch on the safety valve?
5. Had the safety valve ever been found rusted or sticking in the aperture, or was it so at the time?
6. Had that part of the boiler above the water ever been heated to a red heat, or approaching thereto?
7. Was there any incrustation or sediment found at the bottom of the boiler? If so, what was its thickness and composition?
8. In what part was the boiler rent, and what was the appearance and extent of the rent?
9. If the bursting happened to the boiler of a steam boat, was the boat under way, or at rest? Was the valve open? If so, how long before the accident? Was it opened by the engineer, or by pressure?
10. Was the piston going at its usual speed, or faster, or slower?
11. Had the firemen found any unusual difficulty in keeping up the motion of the engine previously to the bursting of the boiler; and, if so, how long before?
12. Do the iron boilers used in the western waters generally accumulate a calcareous incrustation at the bottom? If so, have any or what means been used, with success, to prevent it?
13. Is it observed that when there is a sediment or incrustation on the bottom of the boiler, it requires more fire than usual to raise the steam; and how often is the sediment removed, and by what means?
14. Are any means used for preventing incrustation on the bottom of boilers; and, if so, what effect has been observed?
15. Have any means been employed to prove steam boilers before they are used or afterwards, and what pressure has usually been applied to iron of a given thickness? Are the proofs made when the iron is cold or hot?
16. Is there any instrument employed to ascertain the temperature of the boiler above the water, or of the steam in the upper part of the boiler? If so, what is it?

17. What means are used to prevent the fire from the fire place and flue from extending to the boat?

18. Have you ever seen steam boilers heated to a red heat on the upper side? If so, is such a temperature regarded as a cause of exploding the boiler?

19. Have any means been used, in the construction of boilers or fire places, to prevent the heating of the upper part of the boiler? If so, what are they?

20. How many persons were scalded by steam, and at what distance was each from the boiler? At what distance from the boiler was the steam supposed to be hot enough to scald? Was the current of steam from the rent in the boiler instantaneous, or did it continue for some time, and how long? What number of persons were wounded by the parts of the boiler or machinery, which were driven off by the explosion, and what position did each of such persons occupy in the boat?

21. Have you ever observed the piston to move irregularly for a few minutes, or for a few strokes, alternately faster or slower than its usual speed, without perceiving any change in the resistance to the pistons, or any other obvious cause for such irregularity; and, if so, how it was accounted for?

22. To what immediate cause have you attributed the bursting of the steam boilers, which have come within your knowledge?

23. Are there any other facts within your knowledge, in relation to this subject, which appear to be important in the present inquiry? If so, please to state them.

THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

[This debate is published as a specimen of the course which debates sometimes take.]

We have already published some particulars of the storm which occurred in the French chamber of deputies on the 15th of August. A long discussion had taken place on the address to be presented to his majesty, and had turned in favor of the ministers. The amendments of gen. Lalayette relative to Italy and Poland had been rejected, and the sub-amendment of M. Bignon, and the additional amendment of M. Felix Bodin, were under discussion.

After the keeper of the seals had spoken in favor of the amendments of M. Felix Bodin and M. de Tracy for that of M. Bignon, the president upon the unanimous appeal of the chamber, declared the discussion closed, and was proceeding to put the amendment of the latter to the vote, when several members insisted that according to the rules of the chamber, the sub-amendment of M. Felix Bodin should be put first. The president, however, maintained the contrary, notwithstanding which, many members persisted in their demand that the sub-amendment should have the precedence. In the midst of the confusion arising from this opposition, the president of the council rose to speak, but was immediately stopped by the cry of "order, order! The discussion is closed."

The president of the council. I demand to speak. Voice on the left. The discussion is closed.

The president. The proof has not yet commenced. The centre. Read the regulation, (great agitation.) M. Teste, with emphasis. Read the regulation yourself. No one can speak when the discussion is closed. M. Guizot. I demand to speak upon the state of the question.

M. Marshal. The president ought to see that the regulation is enforced. He does not do so.

M. Guizot. When a minister demands to speak, he ought to be heard.

Voices at the extremities. He is too late; the debate is closed.

M. M. Briquerville and Enuof address themselves energetically to the president of the council, who has ascended the tribune, where he is waiting calmly, till silence is established.

M. Briquerville. As a deputy, the president of the council has no right to speak, and he has no more right as a minister. (The tumult increases.)

M. Dupin. The discussion is closed upon the merits of the case, that is clear; but the minister demands to be heard upon the state of the question. (Noise.)

M. Dupin and several other members spoke all at once, and with different intentions. "The regulation, read the regulation." (The disorder increases every minute.)

M. Demareay, (ascending the tribune, and addressing himself to M. Casimir Perier.) If you will allow me, I am going to speak upon the reference of the resolution.

The president. Gentlemen, you are unmindful of the dignity of the assembly. Listen to the speaker who is at the tribune.

M. Dubois. But the discussion cannot be re-opened upon the merits of the question.

M. Dupin. The president of the council does not intend to speak upon the merits. Listen to him.

M. Roule de Fontaine. I maintain that a minister ought always to be heard.

The president. The president of the council has alone the right to speak, and I demand it from him, (violent tumult.)

M. Casimir Perier. I ask to be allowed to reply, and I have a right to it.

Voices at both extremities. We have told you a hundred times the discussion is closed.

The president. The president of the council demands to speak on behalf of the regulation.

M. Casimir Perier. I speak not on behalf of the regulation, but on behalf of the charter, and for the charter. (New exclamations on the left.)

M. Odillon Barrot. You invoke the charter against the regulation; at another time, perhaps, you will invoke the regulation against the charter. (Immense uproar.)

M. Casimir Perier. I am a minister of the king, and I claim my right. (The tumult increases.)

The president. This question is a very serious one, and ought to be discussed with calmness. (Hear, hear.) It is a question of the greatest importance.

M. Dupin. Read the charter, a minister has always a right to be heard.

The president. It is for the chamber to pronounce if the question shall be put. (The agitation subsides.)

M. Casimir Perier. It is impossible, under present circumstances, in respecting the rights of the chamber, that I should not insist, upon the chamber's respecting the prerogatives of the king's ministers. I demand in conformity with the terms of the charter—

(Here the agitation is at its height; cries are heard from all parts of the assembly. The voice of the president is completely drowned in the shouts of "Go on, go on.") "Silence, you have no right to speak." "You have."

M. Bayoux. You wish to violate the regulation in the name of the charter. (Violent agitation on the left, many members get on the benches, and protest with great energy.)

M. Casimir Perier. You cannot deprive me of the right of being heard. I am a minister of the king.

M. Odillon Barrot ascended the tribune, on the opposite side to that of M. Jollivet.

M. Casimir Perier, (turning to M. Odillon Barrot.) Sir, this is a question of power.

M. Odillon Barrot. You exceed your powers.

M. Royer Collard. I wish to explain the precedents of the chamber; the same difficulty has already arisen several times. (The noise increases.)

Door-keepers. Silence, gentlemen.

Several voices. No, no, no silence.

M. Casimir Perier. I have a right to speak, and I insist on it. Clamour cannot move me. (Fresh uproar on the left.) I repeat again, I insist upon my right, not in virtue of the regulation, but of the charter. (No, no.)

The deputies at both extremities rise en masse, and with so much energy, that a sort of panic reaches to the tribunes. The noise is heard out of doors, and gives rise to a great many odd conjectures.

M. Jousset clammers up the tribune, through the midst of the deputies, and calls out, "The rights of the chamber must not be violated."

Voices at the extremities. "This does not intimidate us."

(Here the hon. member approached so near to M. Perier, and spoke with so much warmth, that several deputies thought he was going to seize him by the collar.)

M. C. Perier. Will they employ violence against me?

M. Prunelle. This is scandalous; never was any thing like it before.

The president having uselessly rung his bell, and seeing the impossibility of obtaining silence, covered himself, and said a few words which we could not hear.

The chamber adjourned for an hour, in the midst of extreme agitation and expressions that we dare not repeat.

At three quarters to 7 o'clock the chamber met again.

The president. It was with great regret that, after having used all the means in my power to obtain order in the chamber, I was obliged to use the last resource allowed me. The chamber will feel that some delicate questions must arise, and will listen with calmness to the speakers, and decide as is their duty. Similar tumults will render a representative government impossible.

They will convert this place into an arena for the display of angry passions, where only the interests of France ought to be attended to, and discussed with dignity.—

(Applause.)

A member. It is now past 7; the sitting ought not to be continued.

The president. The sitting is adjourned till to-morrow.

The deputies continued to discuss among themselves, and retired in the midst of great tumult and disorder.

The following are the amendments offered by general Lafayette.

"Amendment 1st.—The occupation of the states of Parma, Modena, and Romagna by Austria, justly awakened the susceptibility of the nation. Though we cannot but consider this act of foreign invasion as a violation of the independence of these states, and of our avowed principle of non-intervention, the evacuation of a part of these states, though tardy, proves that the voice of your majesty has at length been listened to. We have a right to expect that this retreat is final and complete. We take pleasure in hoping that the promises obtained by your majesty of a real amnesty, of the abolition of confiscation, and of genuine ameliorations in the administrative and judiciary systems will be faithfully performed; that the amnesty will be general and sincere; that all captives will be set free without exception; and that henceforth humanity will cease to mourn over the fate of men who, like ourselves, have been desirous of liberty; and that France will at all times show herself faithful to her policy, and to the present principle of her social existence.

"Amendment 2d.—There is another sentiment which fills and agitates all our hearts—it is that which is excited by the unhappy fate of heroic Poland. France is grateful to your majesty for having offered your mediation, and for having endeavored to induce other governments to join you in this great act of policy and humanity. Alone has this admirable nation contended against the rage of its enemies and the malevolence of its neighbors. Let us then, alone, if necessary, fulfil towards it the duty we owe from our brotherhood, which is at the same time the duty of all Europe. Let us remonstrate with energy against those trammels that, contrary to the laws of nations, intercept our communications with it; and in order to render the mediation of your majesty more regular and efficacious, let us hasten to yield to the acclamations of France, and by receiving the Polish legation, acknowledge their glorious independence both in right and in fact, acquired at the loss of the remains of that noble blood which has been so generously shed for us." The hon. general said that his amendment was dictated by the known sentiments of the population of Paris, by those of the national guards of France, of the army, and, in fact, of the whole kingdom. The only objection made to it was, that it amounted to a declaration of war, and would be a violation of neutrality; but this had been already committed by Prussia, in affording succour to Russia. The independence of Poland was not a new conquest, for it had been guaranteed by the congress of Vienna, and it only remained for France to acknowledge it, and it would be secure. His motion presented no danger, for it was consistent with the rights of nations, and in conformity with positive treaties.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 10—Vol. V. BALTIMORE, NOV. 12, 1831. (Vol. XLi. Whole No. 1,051)

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

The present sheet contains the Address to the people of the United States, by the convention of the friends of domestic industry, which met at New York on the 26th ult.—and, it being ordered by the permanent committee that the publication should first be made in that city, this number of the REGISTER has been held back, to allow time for it—pamphlet copies having been forwarded to all the newspapers in New York by Friday's mail. The address would have issued several days sooner, but for the indisposition of the gentleman to whose revision and care the manuscript was committed, and hence the delay in our own publication of it.

Copies of the Address, and of the Journal of the proceedings of the convention, are now being packed—for the use of the members and others, as directed, and will be immediately transmitted.

To what may be regarded as the official copy of the Address, as attached a list of all the members of the convention, (with their respective post offices), of whose attendance the secretaries were duly informed. The list inserted in the last REGISTER was not entirely full,—and some other errors or omissions occurred in that number, (without any fault in the person having charge of it), which might not have happened, if the editor had been at home in season to have corrected or supplied them. But it is hoped that the pamphlet publications now made will be found as nearly accurate as the nature of the case will admit of. It is well known to every attending member—that the list of names, as originally published, was very incorrect, and that the secretaries had no regular opportunity to remove all the errors. Some two or three names may appear wrongfully, and a few be omitted; but the principal secretary has given every name to which either the payment of the small contribution imposed, or the residence in New York, was attached. These were the only guides that he had; and hence his earnestness that they might be sufficient.

It will be seen in the pamphlet copy of the Journal that references are made to the "Appendix," for the reports. These, as they are received and examined by the permanent committee, will generally be given out for publication in the newspapers, that the circulation may be more prompt and extensive; but they will be gathered and published so as to bind up with the Journal and Address, to be followed by a body of Statistics, as soon as they can be prepared—and the whole will make a handsome volume for common reference and use;—which shall, with all promptitude, be transmitted to the members of the convention, and to others, as may be thought expedient; especially to distinguished official gentlemen of the national and state governments, members of congress, &c.

As one of the leading objects of the Statistics will be to demonstrate the principles and facts uttered in the Address, it is exceedingly desirable that the several committees should make as early reports as the nature of the important matters submitted to them will allow. Both principle and fact is with us; and it is not necessary that, on our part, any thing should be left to speculation—as to the right or expediency of the AMERICAN SYSTEM.

The Address claims and will receive an attentive perusal. We have also published the speeches of Messrs. Ellsworth and Brown, concerning trials up the revenue—for they are plain and practical expositions of very important things. There are reports of several other speeches which we shall probably copy.

The committees, and other members of the convention, are respectfully informed, that communications, on the business of the convention, may be forwarded to Hezekiah Niles, chairman of the permanent committee, Baltimore, by mail—the postage on which will be charged by him to the general fund.

LATE FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York bring Liverpool dates to the 1st October, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

The reform bill has passed the house of commons, and is now pending in the house of lords, where doubts exist of its passage. All classes in England are petitioning for its success.

FRANCE.

The excitement in Paris has subsided, and notwithstanding the fall of Warsaw, the ministers still maintain a majority. The chambers have granted them 18,000,000 francs to be advanced by them on loans in aid of commerce, manufactures and internal improvements.

POLAND.

The Polish army did not surrender on the fall of Warsaw; are now at Kunow under gen. Roziski, who has issued a most animated proclamation to the people of Poland, inviting them to rally. The efficient force of the Poles is between 50 and 60,000 men, determined on resistance. The loss of the Russians in the assault on Warsaw is rated at from 12, to 20,000, that of the Poles about half the number of their assailants. The cholera still raged in many parts.

BELODIE.

A treaty between Holland and Belgium was to be signed on the 10th Oct. Holland is to give up Luxembourg for a consideration, which is to be paid by Austria and Prussia. Leopold was making a tour.

PORTUGAL.

Don Miguel was glutting his vengeance by daily executions; 44 persons had been shot, and about 1,000 condemned to death. The crews of some of the Portuguese men of war had declared for Donna Maria. In the island of Madeira great excitement prevailed, and the foreign merchants were in great danger and alarm.

SPAIN.

This country is in a very feverish condition, and several persons had been arrested.

SWITZERLAND.

The diet of Basle had required full and entire amnesty for the persons proscribed in January last.

GREECE.

At the request of the president, Capo d'Istria, the Russian fleet pursued the Greek fleet into Poros, where it had been burnt by admiral Miaulis, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Russians. The Russians pillaged Poros twenty-four hours after it surrendered.

MOROCCO.

An insurrection took place in Morocco in the latter end of August—the emperor was forced to retire to Maguinez, where he was shut up by the revolted, who refuse to negotiate with him.

FROM HAMBURG.

An arrival at Philadelphia brings dates from Warsaw to the 13th September. The grand duke Michael, on entering Warsaw, addressed the citizens, stating, that all requests from the people were to be made to him, direct. He took up his residence in the royal palace, where, it is also said, field marshal Paskevitch will take up his residence. Praga was also occupied by Russian troops. A cessation of hostilities had been entered into for a fortnight, and until the pleasure of the emperor of Russia can be received. The Polish army were still at Modlin, under the command of gen. Ribinski, gen. Malakowski having resigned the chief command.

The counsellor of state, Engel, who had been commissioned by the emperor Nicholas to organize a provisional government in Poland, was expected to arrive in Warsaw on the 13th of September.

There is no positive intelligence of the present residence of gen. Skrzynski, but he is supposed to be in the neighborhood of Cracow, in Galicia.

General Wilt had been appointed governor of Warsaw, and baron Korff city commandant. The governor issued a proclamation, directing the inhabitants to deposit all arms in their possession in the arsenal, within 48 hours, under the penalty of being tried and punished by a court martial. The Warsaw Gazette of the 10th of September, re-publishes the proclamation of the emperor of the 29th of July. There was, on the 13th of September, 60 Russian generals in Warsaw. The municipal council still continue to perform their official duties.

On the night of the 10th, between 11 and 12 o'clock, the criminals imprisoned in the inquisition house, called the powder house, attempted to execute a plan they had formed to liberate themselves. The police guard stationed there, assisted by many citizens of the national guard, made great exertions in overcoming the prisoners. Some shots were fired, which wounded 4 and killed 1 prisoner.

It is expected that bank notes will continue in circulation.

The price of the hypothèques (public funds) has advanced, and are now selling again at 86½. For some months past no silver coin has been seen in Warsaw; much is again in circulation.

For the week past, the cholera had demanded but few sacrifices—many soldiers of the Polish army, fully cured, left the hospitals on the 9th. But subsequently several persons were attacked with this disease. In all the military hospitals, the wives of the citizens, and the inspectors still render the most active assistance. A great many Polish families are still at Kraham; the communication between Galicia and Kraham will be again opened; a great number of the wounded have been at Krazawiec during the summer.

A great part of the barricades and palisades were destroyed on Thursday. Forty-eight houses were burned in the suburbs of Warsaw during the battle of Tuesday and Wednesday.

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

Tuesday, November 1. The report of the committee on frauds on the revenue having been read—

Mr. Ellsworth, of New York, moved to recommend the report which had just been read, as the committee who made it were promised a communication of very important results from the custom house. The manufacturers, he observed, ought to know that they were suffering under the effects of a great evil of which they were little aware. He had retained his seat until now, hoping that some other member of the convention would introduce the subject, but as no one had done so, he felt it his duty to speak. He had been a merchant in this city for these last sixteen years, and chiefly engaged in the sale of cloths, and his experience had taught him, that the manufacturers of cloths here actually enjoyed a protection of no more than from forty to forty-five per cent.—a fact which arose from the constant and flagrant violation of the revenue laws. A foreigner arriving on our shores needed no other introduction than an invoice of goods to the amount of two or three thousand pounds sterling, to obtain for him at once the aid of a powerful combination existing here, all of whom would give him every possible facility to get his money and go off with it, after having grossly defrauded the government of the country. This difficulty arose from the immense quantities of cloths invoiced, as having cost from six shillings to six and eight pence, or six and nine pence sterling a yard, when in fact they had cost from nine to ten shillings. All the merchants were perfectly aware of this. Mr. E. said, he had lately been called upon by the collector to examine an invoice of twenty bales of goods, all entered at the rate of six shillings and eight pence, or six and ten pence; and before he had examined ten pieces, he came to cloths worth eight and nine and ten shillings. What was the effect of such false entries? The tariff law declared that goods costing six and eight pence abroad, should pay a duty of 67½ cents a yard—while those costing nine shillings, must pay $1 70 cents. This difference caused the government to lose no less than $400 on every one of those bales. It was thus that our manufacturers were deceived and betrayed. They would have a sample of English cloths put into their hands, and be told the price which it cost. He would say, I can make this article at a profit, and he would thereupon go and invest capital in producing the goods. He would then bring them into market, and what did he meet? A market overflowing with goods worth 9 shillings sterling, selling at the price at which such goods can be afforded when paying duty on six and eight pence, and the reason was that not one piece in one hundred had paid the duty charged upon it by law.

If gentlemen asked how could such a state of things exist and no remedy be applied? the answer was that the state of public feeling was so highly wrought up against the American manufacturer, and in favor of the foreign agents, and their importations, that the collector though nowise wanting in honesty, diligence, or zeal, was defeated in every attempt to stay the evil. He had been so goaded and harassed by public and private attacks, that he had been actually disabled from putting the laws of the country in force. This surely was wrong, and the state of public feeling was an erroneous one. The laws were suffered to be daily disobeyed—and the foreign agent, whose interests were at home, and who regarded neither God nor man, provided he could only get his goods through the custom house, laughed at the idea of any moral obligation to restrain him. He did not speak of respectable and upright English or French merchants; far from it; they groined with our own citizens under the oppression of this system of fraud and wickedness; and had actually been driven from the ground of competition and obliged to abandon the importation of this species of goods. He addressed himself to manufacturers who were suffering under the gnawings of a secret canker worm that was eating out the vitals of their profits. They were told that the English could afford to sell cloths of the same value as cheap as they could—and the selling price was compared with the quality to prove it. Very true; but not if the lawful duties were paid on the goods. The auction system was the great engine of destruction to American industry by which these fraudulent proceedings were effected. Until very lately it was the practice to send one bale in every twenty to the custom house to be examined, and the remaining nineteen on the same day to the auction store—to be scattered, before next morning to all the winds, and without any marks by which they could be recognised and traced. In the mean while the other bale lay in some cases three or six months before it was examined. The goods were then found to have been undercharged, and what was the consequence? the only remedy was that, that one bale was forfeited, while the government had lost $400 of revenue on each bale, and the manufacturers so much of protection.

Mr. E. went into a further statement in relation to the pernicious effects of the auction system. It was the means of pressing in upon the market all the overstock of Europe. When the foreign manufacturer had sold 80 per cent. of his goods and had the rest lying on his hands, he sent the balance here—this refuse and surplus was received by the great auction engine, and disposed of at any price it might bring—in addition to this, the surplus of what had been sent into foreign markets by speculators, after laying there unsold, came here and was crammed through the auction into our market. Bales of goods that had lain long in Mexico, were re-shipped and sold here for any thing, no matter how little.

It was very true that for some months back the collector had been more rigid in his enforcement of the law; the public sentiment was relaxing. It had been ascertained that the frauds were so gross that he had been induced to have all the bales examined, instead of one, of twenty; and the consequence was, that in six months, 2,400 pieces of broadcloth had been found undercharged, by false invoices. Let then the newspapers which have so long teemed with abuse, cease to cry "there are no frauds!—there are no frauds." To one individual in this city, who had faithfully exposed

*In explanation he said he had had no reference to the effect of the duty on wool. When that was considered, the present tariff did not operate as a protection to the manufacturer of twenty-five per cent.

this inquiry until he had been publicly denounced, the manufacturers of this country owed a deep debt of thanks. (Applause.) Let those gentlemen calculate the difference of duty received on these 2,400 pieces, and they would find that within six months it amounted to the sum $48,000. Manufacturers, listen! cried Mr. E. in six months you would have been defrauded of your protection to the amount of forty-eight thousand dollars. (Applause.) With such a state of facts openly proved, it was idle to sit and spend time in talking about raising or lowering the tariff. The tariff was almost a nullity. In the face of all its provisions the manufacturer did not in reality enjoy a protection of more than forty or forty-five per cent. The owners of more than half of these twenty-four hundred pieces said not a word about the matter, but quietly paid the duty. But had they not, a few hours before, sworn that the valuation of their invoices was just and true? And what could gentlemen make of this but perjury? A few hours after taking the solemn oath required by the law, they walked up to the custom house and paid an additional duty of a dollar a yard. Did any gentlemen enquire why this thing was not prosecuted to conviction? The answer was forfeited? The answer was the same. The same mistaken current of public opinion entered and influenced the jury-box which prevailed upon change, men thought the law rigorous and severe—they considered it hard that a man should forfeit a large amount of property for a mere attempt to evade an enormous duty. In two years there was but a single case pursued into a court of justice, although 500 packages had been fraudulently entered within six months. If the merchant prove by the oath of a single witness, that the cloth cost only 6-8 in England, it was in vain the prosecutor brought fifty competent witnesses to swear that it was worth 10s. a yard. A gentleman who was a perfect judge of cloths had been on a jury in a case of this kind, a perfectly clear and plain case of fraud—seven jurors were so convinced that they thought it would not be necessary to leave the box, but on retiring to the jury room, they discovered that the other five were against them, and though they remained 36 hours together they could not agree. The merchant had produced the oath of his clerk in England, that the cloth had cost but 6-8 a yard. This occurred in a neighboring city.

If such testimony was to be admitted, there was an end of the tariff. Oaths of that kind could be purchased in England at 6d. a piece, by the cart load. In a case where he had been called to testify as to the value of the goods, the cause had been taken to court and adjourned from term to term, to allow time for the merchant to get more English oaths that the cloth cost but 6s. 8d. Mr. E. said it more talent and energy were not brought to the aid of the government in enforcing the law, the tariff would become an absolute nullity. The best legal talents in the country ought to be employed. It had not been a great while since a merchant told his neighbor what very cheap cloth he had purchased. He showed the cloth which he had purchased at $3 50 a yard. The question immediately arose, what duty that cloth had paid? for from its quality it was clear, that if the duty due by law had been paid, the importer could have made no profit on the goods. A number of gentlemen determined to investigate this case. They took the marks of the cloth; they knew the name of the importer, and they enquired at the custom house what the cloth had cost? The answer was 7 shillings sterling. They reported these facts to the collector; in consequence of which he had been induced to substitute a stronger enquiry. The cloth was so cheap that an Albany merchant had paid on the spot one dollar a yard more for it, and had doubtless sold it again at a handsome profit. The history of that piece of cloth he believed fully to be the true history of thousands and tens of thousands annually imported into this country.

Mr. Brown of Boston—I rise Mr. President to correct the statement of the respectable gentleman who last spoke. He fixed the rate of protection to the manufacturer at forty-five per cent. Now as that gentleman has shewn that 7-8ths of the cloths imported into New York, are for foreign account, and that large quantities of them costing from 7s. 6d. to 12s. pass this custom house paying only 67½ cents per yard duty, then, if a cloth costing 9s. in England with the charges added, is entered by paying a duty of 67½ cents, it will be perceived that the protection is far short of forty-five per cent. and on higher priced cloths it will not be 25 per cent. Within the last five or six months, he knew, there had been imported a million and a half of dollars in value of broadcloths alone, by four of these foreign concerns, or by consignees of foreign houses. A vast proportion of these were entered as costing 6s. 9d. and were subject to a duty of 67½ cents. If these goods cost, including charges, 9s. and paid a duty of only 67½ cents, it was obvious that the American cloths could not come into competition with them. The actual amount of protection afforded by the tariff would be nothing like forty-five per cent.—it would not be above 25 per cent.—the duty paid by the manufacturer on coarse wool added to his burthens. He was altogether in favor of the duties on wool, and would on no account have them reduced, he would not wish even the duty on coarse wool to be repealed, because the farmers thought it would interfere with their protection. The present duty on wool was imposed, he thought, to protect the farming interest, and, in a few years, would prove a benefit to the manufacturers. The wool now grown in the country was almost equal in value to the great cotton product of the south; and in five years, would infinitely exceed it.

But it was necessary to the encouragement of the wool-grower that the manufacturer should succeed. If manufacturing became a losing business, there would be no demand for wool. The present amount of protection afforded to the woollen manufacturer was counterbalanced by the duty on imported wool. I could manufacture to more advantage, said Mr. Brown, under the tariff of 1816, than under that of 1828; for the duty on wool was then lower, and that then paid on cloths was a better protection. The law of 1830 was enacted to carry into effect the provisions of the law of 1828. It provided very clearly that the goods entered with intent to defraud the revenue should be forfeited. But the courts had allowed testimony to be introduced as to the cost of the goods at the place whence imported; and this testimony was held to do away the fraudulent intent. He knew of no remedy for this but to adhere to the law. The law of 1828 says, that the duty shall be estimated "upon the true market value of the cloth in the country where it is made;" the cost of the cloth to the importer had nothing to do with it. Yet, it was decided, that the evidence of the cloth, costing no more than the sum at which it was invoiced, did away the fraudulent intent. The two or three thousand pieces of cloth, which, upon the late examination in this city, had been found to be undervalued, had not been forfeited. The importers were suffered to take them away upon the payment of the same duties which honest men paid at first. It appears to me, said Mr. Brown, that no discretionary power is left with the collector. He is bound to proceed against the goods as forfeited. As long as the attempt to defraud goes unpunished, the frauds will continue to be repeated.

There had grown up a practice to prevent the wool-grower and manufacturer receiving the protection intended to be given to them by congress. Mr. Secretary Rush had misconceived the law, which expressly made the duty on cloths an ad valorem duty, whereas it was now assessed as a specific duty, thereby decreasing the duty ten per cent. less than was intended by the law. It was foreseen, at the time, that the one dollar minimum would lead to the very difficulties which have occurred. Your committee, however, were unwilling to disturb the law of 1828, believing that the woollen manufacturers will find adequate protection if the provisions of that law were duly enforced. An impetus has been given to the raising of sheep, by the protection afforded to wool, and the competition would, in this case, as in all others, reduce the price.

Mr. Core here enquired what was the proper remedy for the defects in the law: would forfeiture, or a valuation of the goods here, best serve to prevent frauds?

Mr. Brown replied that a valuation here, would effectually remedy the evil. But the committee had not recommended that course, because it was not the feeling of the convention to involve congress in a discussion of the whole tariff system, as such a proposition would necessarily do. He also stated, that the present rate of duties, would be found too high, if applied to the value of the goods here. They would amount to a prohibition. For his own part, he would not oppose a prohibitory duty. He believed the country would be the gainer by it. The duty on many articles which entered into manufactures, was already prohibitory; and he instance chemicals, which although they might seem to some a small branch of manufacture, it was not so; they were a very important branch, which had incidentally grown up, and had been called into existence by the larger and more important manufactures, requiring the importations of near ten thousand tons of crude brimstone, and probably two thousand tons of salt petre. The acids were made from these articles, and were used in immense quantities, in the bleaching of cotton goods, and in calico printing. The duty on these acids is four cents per pound, and the price they were sold at was four cents per pound. — ~~that in this case, and in many~~ ~~other cases, you would name, the country had been~~ ~~prepared to recommend prohibition, and as the duties~~ ~~would have to be lessened on cloths if the valuation~~ ~~was in the port of importation, it would involve the~~ ~~whole question of the tariff, which he had considered~~ ~~would be inexpedient at this time—the present law should~~ ~~be enforced, which in Mr. Brown's opinion, would~~ ~~answer the purpose.~~

Mr. Coxe then asked whether the city of New York was the only place where the revenue laws were evaded. To this, Mr. Brown replied that there had occurred a few cases in Baltimore; one case wherein cloths appraised at 9s. were entered at 6s. 9d. was lately before the courts there; and, as the jury did not agree, it was not yet decided. In Boston there had been but very few cases. The goods imported there were subjected to a rigid examination. The quantity fraudulently entered there, did not amount probably to five hundred dollars in a year. It was very seldom that undervalued goods passed through that custom house; and the same might be said of the Philadelphia custom house. By far the greater portion of all the woollen goods imported were brought into New York. One importer here sold $200,000 worth of cloths in one year. This some agent entered 80,000 yards of cloth in six months; all but 6,000 of which were invoiced at 6s. 9d. and paid a duty of but 67 3/4 cents. He knew something of the kind of goods sold by this agent to the dealers in Boston. They were of a kind which cost 2s. in England; and they were sold here at from 3 1/2 to 4 1/2 dollars a yard by the agent. He had examined them in the stores of the dealers there; and they had told him they had bought these cheap cloths of the house alluded to. It was a fact well ascertained that these goods were sold at these prices, and had been entered under the one dollar minimum.

The collector of this port had diligently sought to find out these frauds. He had, (Mr. B. believed), done all that he could do. He has adopted the plan of sending every bale of cloth to the store for examination; and, if it pass hereafter, it must be the fault of the appraiser. But of what service was it to the country if they were stopped by the appraisers, if the law was not after all put in force. If the decision to which he had alluded, which he believed was before judge Betts, were to obtain, evidence of the cost was to do away fraudulent intent. Such evidence might be easily produced, and honestly sworn to by the seller of goods abroad. Suppose, said Mr. B. a manufacturer in England has four hundred pieces of cloths, of an equal number of yards, all worth 9s. sterling, a purchaser might go to him and say, I will buy these cloths provided you will sell me two hundred pieces at 6s. 9d. and I will give you 11s. 3d. for the other two hundred pieces. Now, these cloths need not be shipped in the same vessel, or the 11s. 3d. cloths need not be shipped to this country at all. The other 200 pieces then are shipped here as having cost 6s. 9d. and if judge Betts' decision be correct, they would not be liable to the penalty of the law of 1830, for a certificate could be easily procured on oath, that the price paid for them was only 6s. 9d. Mr. Brown said the law referred to the market value, and not to the cost of the cloth. If judge Betts' decision was correct, then every man who imported cloth into this country would attempt to land, because if he should succeed, he would save one dollar per yard duty on the cloths, and if not he would only be where he would have been had he not attempted to defraud the revenue. There were many of the dealers here, who were perfectly well acquainted with the value of cloths, and if the standard of value taken by the appraisers agreed with that taken by the dealers, there would be no danger of further evasions by false invoices. But the remedy, to be effectual, must extend to the forfeiture of all the goods which were attempted to be entered at a false valuation.

Mr. Coxe, begged leave to ask one more question. Was the duty on cottons susceptible of similar evasions?

Mr. Brown answered that all cottons costing less than thirty-five cents a yard, were taken and deemed to have cost thirty-five cents a yard. This was, therefore, the minimum valuation on which the duty was estimated. If you suppose one minimum of 10, another of 20, and a third of 30 cents, you then have a ~~case in which~~ ~~the duty on cottons would be susceptible of the same evasions~~ ~~to which the duty on woollens is now subject.~~ There was a perpetual attempt always to press to a lower minimum the cloths which ought to be entered at a higher minimum. The one dollar minimum was objected to most strenuously, at the time the law of 1828 was passed, in and out of congress; and many had determined not to accept the bill, so long as it retained that feature; and he was one of them. As he had before stated, the results expected from it had been realized. The Harrisburg convention recommended one minimum of 50 cents, and another of $2 50. The lowest minimum, or that of 50 cents, was thus recommended from a regard to the interests of our southern brethren, who used many coarse woollens, and to this he had no objection.

ADDRESS OF THE NEW YORK CONVENTION. TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES. Fellow-citizens—

A numerous delegation from several states in the union have convened in the city of New York representing great national interests which they are anxious, by the most efficient but peaceable means, to defend and support. In addressing themselves to the people of the United States, they invoke their candid attention to several topics of great national importance, without assuming any authority ultimately to decide them; conscious that their reasonings and opinions can have, and ought to have, no other influence or force than belongs to their truth and soundness.

A system of laws imposing duties for the encouragement and protection of domestic industry, upon the faith of which a large portion of the people of this country have invested their property and given a new direction to their labor, and with a continuance of which are completely identified all their hopes of maintenance for themselves and their families, has been recently denounced as "distinguished by every characteristic which may define a tyranny, the most odious." The entire abolition of this system, vitally involving the interests of farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, merchants and all the laboring classes, has been demanded in a tone that offers no hope of coudition or compromise. A submission to such a demand, with or without the consent of those who must be the victims, would be marked by such scenes of ruin and despair, as no one, not blinded by the strongest passions of our nature, could witness without compunction.

We address ourselves, then, to the enlightened patriotism of our fellow citizens in every part of the union; and we earnestly entreat them to accompany us in the examination which we propose to make of the arguments and statements recently put forth; appealing to their clear discernment of truth, their high sense of duty and their calm moral courage to avert the evils that now seem to threaten the prosperity and peace of the country.

Of these topics, the first in order and the gravest in character, respects the constitutional power of congress to pass the laws, which are the subject of complaint.

As a constitutional question, the inquiry is not whether the laws are wise or unwise, whether in their operations they are always equal, or sometimes unequal, or whether individuals may not think them so wide a departure from a just administration of the powers of the government as to be, in an indefinite and loose sense, inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution. The true and real question is, do they exceed the power of the law-giver; and do they, for that reason, fail to be obligatory?

We dissent from the notion that laws plainly unconstitutional may be yet so framed as to escape the animadversion of courts of law. If unconstitutional, their true character will either appear on their face or may be made to appear by stating the facts which fasten that character upon them. And if the motives, which are supposed to have influenced congress in their enactment are not facts which may be properly inquired into to give them this character, the reason is, not that congress has executed an unlawful power or veiled an unlawful purpose under a general law, but that the general power being given to congress, to pass such laws, the purpose of the law, like its occasion, its duration, or any other part of its character, is constitutionally referred, to the discretion of congress.

The present constitution has been in operation, (with a success, not more gratifying to ourselves than surprising to the rest of the world) for forty-two years. Twenty-one different congresses, regularly elected and appointed by the people, and their agents, and the state legislatures, have successively assembled to enact laws under its authority. Seven distinguished individuals have been called by the voice of the country to the chair of the chief magistracy, all holding and some of them, on various occasions, having exercised the power of giving a negative to such acts of congress as, in their opinion, transcended the just limit of legislative authority. During the same period a supreme judicial tribunal has existed, not less distinguished for purity and talent, than for dignity and importance, whose high function it properly is to pronounce its solemn judgment on the constitutional extent of the power of congress whenever any exercise of that power is complained of and the case is brought duly before it. Most of these successive congresses have passed laws similar in character, in design, and in effect, to the acts now complained of; and all of them have unequivocally sanctioned their principle. All these chief magistrates, in like manner, have, without doubt or hesitation, recognized the existence of the power, and no question of its validity has been raised in the judicial tribunals.—It is under this weight of authority, and this length of practice in its favor, and after the investment, upon the faith of it, of a capital probably amounting to two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, that a disposition has now sprung up to deny the power altogether, and to propose, if its exercise be persisted in, a resort to such means of redress as threaten the union.

We cannot but persuade ourselves that before the American people abandon a system of laws, now of long continuance, passed at different times by the constituted authorities with the full approbation of the whole country; and especially, before they break up their government and return to a state of anarchy, on the ground that such laws are unconstitutional, they will give to that question a very careful and serious consideration.

Before proceeding to express the general views entertained on this important subject by the members of this convention, it is not altogether uninteresting to inquire, how far admissions or concessions have been made by those who deny the existence of the power, notwithstanding the general and positive terms, in which that denial is expressed.

It seems to us, indeed, that the plain object of the constitution, and the strong reason of the case, have driven those who deny the power, even upon their own mistaken view of its source, into the necessity of making admissions which, when made, leave no ground for their argument. They deny that congress can rightfully lay duties for the sole, or the main purpose, of encouraging manufactures; but they admit, at the same time, that congress may lay duties for revenue, and that, in laying such duties, it may so arrange them as incidentally to give protection to manufactures. They admit, too, that congress may lay duties not designed for revenue, but designed to countervail the injurious regulations of foreign powers. Are not these concessions inconsistent with the main proposition? How can it be longer denied, that congress may lay duties for protection, after it is conceded that it may arrange duties with that view? It cannot be true that the power was given for revenue only, and that it ought to be strictly confined to that object, and truly, also, that, in selecting subjects of duties, regard may be had to a different object.

An individual in society is the consumer of a particular foreign article; he feels it heavily taxed by duties, while other articles, equally capable of producing revenue, are untaxed. Does it make any difference to him, whether the article necessary to him was seized on, as the main purpose of the law, with the sole object of protection, or whether it was only incidentally selected, in order to favor the manufacturer, while the commodities consumed by his neighbors, though equally fit subjects for a tax for revenue, are passed over in this incidental arrangement? Will not every ingenious mind at once agree that if the power to lay duties was conferred on congress for the sole purpose of revenue, it is a violation of its trust to mingle any other purpose with that, as much as it would be to substitute an entire new purpose for it? Congress cannot look with one glance to revenue, and the other to protection, if the constitution limit its power to revenue alone. When it is thus said that protection is a fit object to be regarded incidentally, in laying duties, but that the general purpose must still be revenue, who shall inform us how much, in the motives of congress, must be the main purpose of revenue, and how much may be the incidental purpose of protection? How high may the incidental object rise, and the law be yet constitutional; or at what point will it have approached so near the main, or the only object of the duty, as to render the law void? It may be answered, possibly, that the admission goes no farther than this, that when congress has already resolved to lay duties, then it may, as a subsequent resolution, resolve to lay them, on such a selection of articles as shall best favor manufactures. But would not such a subsequent resolution be wholly aside from the exercise of a mere revenue power? Would it not be a clear imposition of duties for protection? And might it not lead, practically, to the same consequences, since, under this admitted power of selection and arrangement, the whole burden of the government might be laid with a direct view to protection merely.

The other admission, that is, that congress may lay duties to countervail the commercial regulations of other states, seems to us still more decisive. This concedes, at once, that the power to lay duties is not a mere revenue power; for here is one admitted case, in which it may properly be exercised, which has no relation to revenue. Yet this is no particular or specific power. The constitution no more points out this, as being a proper object, than it points out protection. If it be provided for at all, it is because it is embraced in the general words of the grant. It is there, or it is no where. Laws, laying duties to countervail the regulations of other states, are regulations of trade. They are not only like laws of protection, but they are, emphatically, themselves laws of protection. They have usually no other end or design than to protect the manufacturers or other interests of our own citizens from the effect of unequal competition or monopoly on the part of other nations. Congress, then, upon this admission, may lay duties with the single object of encouraging certain descriptions of domestic employment or industry; and it remains for those who concede this, and yet deny the general power, to show how it is, that congress has power, in its discretion, to protect some classes of industry and no power, in the same discretion and by the same means, to protect others. But the admission goes still further. It not only furnishes an analogy for the case in argument, but meets and covers that identical case. The laws so much opposed, and whose constitutional validity is so loudly denied, are themselves no other than so many acts passed to countervail the injurious commercial regulations of foreign states.

The United States have not been the first to reject the theory of free trade. They have not introduced into the world new modes of legislation. They have not originated a system of protection; far otherwise. At the very moment they had succeeded to throw off their colonial bondage and had established their own independence they found, that their condition, so far as respected commerce, agriculture and manufactures, was but partially bettered by the change, because they found the ports of the leading states of Europe shut against their ships, and against their products. They offered free trade to all nations; but the nations, with one accord, rejected their offer. The subjects of other states were protected, as against them, by the laws of other states; but they were protected against nobody. It is undeniably true, that this condition of things was one of the very causes which led to the adoption of the present government. It is unquestionable, as matter of historic record, that one strong motive for forming and establishing the present constitution was to organise a government that should possess the power of countervailing these foreign regulations by adequate measures and thereby protecting the labor and industry of the people of the country. Countervailing laws were accordingly passed at the very first session of the first congress; others have been passed at various times since; one and all, they partake of the same character; they are all countervailing laws rendered expedient and necessary by the policy pursued by other nations. The republic is now composed of thirteen millions of people; all the principal products of eight or nine of these thirteen millions are, at this moment, shut out from the great market of consumption abroad, either by absolute prohibitions or by high duties; and it is to meet this state of things, it is to countervail these foreign regulations, so injurious to us, it is to place ourselves on some footing of equality, it is to rescue the labor of the American people from an inferiority, a subjection, at once dishonorable and burdensome, at once degrading to its character while it increases its toils, that those very laws were originally passed, have all along continued, and now exist. They are, therefore, countervailing laws and no other, in every just sense of these terms.

Having made these remarks on what is conceded by those who deny the power of congress to protect manufactures, and on the effect of that concession, we proceed to present the view which this meeting entertains on the general constitutional question.

By the constitution congress has power, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." It has power also "to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

The power to lay duties is accompanied by one express qualification or limitation, which is, "that all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States." The power to regulate commerce has its limitation also, which is, that no regulation of commerce shall give preference to the ports of one state over those of another; and there is another limitation, which may apply to both clauses, namely, that no export duty shall ever be laid.

Here then is a grant of power in broad and general terms, but with certain specific limitations, carefully expressed. But neither of these limitations applies, in any manner, to that exercise of the power which is now under consideration. Neither of them, nor any other clause or word in the whole constitution, manifests the slightest intention to restrain the words so as to prohibit congress from laying duties for protection. The attempt is nothing less than to add a restriction which the constitution has omitted. Who has authority to add this? If other restrictions had been intended they would have been expressed. When the business of limitation was before the convention what was omitted was as much an exercise of intention as what was expressed. It stated all the restraints on congress which it intended; and to impose others now would be, not to interpret the constitution, but to change it; not to construe the existing instrument, but to make another.

The words of the grant being general, to lay duties and to regulate commerce, their meaning is to be ascertained by reference to the common use and import of language. No unusual signification is to be given to the terms, either to restrain or enlarge their import. Congress, in its discretion, is to lay duties and to regulate trade for all the objects and purposes for which duties are ordinarily laid and trade ordinarily regulated. If such a thing was never before heard of as laying duties and regulating trade with a view to encourage manufactures, then it might be said that the convention did not contemplate such an exercise of the power by congress. But it was perfectly known to the convention and to the people of this country, that one leading object with all governments, in laying duties and regulating trade, was, and for a long time had been, the encouragement of manufactures. This was emphatically true of England whose language the convention spoke and whose legal and legislative phraseology was theirs also. Every leading state of Europe was, at that moment, regulating its commerce for purposes of this nature. Such a purpose, indeed, had been long sought to be accomplished by some of the states themselves, by their own regulations of trade. Massachusetts had attempted it, New York had attempted it, Virginia had attempted it, and we believe other states had done the same. How ineffectual all their attempts were, for want of union and a general system, was soon seen, and felt, by the whole country; but they slew to what ends, and to what uses the power to regulate trade was understood to extend. But not only in other nations, and in the states, before the adoption of the present constitution, as we shall have occasion to show hereafter, but in the United States since, and in the administration of this very constitution, regulations of trade have been made, in almost innumerable instances, with no view to revenue, but with a sole and exclusive regard to protection.

If our understanding of the constitution be not according to its true meaning, that instrument has been grossly violated from the very beginning. What are all the registry acts; what the bounties on the fisheries, but so many avowed efforts to protect American industry, under the power of regulating trade? On what foundation, does the whole system of the coasting trade stand? The American ship builder and ship owner has enjoyed, from the first, and we think properly, not only protection in that trade, but the monopoly of it. He shuts out all foreign competition, and he does so on the ground that the public good is promoted by giving him this advantage. We think he is right in asking this, and the government right in granting it. Yet this is not free trade; it is preference—it is protection, and protection of a manufacture, under the power to regulate trade. The laws giving this protection to the manufacture and the use of ships may be wise and laws protecting other manufactures, may be unwise. But the first cannot be constitutional, and the latter not constitutional. If there be power for one, there is power for both. Both are drawn from the same grant, both operate by the same general means, and both regard the same object, the protection, namely, of American labor and capital against foreign competition. If it be said that the navigation act is founded in national policy and that it is essential to national defence and national independence, we admit it. But we answer, in the first place, that congress could not exercise a power not granted, merely because it might be useful or necessary; and, in the second place, we say that the same remark is true of the policy of protecting manufactures. That policy, also, is essential to national independence.—Iron, hemp and clothing for sailors and soldiers are not less indispensable to national defence than ships and seamen. Not only in the general use of language, then, does the power of laying duties and regulating trade extend to the protection, by the use of such means, of domestic manufactures, but such has been the constant interpretation of the constitution itself.

We think, indeed, that when a general power is given to congress by the constitution of the United States, in plain and unambiguous words, their acts are constitutional and valid, if they are within the scope of the granted power; and that, in considering the validity of the law, the motives of the legislature can never be investigated. Having granted the power, with such limits expressed as were thought proper, its exercise, within those limits, is left to the discretion of congress.

What is the true character of the opposite doctrine? It is, that the constitutionality of a law depends not on its provisions and enactments, but on the motives of those who passed it. Is not such a notion new? How are we to ascertain the motives of a legislature? By private inquiry; by public examination; by conjecture? The law may be passed on mixed motives: some members voting for revenue; some for protection; or one house may act with one view, and the other house with another. What will be the character of such a law?

According to his new theory, if the motives be constitutional then the act is; if the motives be unconstitutional then the act is unconstitutional also. It follows, therefore, that a law passed by one congress may be constitutional which, if passed by another, though in the same words, would be unconstitutional. Besides, on this theory a law may be unconstitutional for its omissions as well as its enactments; because, in laying duties, articles may be omitted as well as articles inserted, from a design to favor manufactures.

We may pursue this inquiry a step farther.

In order to ascertain whether an act were passed primarily for revenue, the construing power must be authorized to inquire whether that revenue be necessary. For if it be conceded that congress has a constitutional power to raise an indefinite amount of revenue, such a concession will cover any system of imposts that may ever be adopted. The right to raise more revenue than the expenses of government require implies the exercise of a power to tax under circumstances in which the raising of revenue cannot be a primary purpose, but in which a purpose to protect industry or, in other words, what has been called the incidental object, may be considered, in effect, the principal object of the tax, although veiled under the revenue power. For these reasons we say it follows as an inevitable consequence, under this view of the source of the protective power, that the constitutionality of any system of imposts, professing to be directed to revenue, must depend upon the fact whether that revenue be necessary to the government or not.

The statement of such a consequence is sufficient to show what endless difficulties must embarrass the operations of the government in defining the limits of this incidental protection, which has been alleged to be the only protection that the constitution allows, and of itself affords, what we conceive to be, an unanswerable argument against referring the right to protect industry exclusively to that clause of the constitution which authorizes congress to lay imposts for the purpose of revenue.

To determine whether any proposed amount of revenue be necessary would, in a great number of cases, prove a fruitful source of vexatious and unprofitable controversy. One party,—conceiving it wise to improve the face of their territory with expensive roads and canals, to provide fortifications and the munitions of war, and to accumulate treasure in the expectation of national difficulties,—would find good reason to maintain that a large revenue was indispensable to the nation. With this party a high and burdensome rate of imposts, fully adequate to the most extensive protection of manufactures that has ever been asked for, would be a constitutional application of the revenue power. Another party, more truly in their policy, holding that the expenditures of the government should be graduated to the lowest practicable scale of economy, would contend that nothing should be raised by duties above the ordinary supplies necessary for the pay of the public agents. With this class all the excess, above the sum that they might hold to be necessary, would be the fruit of an unconstitutional tax. Who should judge between these conflicting opinions? If such were the limits upon the power of congress it would be true, as has been said, that there might be acts in violation of the constitution which would elude the notice of the judicial tribunals; but the evident absurdity of subjecting the right to exercise fundamental powers to so vague and intangible a standard of interpretation, furnishes one of the most satisfactory proofs that no such intention existed in the minds of those who framed our constitution.

Pursuing the investigation, it will be found that the difficulty attending this notion of the source of the protective power does not end with the impracticability of determining upon the necessity of revenue. It goes still deeper. It is affirmed, and no doubt with truth, that a reduction of duties upon the necessities or customary luxuries of a nation frequently increases the revenue. In such an event the defenders of the position that the power of congress, is limited to the supply of a necessary revenue, will find themselves unexpectedly put in possession of a surplus income which, according to the assumed principle, they had no right to raise; and it will be apparent that the people will be even more taxed than they were before; for the duty having been rendered productive of a larger amount of revenue to the government, a greater aggregate sum will have been taken from the pockets of the people; and it will then be found that congress, instead of lessening the public burthens by the reduction of duties, will have only been encouraging the consumption of a greater quantity of the taxed article. A large consumption with a small tax being, in this case, more than equivalent to a small consumption with a large tax. And thus, in spite of all the precautions which the most scrupulous guardians of the constitution may exercise, the public functionaries, against their will and with the most conscientious desire to avoid infractions of the law, will oftentimes be fated to do that which they have produced unconstitutional results. The only remedy for which would seem to be to abandon this intractable mode of taxation by imposts and resort to direct taxes upon the people.

As long, however, as such results may follow the reduction of duties, it will be seen that a system which merely increases the consumption of imported commodities without diminishing the revenue will be, in effect, the adoption of a policy for the encouragement of foreign industry. And we might here pause and ask, whether it can be supposed that the founders of our government intended to give a power to congress to adopt a scheme of policy directed to the encouragement of foreign labor by a scale of low duties, without also allowing to that body a right, when they found it convenient, to encourage domestic industry by a higher scale of duties? Let those who answer this question in the affirmative, show some reason for the opinion that the convention which framed the constitution should at more value upon a power to encourage foreign industry, under any possible necessity to exercise it, than upon a similar power to encourage and protect our own.

We think we have said enough to indicate the pernicious tendencies of the doctrine, sustained by many eminent citizens of our land, which ascribes the right to protect domestic manufactures, solely to the revenue power conferred by the constitution upon congress; and have demonstrated that this error, if adopted, must lead the public functionaries into practical embarrassments entirely irreconcilable with a wholesome administration of the laws.

With a view to show that the protection of manufacturing industry is mainly referrible to the power to regulate commerce, and was intended to be embraced by the clause of the constitution, that invests the supreme legislature with that power, in addition to the suggestions that we have already made, we deem it not unprofitable briefly to recur to the history of the country, from which we shall derive lights that may guide us to the most unerring conclusions in confirmation of our doctrine. The narrative of events from 1783 to 1787, the circumstances attending the adoption of the constitution, and the range of its early operations, whilst yet in the hands of its authors, afford a mass of testimony that congress has but responded to the expectations of the country in so regulating trade as to furnish the requisite protection to the expansion and growth of our own labor.

The regulation of commerce was not a new term invented by the framers of the constitution. It was at the time of the adoption of that instrument by the people a term familiar to their apprehension and impressed upon their understandings, by the strongest comments that the history of oppression could furnish. The war of the revolution, that had just closed, sprang out of the conflicts in which this subject had been presented in the countless forms which an engrossing topic of complaint may be supposed to assume in the discussions of an excited and rebelling people. The same subject had been canvassed in the British parliament until argument and declamation were exhausted. The mother country had regulated the commerce of the colonies, through a series of odious and interfering restrictions, for more than a century, until the phrase had acquired the notoriety of a hateful grievance. She had lettered their trade by cruel prohibitions, and controlled their labor by systems of denial that reduced them to the lowest state of suffering; yet it is remarkable, that, deeming this oppressive policy a lawful exercise of the prerogative of regulating commerce, the colonists submitted to these evils with a resignation that indicated their sense of the duty of obedience to an acknowledged, though misused power. All manufactures calculated to bring wealth into the country, were strictly forbidden; the erection of furnaces, for example, was denounced as a nuisance, and these establishments were liable to be shated by that name: it was declared unlawful to export the simplest fabrics, even of shoes or hats, from one province to another. Still the people did not deny the legality of these attempts to regulate commerce. But when the right was assumed to collect revenue in the colonies for the benefit of the mother country, the first assertion of such a principle was met by open rebellion. The distinction was palpable enough.

At a worthy of remark, that lord Chatham, in 1765 in the British house of commons, distinctly defined the two branches of power in terms that literally apply to the subject we have been discussing, and which show how clearly they were brought to the notice of the country: 'there is a plain distinction,' is his language, 'between taxes levied for the purpose of raising a revenue, and duties imposed for the regulation of trade, for the accommodation of the subject; although in the consequences, some revenue might incidentally arise from the latter.'—Indeed, the whole tenor of the public discussion on those subjects, so rife at that period throughout England and America, furnishes the most conclusive evidence that a specific idea was attached to the phrase incorporated into our constitution, and that its scope was to include the idea of levying duties in such a form as to encourage and protect, or, at least, to control and direct the growth of domestic industry.

The complaints against the articles of confederation, for which the constitution was substituted, embraced, amongst other things, an objection to the forms by which the legislation in reference to the regulation of commerce was impeded; and it was a prominent design of the new constitution to remedy this defect. The right to lay even prohibitory duties was freely admitted in the discussions upon the constitution; and we may safely affirm that the whole nation, at that day, regarded such a power as one of the necessary conclusions from the grant that had been made. The subsequent action of the government corroborates this idea. The first approaches of the people to their new rulers were made in behalf of the exercise of a protecting power in favor of their industry. They spoke of the injury they had sustained under the former state of things; of the ruinous competition to which the policy of the mother country had exposed them; and demanded the establishment of a system of measures that should accomplish their favorite purpose of creating a vigorous domestic manufacture. The unrestrained admission of British goods had reduced our manufacturers and artisans to absolute want; the free entry of British shipping had expelled our vessels from the ocean. From Charleston to Boston this condition of things was the subject of loud and continued remonstrance; and the remedy for it was a prominent object in the establishment of a new general government. The ship builders and the ship owners complained that foreign bottoms brought to the country all that was imported, to their ruin; and they besought their fellow-citizens to join them in measures of protection. The manufacturers and mechanics declared that it was of little importance so long as in what bottoms articles were imported, so long as this unrestricted importation, in whatever bottoms, threatened to reduce them to starvation. Both but these governments, from want of concert, could give no effectual relief. Attempts had been made to amend the articles of confederation for the very purpose of conferring this power upon congress; but these attempts had failed. Hence it was that the establishment of the present government was hailed with the utmost enthusiasm and celebrated in the principal cities, by all classes, with manifestations of hope and joy.

The earliest legislation of the new government avows and adopts the principle for which we have been contending. The first important act on the statute book contains the following preamble:—'Whereas it is necessary for the support of government and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods and merchandise.'—This preamble was written, supported and passed by those who had come recently from the convention where the constitution had been formed. They were carrying into effect their own instrument. They seem, indeed, for preambles are quite unusual,—to have introduced this for the purpose of showing the country that its expectations would be fulfilled, and that the manufactures of the nation would be protected. It, therefore, the existing laws violate the constitution, the original act violated it. If this character of right be marred now, it was marred then, and marred by those who made it.

If protection be unconstitutional, this law carries unconstitutionality in its front; and yet, not one member of the first congress appears to have thought it unconstitutional. In the whole course of the debates, protracted through several weeks, no one expressed a doubt of the power of congress to lay duties for protection; we may therefore affirm that the power was admitted by all. Some articles were taxed for revenue only; some for protection only; and some for both. The published debates show all this, and, as we have already said, every congress, from that day to this, has recognised the same power. Every president, beginning with him who is justly esteemed the father of his country, has sanctioned it, and most of them have recommended its exercise, in earnest terms. Indeed, it has been constantly exercised; protection has been given by the registry acts; it has been given by the tonnage duty acts; it has been given by the acts regulating the coasting trade; it has been given to the fisheries; it has been given to the cotton in Carolina; to the coal of Virginia; to the hemp of Kentucky; to the lead of Missouri and Illinois; to the sugar of Louisiana, to the iron of the middle, western and southern states; and it has been given to the various artisans, mechanics and manufacturers. It is now forty-two years since this system of protection began, and it has never been interrupted or suspended, with regard to many commodities, for a single hour. Is all this legislation now to be deemed unconstitutional? Are all these interests to be brought into jeopardy, and perhaps to ruin, upon this modern construction of the constitution?

Not only has congress thus constantly exercised this power, but it has thought itself, from the first, under peculiar obligations to exercise it. It has considered that it would be guilty of a plain breach of duty if it should not exercise it; and so it was declared in its first session. This policy was more earnestly enforced upon congress because the states had surrendered their whole power on this question, and were, therefore, prohibited from exercising it by the constitution itself; since as they could not, as separate states, exercise it well, it was taken away from them and vested in the national legislature. It was said, therefore, and said truly, that it would be a fraud upon the states, if congress, now the sole possessor of the power, should refuse to exercise it. The constitution had declared that no state should lay any duty except for the mere purpose of enforcing its inspection laws.—Is it conceivable, that the people would agree to deprive their own state governments of the power of protecting manufactures, by suitable regulations of trade, without the consent of congress, for any other reason than because this power was intentionally transferred to the general government? The doctrine now advanced, imputes the strangest absurdity, to both to the framers of the constitution and to the people. It supposes them, instead of creating a new remedy for acknowledged evils, to have forever abolished the poor but only remedy which already existed. It supposes, design, effectual power to protect manufactures, they did no more than prohibit the states from exercising that power, and extinguish it as a thing to be deprecated every where and altogether.—It supposes them to have imposed new shackles on their own limbs, and to have surrendered themselves, thus voluntarily bound, to the mercy of their foreign competitors and rivals. We cannot yield our assent to opinions, which ascribe purposes like these, or a policy like this, either to the convention, or to the people.

It only remains for us to add, that the public judgment has, at all times, affirmed the existence of this power, and approved its exercise. Even at this moment, there is no reason to doubt that nine-tenths of all the people hold the power to be constitutional. It is, therefore, not only against the words of the constitution, against the manifest design of the nation in establishing it, against the uniform sense of congress in passing laws under it, against a practice of forty years, never stayed nor suspended, against the opinion of every tribunal in the country, as far as we are informed; but it is also against the entire conviction of a vast majority of the people themselves, that these new and what we think dangerous opinions, are now brought forward as the true doctrines of the constitution.

It is an error to suppose that the regulation of commerce should necessarily imply the denial of a right to restrict, diminish or prohibit any particular branch of it. The suppression of any trade, injurious to the community, is as much a national concern, and as valuable an exercise of power, as the encouragement of other branches; and, indeed, in practice it must often occur that the conferring of special advantages upon one branch of trade may operate partially to the disadvantage of all others. Such is often the effect of treaties that reserve to the vessels of particular nations free entry to our ports: the commerce with such nations is promoted to the diminution of the trade with others not embraced in the privilege. This, however, is a lawful, just and profitable regulation of commerce. Commerce includes all kinds of traffic, whether sustained upon the ocean in ships, or transported on roads, rivers or canals: whether it belong to the system of domestic exchanges; or is conversant with the occupations of foreign countries; and it is the appropriate function of congress to regulate it in such manner as their wisdom may dictate, unlimited by any restraints except those which the constitution imposes on the power over the domestic intercourse of the states. The regulation of our commerce with the Indian tribes has subjected the traffic, from time to time, to all such restrictions as the national legislature found it prudent to adopt; and yet this right of regulation has passed unquestioned, though it has been directly exercised to the diminution of any species of traffic that has been considered hurtful.

It is nothing more than a regulation of commerce to shape our policy, in reference to our intercourse with foreign nations, by such rules as shall increase the products of our own labor to an amount that may render them, also, the subjects of a foreign trade, and thereby extend our commerce to new regions, and give it new accumulations of commodities. The agricultural products of a nation are not the only elements of its trade; its manufactures may be as desirable to foreign communities, and their transportation and exchange may become fully as valuable foundations of a rapid, enlarged and profitable commerce. Why, then, should the power to regulate commerce be supposed to be arrested at that middle point, between the prosecution of an old trade and the commencement of a new one that may, eventually, be rendered more expansive, useful and productive than any other? Such a restraint would seem to be utterly incompatible with the genius and character of any vigorous community, but especially with that of a young and healthy nation.

Before we leave this branch of our inquiry we are anxious to present the constitutional question in one more point of view. The best expositor of the constitution is that instrument itself.

The tenth section of the first article of the constitution provides that "no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws." The limitation which is here set upon the legislation of the states is within the control of congress. The consent of that body releases any state from the restriction expressed in this clause; and consequently congress may permit either or all of the states, separately, to levy such duties upon imports as they may think convenient: it may allow the state of South Carolina, for example, to enact a tariff of the highest rates of duties, directed exclusively to the protection of any branch of industry they may wish to foster. It will be observed that the terms of this clause of the constitution absolutely forbid the idea that such a power is to be exercised for revenue. The state that imposes the duty is inhibited from taking the avails into its own treasury, but must pay them over to the general government; whilst that government, on the other hand, has the fullest power to levy and collect its own revenues, and consequently cannot be presumed to yield its consent to the state enactment upon considerations of that nature. That consent, therefore, is intended to be given, if it be ever asked, from a conviction of the beneficial effect expected to be produced in the state that levies the duty—or in other words, of its value as a protection to state labor. With such a power on the part of congress to permit a protective system to be enacted in the states severally, it would seem to be a solecism to suppose that the exercise of a similar power was intended to be denied to the national legislature itself to whom has been emphatically entrusted the whole complicated and interesting concern of regulating commerce.

In dismissing this review of the principles and practice of our government in their relation to an important constitutional right, we take the occasion to say that we contemplate the character of the present opposition to what we have endeavored to exhibit as the legitimate powers of congress, with regret; and if we could persuade ourselves that it was destined to command the assent of any large portions of our population, we would say that we view it not without alarm. This opposition appeals not to the discretion of congress; it seeks no modification, nor qualification, but demands an entire and absolute surrender of the principle. It is for the American people to decide whether this surrender can be made. For ourselves, we do not scruple to declare that, in our opinion, to give up this power would be to give up the constitution. If congress be stripped of this prerogative and the restriction against its exercise be still imposed upon the states, it is quite plain to our apprehension, that the doom of our happy and prosperous constitution is sealed. We consider this question, therefore, as vital; and we look to the perpetuation of the power which we have labored to defend, and its just exercise, to be indispensable to the preservation of that government which has conferred on the people of these states innumerable blessings.

You are next invited to examine the subject in its connexion with the principles of an enlightened political economy. The system which we maintain rests upon the following principles:

All the means of human enjoyment, and all the accumulations of wealth, are the product of human labor.—National happiness and national wealth are, therefore, promoted in proportion to the active industry of the community; and that industry is in proportion to the inducements to labor, arising from the amount and certainty of its remuneration. The immediate instrument for calling labor into action is capital. Capital is necessary to furnish the laborer with the means of applying his labor to advantage, whether in the simple tools of agriculture and some of the mechanic arts, or in the complicated and expensive machinery, applied to certain branches of manufacture, the modern improvements in which have added so much to the productive power of man.

It is a settled axiom, that the industry of a nation is in proportion to the capital devoted to its maintenance. It is, therefore, thought to be a wise policy to multiply the inducements to apply capital to the employment of labor at home, rather than to the purchase abroad and traffic in commodities of foreign production, by which, the capital of the country is made to set in motion foreign labor. This is founded on the principle, universally admitted, that there is, in every nation, a power or capability of labor beyond that actually put forth; and that its effective industry is proportioned to the stimulus applied in the shape of capital. This constitutes the American System. It invites the application of American capital to stimulate American industry. It imposes a restriction, in the form of an import duty, on certain products of foreign labor; but so far as relates to American capital, or American labor, it simply offers security and inducement to the one, and gives energy and vigor to the other. The purpose of the protective system being thus directed to the utmost expansion of the industry of the nation into every channel of domestic competition, it would seem to be manifestly erroneous to call such a system restrictive, inasmuch as the avenues of labor in the internal organization of any community are much more numerous and extensive, than those which belong to foreign trade: whilst, on the other hand, there are no restrictions so severe upon the occupation of our citizens, and none that so irresistibly impel labor into a small number of channels as those that are created by the capital and industry of older nations when concentrated and brought into competition with the capital and industry of a young people in their first attempts to possess themselves of the arts that create and accumulate wealth. A nation that is devoted to agriculture only, and is dependent upon foreign labor for its manufactures, presents the spectacle of a people whose industry is confined to the single occupation of cultivating the soil, and transporting its products abroad, and is always subject to be disturbed by the policy of those on whom it depends for the purchase of its products: but the same nation, when encouraged in the attempt to supply itself with manufactured fabrics, releases its labor from the restraints of its previous straitened condition, and is seen rapidly diversifying its pursuits, until they finally cover the whole space that was originally divided between itself and the people that supplied it with manufactures.

It is true, that a different system of political economy is maintained by a certain school of theoretical writers. It is contended by them, that restriction upon the importation of foreign commodities, under any circumstances, is a mistaken economy;—that foreign manufacturers should be allowed freely to bring in their wares, although they will receive from us nothing in exchange, but the precious metals. This is the system which has been lately called enlightened. We, on the contrary, believe it to be founded on mistaken views; and that a practical application of it would paralyze the industry of the country. The fundamental principle in this system, is one which we deem totally erroneous. It considers the profits of capital, as constituting the only source of national wealth. It assumes the fact, that the wages of labor are barely sufficient to support the laborer, but leave him nothing for accumulation. Now, whether this may or may not be true, in the fully peopled countries of Europe, it is palpable to the slightest observation, that in reference to labor in the United States, it is absolutely and totally false. Such is the abundance of the means of subsistence in this favored country, that the laborer is able to accumulate capital out of his surplus earnings. We every where see capital accumulating in connection with labor. Labor is not with us, as the theory supposes, the mere instrument of capital; the mere handmaid to furnish the profits of the capitalist; it is, on the contrary, an intelligent, active principle,—the partner and sharer in the increase of wealth, produced by the united action of both. We have no class in America corresponding with the operatives,—the human machines of Europe. We, therefore, totally deny the correctness of the position, that "the question relates exclusively to the application of capital." We deny, that "the power of government is limited to its transfer from one employment to another." By increasing the stimulus to labor, resulting from the application of capital, to home production, additional capital can "be generated by an act of legislation." It is said that this system "oppresses the many for the benefit of the few." We, on the contrary, believe, that whilst it benefits all, its highest recommendation is found in its beneficial action upon the many—the laboring classes, the working men. If there is any one principle in political economy, which is perfectly well established, it is, that the profits of capital, employed in any one branch of industry, cannot, for any length of time, exceed the average rate in other employments; it being the constant tendency of free competition to equalize profits. It is, therefore, an argument altogether fallacious to suppose, that this system favors capital devoted to one branch of business more than that devoted to another; or benefits any one class of individuals; to the prejudice or exclusion of others.

It is also said, that "it is equally untrue that such a system gives greater employment to labor."

We dissent from this doctrine and are fortified by the opinion of the author of "The Wealth of Nations," whose language we think it useful to quote: "The capital of the manufacturer," says this writer, "puts immediately into motion a much greater quantity of productive labor, and adds a much greater value to the land and labor of the society, than an equal capital in the hands of any wholesale merchant."—"After agriculture, the capital employed in manufactures puts into motion the greatest quantity of productive labor, and adds the greatest value to the annual produce. That which is employed in the trade of exportation has the least effect of any of the three."—"The capital employed in the home trade of any country will generally give encouragement and support to a greater quantity of productive labor, in that country, and increase the value of its produce more than an equal capital employed in the foreign trade of consumption, and the capital employed in this latter trade has, in both these respects, a still greater advantage over an equal capital employed in the carrying trade." "That part of the capital of any country which is employed in the carrying trade is altogether withdrawn from supporting the productive labor of that particular country to support that of some foreign countries."

In accordance with these positions we maintain the efficiency of labor to add to the power and riches of a country, against the theories of later writers who attribute every thing to capital. In fact, we consider it the most important and valuable feature in our system, that it tends directly to increase the effective power, and remuneration of labor, thus multiplying the means, the comforts and enjoyments, of the laboring classes, and raising them in the scale of civilization and social life. This political effect on the character of society may be considered its highest recommendation. It is thus made to give strength and permanency to our free institutions.

The peculiar advantage of the United States consists in the abundance and cheapness of fertile lands, affording an easy subsistence and high remuneration to labor.—We consider the system of establishing manufactures and the arts amongst us, as distributing and equalizing these peculiar advantages, through all the departments of industry and through all classes of society.

This effect, we believe, to be deducible from the system, according to the most approved principles of political economy. But we consider all speculation on this subject founded on the ultimate tendencies of human action, and the averages of contending principles, as very uncertain guides in legislation, compared to the surer test of experience, and those practical results which are obvious to the senses.

Mistaken and preposterous assumptions of the merits of what is called free trade have, under the ever active delusion of British influence, afforded pretexts latterly to the opponents of the protective system which, it is proper to dispel. It is not long since no one believed in the power of propelling boats by steam, and every one believed that the British debt was to be paid off by the sinking fund;—similar mistakes exist as to free trade—as a municipal principle, there is no question of the great advantages of free trade. The United States, in their coasting trade and domestic exchanges, afford the most striking illustrations of them ever witnessed—but, as between foreign nations, there is no free trade—there never was—there never can be—it would contravene the arrangements of Providence, which distribute mankind into different communities, separated originally by confusion of tongues, and prevented from all rushing together into the most favored latitudes, by local attachments and foreign antipathies, which are the germs of national preservation, by means of national emulation.

Much of the suffering which it is alleged is felt in certain portions of the United States, (if their complaints have, in fact, any foundation) is to be attributed to the very circumstance that they are placed in the circle of twenty-four commonwealths, enjoying the most complete freedom of trade, the operation of which has been to expose those who have not the inclination to employ their labor to the full extent of its capacity, to the severe rivalry of more industrious and thrifty communities, living under the protection of the same general government.

Nations are adversary to each other; their commercial intercourse is regulated by treaties always made with a view to relative advantages, and to provide for those hostilities which are of perpetual recurrence. The vexatious provincial tariffs which formerly fettered intercourse and almost destroyed traffic in the interior of nations, suggested the idea of that free trade, which has since been misunderstood and egregiously misapplied by more speculative writers.—The tariff acts, which even now impose duties on the wines of Spain at provincial borders and on those of France at city gates, are grievances, for which free trade is a happy substitute—but the principle is entirely municipal and in no respect applicable, without disadvantage, to independent nations.—The vessels of the United States are navigated with fewer hands and make their voyages in shorter periods, than others;—hence, what is called the reciprocity principle, originating in the first treaty between the United States and France, has been wisely proffered by the United States to many other nations, because it is supposed that our navigation would supplant theirs.—But the artificial systems of England, France, Spain and the other nations, with which the United States have most intercourse, render it extremely improbable that any approximation to the footing of free trade, should ever be arranged between them, even by treaty. For us to attempt while they reject it, would be a complete surrender of ourselves as a voluntary sacrifice to the policy and cupidity of foreign governments; to create a government for the benefit of others and not for ourselves. A tariff of duties on commerce between New York and New Jersey, would be as injurious as unconstitutional. Free trade between these states and among all the states of the union is the main spring of general welfare;—and one of the strongest links of the chain that connects them but free trade between New York and Liverpool would ruin the farmers of England through our superabundant bread-stuffs, and the manufacturers of the United States by the superior capital and proficiency of England in manufactures, and the degraded state of the operatives. An unrestricted intercourse between two nations reduces the labor of one to the same scale of compensation with the labor of the other; and such a consequence is certainly to be deprecated by that nation whose labor stood highest on the scale. This consideration forms a striking argument against the policy of such a system between foreign states.—While, on the other hand, it is no less desirable that, amongst the separate communities associated under the same government, this reduction of the higher labor to the scale of the lower should take place; inasmuch as the interests of these domestic communities are equally the objects of the protection and solicitude of their common governments.

The freest of free trade is, after all, but a chartered liberty.—The United States could not share their coasting trade with England without disadvantage;—the most extravagant advocates of free trade (it is believed) have never yet dreamed of sharing our river trade with foreigners.—To throw open the Ohio and Mississippi, the Hudson and the Delaware to British, French and Dutch navigation, would be of no advantage to our own.—England could not open her maritime coal trade, the great nursery of her seamen, to the enterprise of New England without losing at least one half of it.—She even refuses us a passage through the St. Lawrence, although we own part of that river. The greatest commercial nations of the middle ages, the Hanseatic League, and Holland, the maritime wonder of the world, became sooth by the exclusive enjoyment of the fisheries and the trade to India and other monopolies, which they maintained at the charge of long and bloody wars.—England struck the vital blow at Holland, not so much by naval victories as by her navigation act. The commercial and the military marine of the United States have risen to menace upon similar interdition.—Wah free trade we should have neither the one nor the other, but be a poor, dependent, pastoral people.—It is only about ten years since the project for reducing the duties was first suggested in England, in a petition to parliament from the merchants and traders of London.—In 1825 some slight and cautious reductions were accordingly made, but in nothing to effect the commercial monopoly and maritime ascendancy of Great Britain. Her colonial commerce is mostly exclusive.—The freedom of the trade of the Susquehanna river is now in dispute between the states of Maryland, Pennsylvania and New York. So intractable is free trade in fact, while fruitful of speculation. Within a few years Russia, misled by this delusion, and Holland under the influence of England, made experiments of free trade, which Russia soon found intolerable and abandoned, and which has contributed to reducing Holland from once being the richest nation of Europe to being one of the most impoverished and indebted. In fine, the dogmas of free trade, which are said to be taught in some colleges, may serve to inflame youthful imaginations, but, as they never actuated a practical statesman, they can never mislead any well informed mind. What is called the American System, is the system of Europe; is the universal system;—and (if the experience and common sense of mankind be any standard of right) is the true and the only system of intercourse among nations.

It is doubtless true, that during the last half century, a more enlightened philosophy has been applied to the affairs of mankind; that political economy is much better understood, its principles more fully developed, and more judiciously applied. The sense and experience of men had gone far to correct the erroneous legislation of former times, and to develop and multiply the true sources of national wealth. But the modern theory is not content with the attainment of practical benefits merely; it seeks, by an unqualified application of certain general principles, to produce a thorough revolution in the business of men, and the relations of nations. It is against these extremes of visionary good and practical mischief, that we desire all men of reflection and sober judgment to make a stand. We ask them to look at the present condition of our country and to examine the operation of the present system upon all its great interests. Above all, we ask them to look to the practice of all foreign nations, rather than to the speculations of their writers. They will then find that those who have taught us this theory of free trade, are too wise to practise it; that they continue to act and to legislate upon the system of protecting their own industry, though some of their writers and orators recommend to all other nations to abandon it.

A reference to our own experience is, however, the best criterion, by which to test the correctness of the system which we support. It is not new; the principle was applied, as we have already stated, to our navigation, from the establishment of the federal constitution, prohibiting foreign shipping from the coasting trade altogether; and imposing a high discriminating duty on foreign tonnage. If this discrimination has been abandoned, in respect to those nations who would consent to a system of reciprocity, it involves no surrender of the principle. Trade can only be carried on between nations by mutual agreement; and mutual protection leads to reciprocity as the only equitable arrangement. The mechanic arts have also been the subject of protection, from the establishment of the government; and it cannot be doubted that to this circumstance they owe, in a great measure, their success; a success, which has made the mechanics of the United States one of the main pillars of our national strength. Agriculture has likewise had a full share of the benefit of this protection; and in truth it may be said, that as our government commenced its career with the establishment of the germs of the protective system, so it has continued ever since, gradually nurturing and invigorating them until they have reached their present growth. Some interruptions have occurred in the march of this policy, but these interruptions owe their origin to accidental circumstances which dictated the necessity of relaxing the system for the benefit of other interests that were more immediately concerned in availing themselves of the advantages of foreign trade. These, however, are to be regarded not as proofs of the uselessness of the system, but as exceptions growing out of the pressure of temporary accidents. The events that followed the French revolution gave a new and unexpected direction to the enterprise of our citizens. The disturbed state of the continent of Europe, and the prevalence of universal wars, throughout the nations of that quarter of the globe, placed the United States in the position of the only neutral amongst many belligerents, and so obviously opened the way to commercial wealth to our citizens, that all other interests sunk into insignificance compared with those which were concerned in pushing a foreign commerce into every region where the strife of the contending parties excluded the competition of the belligerents themselves, and left to the United States the undisputed monopoly of trade. To this fortunate conjuncture of circumstances is to be ascribed the most rapid growth that has ever been traced in the history of any empire. The United States not only became the medium of the commerce of the world, but their peaceful position attracted the emigration of all those who had the means and the wish to escape from European troubles.

Amongst the advantages which have resulted to us from this state of things we have suffered one evil, the effect of which is not obliterated, even at this day. Accustomed for twelve or fourteen years to commercial speculations of unparalleled activity and success, we were taught to think that our national prosperity was inseparably connected with the prosecution of that kind of trade in which our citizens had been engaged, and we were thus insensibly educated in the opinion that the great interests of our commonwealth would be always concerned with a foreign commerce exclusively employed in transporting abroad the products of our agriculture and receiving returns in the manufactured commodities of other nations.

There was another circumstance that gave great authority to this delusion. The cotton manufacture of Great Britain was rapidly arising into the greatest activity and vigor. It was in process of time discovered that the raw material for this manufacture could be produced in the United States under more favorable circumstances than in any other part of the world. At first, but two or three of our states were employed in the cultivation, and the demand from England was even greater than the supply. The profits of this cultivation, therefore, were almost unlimited. The portions of territory employed in the growing of cotton were small, and the common opinion was that but few districts, in comparison with the great extent of our surface, could be appropriated to the culture. In the meantime, the cotton factories were diffused over Europe and took the place of large quantities of those manufactured from wool, silk and flax. Every year demonstrated the increasing importance of this manufacture both in Europe and America, and the demand still continued to outrun the supply. These circumstances had their influence in impressing upon our citizens an exaggerated idea of the permanence and value of this source of agricultural wealth and, along with it, the value of the trade which was concerned in the transportation of it. I persuaded our planters to believe that they possessed an almost inexhaustible source of riches: it unfitted them for sober calculations upon the effects that would follow the extension of the culture of cotton over the fertile regions that yet lay in wilderness behind them; and it equally disinclined them to foresee the possibility of the manufacture itself reaching a term at which it might become stationary and which was, therefore, eventually to set a limit upon the demand, at the very period when the supply would be increased in an almost infinite ratio by the spread of population over other states of our union, even more propitious than their own to the production of the plant. It may, therefore, be considered a misfortune, consequent upon their former prosperity, that our citizens were almost irresistibly led by it into delusive estimates of the true and permanent sources of national wealth. It was one result of this state of things that, whilst our countrymen were intent upon gathering the harvest which the distracted condition of the world had strewn before them, they were unminutely of the future and neglected to treasure up the elements of strength and prosperity which lay hidden in the bosom of the nation; and which, as they were independent of foreign legislation or external accidents, were most likely to furnish the means of a stable and enduring happiness.

Troubles soon afterwards broke out at home. A war threatened and our citizens were suddenly called to meet a tremendous emergency. Our commerce was put in fetters by non-importation acts and embargoes; and the crisis that succeeded found us without the most ordinary resources of an independent people. Our armies went to the frontier clothed in the fabrics of the enemy; our munitions of war were gathered as chance supplied them from the four quarters of the earth; and the whole struggle was marked by the prodigality, waste and privation of a thriftless nation, taken at unawares and challenged to a contest without the necessary armour of a combatant.

When it pleased heaven to rescue us from the imminent hazards of this doubtful and disproportioned conflict, we saw around us a nation of eight millions of people possessed of a territory nearly equal to the continent of Europe, rich in the ungathered resources of every kind of wealth,—just emerging from a war of two years and a half, with an enemy who had never assembled an army of more than thirty thousand men—and yet deranged in all its channels of industry, exhausted, and on the verge of bankruptcy. Nothing but the most perverse neglect of the fundamental precepts connected with the proper administration of the concerns of a commonwealth could have produced such a result!

These disasters opened our eyes to some important facts. They demonstrated to us the necessity of extending more efficient protection, at least, to those manufactures which were essential to the defence of the nation. They proved to us the value of a national currency, and the duty of protecting it from the influence of foreign disturbance; and, amongst other things of equal moment, they made us acquainted with the fact that the British manufacturers could find a large and, if necessary, a complete supply of cotton from other soils than our own.

All these matters came into review before congress at the close of the war. A proper occasion for their discussion arose when the question was submitted as to the reduction of the war duties. The return of peace made it necessary for the legislature to take off the taxes that had been imposed for defraying the expenses of the war; and in this reduction of duties to what it was considered should be a permanent standard, the cotton planting interest urged with great force and propriety, the necessity of retaining such a duty as should exclude from the American market all fabrics made from the cotton of the East Indies. It was an anomaly apparent to every citizen of the United States, that our government, possessing so many facilities for supplying Europe with cotton, should, nevertheless, allow a trade that threw in upon us vast quantities of cotton cloth produced at the distance of ten thousand miles: that our most common household supplies should be furnished from such a quarter. Nothing was more generally acknowledged than the duty of the government to protect the cotton grower against such a competition; and this argument was addressed to the nation by the cotton growing states, even with the conviction, at that time prevalent amongst themselves, that its success would be to give them what may be termed a species of monopoly in the supply.

The duty was retained; and it is important to know that, being designed for the protection of the cotton grower, it was graduated to a scale precisely adequate to that purpose. His interest required the exclusion of the East India fabric, but was supposed to be hostile to the attempt of the American citizen to manufacture the material: the duty, therefore, was adapted to the first purpose, but not to the latter. It banished the foreign manufacture:—it did not protect the home;—being thus accurately adjusted to the wants and wishes of the planting interest, without professing to serve any other.

This placed our commerce upon the most favorable footing for the cotton grower that could be desired; and the nation, having thus performed its duty to this valuable interest, turned its attention to other branches of industry.

The tariff of 1816, it may be remarked, was a measure that met the approbation of the large majority of the people in every section of the union. No partial nor local considerations were embodied against the operation of either its principles or policy. The southern states were even more forward than their northern confederates in recommending the policy and defending it in the councils of the nation. By this tariff various manufactures were attempted to be established in the U. States. The want of skill and capital exposed these infant institutions to a fierce and vindictive competition from the manufacturers of Great Britain; and, in three years, almost every capitalist who had ventured into this field of enterprise was broken up. The heavy loss and distress that visited this endeavor to establish manufactures subsequently urged the subject of more extended protection upon congress, and the result, after various struggles, close and elaborate inquiry and a careful attention to the expanding means of the country, was the establishment of a vigorous system, which has diffused health and strength into the industry of the nation, and added to the wealth of every class of the community.

We ask attention to another topic. Revolutions in trade are unavoidable: the balance of supply and demand cannot always be regulated with precision. There is a tendency, growing out of a prosperous commerce, to push success to an extreme which produces reaction. To these periods of embarrassment, of general stagnation, and severe pressure for money, the United States have been peculiarly subject.—We attribute this, in a great measure, to our having depended, in so great a degree, for our manufactures, upon the nations of Europe. Importation is induced more frequently by the necessity or hope of the manufacturer to find a market, than by actual reference to the wants or means of the country. A reduction in the prices of exports, following an excessive importation, causes a state of exchange which leads to an exportation of specie; the moment this exportation touches that portion of the precious metals necessary to sustain the money circulation, the operations of the banks become embarrassed, and distress and dismay are spread through all classes of the community.

We believe that the system which furnishes a nation with manufactures, essential to its daily wants, from its own industry, is the best possible security against violent changes in its currency;—changes which paralyze all industry, and disturb all trade; and we therefore submit it to the experience and judgment of the American people whether the protective system is not, in this particular, more advantageous to the country than that which, after deluging our markets with foreign manufactures, draws from us, in return, not a useless commodity, but the instrument by which our exchanges are performed, the very basis of our bank circulation, the essential principle of commercial confidence.

Mistaken opinions in regard to the effect of the tariff upon the prices of commodities used in the United States and upon which the protective system has been brought to bear, have furnished some popular objections against the wisdom of the policy. It has been said that the effect of a duty is necessarily to increase the price of any article upon which it is laid to the full amount of the tax. It would be easy to show, by a minute survey of the whole field of American industry, that, so far from this being true, the invariable operation of the tariff has been to lower the price to the consumer of every article that has been successfully manufactured under the protection. Such a survey would require more detail than the purpose of this address allows, but we propose to examine the operation of the tariff upon some of our most important staples.

In the article of cotton it is admitted that our manufacture has arrived at such perfection in the production of the coarse fabrics, that they are not only furnished at a little more than one half of the cost which the imported articles of the same kind bore a few years ago, but they are produced as cheaply at the present time as our foreign rivals, under all the excitements of American competition, are able to furnish them. They have had a constant and increasing demand for several years for exportation as well as for home consumption. None but the finer qualities are now imported, which are little, if at all affected by the minimum duty. The price of raw cotton has fallen but about a cent a pound within the last four years, whilst the price of cotton goods,—of sheetings, for instance, of more than three yards to the pound,—has fallen nearly four cents a yard within the same period. Satinets, of wool and cotton, are made at less than one half the price of cassimeres, and are more durable. Cotton flannels formerly imported from China at from fifty to sixty cents a yard, are now made, of a better quality, here, at from fifteen to twenty cents. Indeed we might enumerate every species of manufacture in which this material enters as a component part, to show that both in the character of the article and the cheapness of its price, the country has been a great gainer since the enactment of the system that has promoted its fabrication.

To the cotton planters of the United States, the system has undoubtedly yielded the most decisive advantages. It has created a certain and valuable market for about one-fifth of their crop, and it has encouraged the consumption of large quantities of their staple in fabrics to which it never would have been applied, if the manufacture had not been carried on in our own country. The establishment of cotton mills amongst us had the most visible tendency to induce our manufacturers to apply cotton to uses which both the policy and the position of foreign manufacturers would have forever forbidden them from adopting. This fact is conspicuously seen in the application of cotton to sail cloth, and to all those articles of heavy clothing in which it has lately been substituted for wool. It is now manufactured into carpets, blankets, cordage, twine, net work and a variety of other commodities that may be said to be exclusively of American origin. Cotton being a product of our own soil, we have naturally an interest to extend its application to new uses, above what might be expected from nations who are mere purchasers of the article, and who are as much, if not more, concerned in preserving and promoting the use of wool and hemp in the labors to which we have applied our cotton.

Let us next consider the article of iron; and we will introduce the notice of it with a quotation from that masterly report of the first secretary of the treasury, which, forty years ago, recommended prohibitory duties in favor of the manufacturers of this article: "for" says that report, "they are entitled to pre-eminent rank. None are more essential in their kinds, none so extensive in their uses. They constitute, in whole or in part, the implements or the materials, or both, of almost every useful occupation. Their instrumentality is every where conspicuous. It is fortunate for the United States that they have peculiar advantages, for deriving the full benefit, of this most valuable material, and they have every motive to improve it with systematic care. It is to be found in various parts of the United States in great abundance, and of almost every quality; and fuel, the chief instrument in manufacturing it, is both cheap and plenty." This report which is a treatise on political economy, at least equal to any thing that has appeared since its publication, states that the average price of iron before the revolution, was about sixty-four dollars per ton, and that at the time of that report it was about eighty dollars. Soon after it appears to have risen to ninety-five dollars, and in 1814 was as high as one hundred and fifty dollars. After the ineffectual tariff of 1818, which ruined numbers, induced by its vain protection to make investments in the manufacture of iron, it rose from ninety to one hundred and five dollars per ton. Under the influence of the duties of the acts of 1824 and 1828, it has declined to its present prices of from seventy-five to eighty-five dollars per ton, and there is every reason for the confident belief entertained, that if our own market be protected against the formidable and incessant endeavors of the British manufacturers to control it, the price of iron will, before long, decline to from fifty to sixty dollars per ton. Such is the irrefutable proof of all recent experience.—Cut nails, which in 1816 sold for twelve cents per lb. are now sold for less than half that sum, under the permanent security of five cents per lb. which has given our manufacturers their own market. "The United States," (says Hamilton's report before mentioned), "already in a great measure supply themselves with nails." "About one million eight hundred thousand pounds of nails and spikes were imported into the United States," in the course of the year ending the 4th September 1790. A duty of two cents per lb. would, it is presumable, speedily put an end to so considerable an importation. And it is in every view proper that an end should be put to it."

Bar iron which sold at Pittsburg in 1829 at $122, sells there now at $95. Castings which were $63 are now $50 per ton. Such are the practical results, proving the operation of the tariff on the market for iron. The duty, by the law of 1816, was so inadequate as to cause nothing but ruin to those concerned and enhancement of price to the consumer. The act of 1818 was some amelioration; the acts of 1824 and 1828, which increased the duty, decreased the price. Hammered bar iron under a duty of twenty-two dollars and forty cents a ton; is at a lower price than when under a duty of nine dollars a ton, and improved in quality from five to ten per cent. by the greater care and skill which more extensive investment has naturally created under more certain protection.—The efforts of the English manufacturers to destroy the American manufacture of iron, and possess themselves of our market, have occasioned extensive bankruptcies amongst them in England, and reduced the price of iron considerably below the cost of manufacture; inasmuch that a convention of iron manufacturers recently held there, resolved to reduce the quantity made twenty per cent. throughout the united kingdoms. With the control of our market they would infallibly regulate both the price and the quantity of the iron in this country—thirty-one establishments of which have appeared in western Pennsylvania alone, since the last tariff act.

The influence of protection upon wool, while it has been most beneficial upon the farming states, has had no tendency, that we are aware of, to injure the plantation states. The number of sheep in the United States is computed at about twenty millions: and their increase at about five millions since the act of 1823, which gave a great impulse to the stock. The farmers of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York and the other wool-growing states, have an interest in this national property, taken at fifty-five cents per lb., nearly equal to the capital of the plantation states in the cotton crop of this year, reckoning it at thirty millions of dollars. There is no doubt that, within three years to come, the farming capital in wool will be more valuable than the plantation capital in cotton. Without protecting duties American wool would be reduced one-half in quantity and in price. The large flocks which now cover the immense and inexhaustible pastures of the United States, most of them more or less of the fine Spanish breeds, must be again slaughtered, as has been heretofore the case, for want of due protection, and this great capital in fleece sacrificed to that of cotton with enormous loss to one interest, and with no possible advantage to the other. For like every thing else, woollen goods have fallen from twenty to twenty-five per cent. since the last tariff. The immediate effect of that act, by calling a large number of additional clothiers into active enterprise, was to cause a decline in prices ruinous to many of those before engaged in the occupation. Under the influence of the improvement in the price of wool, woollen manufacturers have rallied again, but, at least as respects them, the charge of monopolizing prices is a cruel mockery. The advantages of the tariff, in its operation upon wool, have thus far been confined almost exclusively to the farming interest; the manufacturers have yet all their way to win; and the effect of that competition, which is the result of protection, cannot be known until it has had longer time for operation.

The finest cotton and woollen manufactures are not yet much made in the United States, but we may assert without fear of contradiction that nine-tenths of the American people, who do not affect foreign luxuries and fashions, may be clothed with woollen, cotton, fur and leather fabrics of their own country, better and cheaper, than either could have been obtained abroad if the tariff had never been enacted. The greatest mistakes prevail in this respect; it is continually said, that hats, coats, boots and other articles of dress are dearer here than elsewhere. Such is not the case with all those who are independent of foreign fashions. Those who enjoy superior wealth and study superior elegance, are at liberty to gratify their caprice, at that additional expense, which such a gratification costs in all countries—in none more than in Great Britain, where the opulent and noble are in the habit of paying more extravagantly for French, Asiatic and other luxuries, than some of our opulent citizens chuse to pay, in like manner, for luxuries imported from abroad.

Whilst we assert that it has been the effect of the protective system to benefit the consumers by giving them manufactures cheaper than they had them before, we are willing to admit that prices have had a correspondent fall in the same articles abroad; but this fall of price abroad has been the result of the competition of American labor. It is impossible to advert to the fact that the United States export to foreign markets six times the quantity of domestic manufactures that they exported in 1820, and at present furnish incomparably the largest share of the home demand, without perceiving the tendency of such a competition to reduce the price of the same articles amongst all those nations who aim at supplying us.

But we hold it to be a common error to consider the comparative cheapness of the foreign and domestic commodity a test of the value of the system. Even if it were true that the domestic product were not reduced in price, and were to be procured only at a higher cost than the foreign, still the benefit of the system would be found in the fact that it enables the domestic consumer to afford the higher price for the manufacture, and thereby to furnish himself on better terms than he could have done when obliged to depend upon the foreign imported commodity—that, in other words, the increase of price, if it has taken place, cannot be called a tax upon the consumer, if the same system which has increased the price has also increased his means of paying it. That this increased ability to pay has occurred to a most beneficial extent, is evident in the invigorated condition of our agriculture in the last three or four years, during which period the value of the labor of the farmer, and with it the value of his land, it is well known; has risen some twenty or thirty per cent. This augmentation in the value of agricultural labor and capital can be ascribed to no other cause than to the increase of the manufacturing classes, and to the rapid growth of our home market under the protective system. During this period there have been no wars to create a demand abroad for our grain, but on the contrary, all the producing nations have been exerting their industry to the utmost, and maintaining a rivalry against our own citizens which would have visited them with the most disastrous consequences if they had not found a steady and valuable market at home. The fact, too, that agricultural products have risen whilst manufactured goods have fallen, furnish the best proofs that the fall of prices are to be mainly attributable to the competition of domestic labor.

The loudest complaints of oppression proceed from the south, particularly from South Carolina; but that these complaints are not owing the tariff acts, is unquestionably proved by the fact, that their public press, their memorials to congress, and other mediums of complaint, were as much burthened with them before those acts, as they have been since. In the acquisition of the extensive and fertile territories annexed to the United States by the purchase of Louisiana the lands and property of the plantation states could not fail to be depreciated, by a vast accession of lands, at least as fertile, for all similar purposes. But it is inconceivable how a steady market for at least two hundred thousand bales of cotton a year, liable to no fluctuation from foreign influence, can be injurious to the cotton growing states; and, certainly, if the inhabitants of the less exuberant and more industrious latitudes of the central and eastern states, were not, from the influence of climate, or some other cause, less liable to excitement and less addicted to complaint than their southern brethren, they have had much greater cause for it.

The article of sugar is a production of the planting states receiving the full benefit of the protecting system. If any application of the system operate as a tax on consumption, it would apply to the duty on sugar. It is true, the cotton planters of South Carolina will not admit that protection to the cultivation of sugar is any offset to their own faceted oppressions, but it is apparent that the lands and capital devoted to the cultivation of the sugar cane, are so much of both withdrawn from the cultivation of cotton, relieving that culture from the effect of over production, the only evil which it has any reason to fear.

The bread stuffs, lumber, and nearly all the other staples of all the grain growing states are excluded from European markets by prohibitory duties. Whilst the export of cotton has quadrupled, that of bread stuffs has diminished in a much greater ratio with relation to the population of the states that produce them. If instead of spending their time in unavailing complaints, they had not conformed to circumstances, and turned their attention to manufactures, their grievances would have been infinitely greater than any of which the southern states have ever complained. Nothing could relieve the farming interests of the middle states but their own manufactures and the manufactures of the eastern states. They alone supply that market which Europe denies. In addition to the incalculable consumption of bread stuffs by the manufacturers of the grain-growing states, what is equivalent to a million of barrels of their bread stuffs is imported every year into the eastern states; a relief, without which, the susceptibility of these states would have been tried to a degree of endurance far beyond that exacted from their brethren of the south. It cannot escape observation, that while their sufferings are announced in most eloquent language, and in unintermitting remonstrance, yet there has been so little specification of the supposed causes, that it is denied by many, among themselves, that they suffer at all. There is even good reason to believe, that within the last five years, the interest on planting capital has been more productive to the owner, than the interest on the same amount of capital employed in manufactures.

The states of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio have invested a capital of enormous amount, which may be reckoned as at least fifty millions, within the last ten years, in what are called internal improvements, canals, railways, and other facilities of transportation. This capital depends entirely upon domestic industry for its fruits. It would be a deal loss to the four millions of people who have expended it, and might as well be abandoned at once, without the protected products of domestic industry for its returns. Foreign commerce can yield it little or no service; and to destroy those guards which secure to it the home market, would be to render it altogether a useless expenditure. Foreign commerce would in this way lose also one of its most productive resources.

In our review of the operation of the tariff upon the various interests of the several states, it must never be lost sight of, that the one-fifth of the cotton crop which is consumed at home, for which we may estimate the sum paid at six millions of dollars, is, in the course of a very short time, worked up by manufacture to at least thirty millions of dollars, which is the worth of the raw material wrought into the various articles produced by manipulation: thus one-fifth of the crop of cotton manufactured becomes as valuable as the whole cotton crop, in the short space of six months after its purchase; and in the meantime diffuses competency and comfort amongst large numbers of the laboring classes of the community.

The policy of the protective system is happily and amply illustrated in the growth and prosperity of the U. States. The union teems with proofs of its wisdom. All that Hamilton's masterly report predicted of its benefits, has been unfolded and is progressive beyond the most sanguine anticipation. All the objections refuted in his argument have disappeared in experience. The antagonists of the system not long since declared that it would infallibly diminish, if not destroy the revenue, and compel a resort to loans and taxes for the support of government: their present complaint is that the revenue is excessive. Redundant importations, some years ago, imposed the necessity of a loan; the manufacturing establishments now spreading throughout the U. States, sustain their agriculture, have revived their commerce, have vastly increased their coasting trade and domestic exchanges, and have mainly contributed to an abundance of the precious metals; they are the stablest pledges of independence and permanent peace; and the most accessible objects of taxation and productive resources in case of need. It was said that high duties would demoralize the commercial character of the United States, and the evils of smuggling are still insisted on and depicted in the most prominent colors. We know of no smuggling; nor do we believe that it exists to any considerable extent. It is true, frauds have been practised upon the revenue laws to a degree that demands the notice of government; but we are happy to have this opportunity to bear testimony to the high and honorable character of our merchants, and to say that where frauds have been discovered they have had their origin with those who are alien to our clime, our laws, and all the considerations connected with our welfare. They are frauds that affect, comparatively, but a small portion of that vast amount of labor that owes its support to the protective system.

It was affirmed that this system would undermine commerce and ruin navigation; but they flourish and prosper beyond all expectation. It was to create a moneyed aristocracy; if aristocracy be possible with our institutions, it certainly has not found an abiding place amongst manufacturers. It was to inflict a class of paupers upon our population: no such class exists amongst the industrious. It is still denounced as taxing the many for the benefit of the few; but the many, with the power in their hands to change it, are its sturdy friends and supporters, proving that they, at least, deem themselves gainers by the system; whilst the few, on the other hand, never cease to tell us of the grievance of being subject to the majority.

A rapid increase of population, dwellings, culture, of the comforts of life and of the value of property, wherever manufactures prevail, bespeak their capacity to diffuse happiness and wealth. The new industry that has been brought into existence has induced the consumption of increased amounts of the productions of the land, and has added to the prosperity of every class of agriculturists. During the last six years; under the benefit of protection, four hundred sugar plantations have been added to the three hundred previously existing in the state of Louisiana, which now supplies two-thirds of the demand of the whole union. In the meantime, the price has been continually falling, and there is every reason to believe that, within a short period, besides furnishing the home market, our planters will have a surplus for exportation.

Our warehouses, workshops, and stores, abound with excellent and elegant wares of American fabrication, almost excluding those from abroad. Silver and plated ware, the richest glassware, porcelain, household furniture and pleasure carriages, every article of woollen and cotton clothing, copper, brass and tin wares, hardware, arms of all sorts, saddlery, and every thing else made of leather, drugs, paints and oils, tools, utensils, and implements of all sorts, every kind of machinery, from the smallest instrument of cutlery to a steam engine; nearly every thing that can be made of wood, iron, wool, cotton, glass, turs, the precious metals, whatever ministers to comfort, and most of the luxuries; all the substantial and ornamental means of habitation, subsistence, transportation by land and water, clothing and defence, are to be seen in every street, of every town, in every stage of process and transition, from the raw materials, which are abundant and excellent, to the removal of the finished article to distant places of purchase. The principal commerce among the several states of the union is employed in the transportation of domestic manufactures, and managed by domestic exchanges, which have increased above all computation within the last few years. They insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare, by bonds stronger than any political ties; infinitely stronger than armies or navies. Protection to these resources is, as it were, the Providence of our political being, ever guarding the industrious citizen, while adding to the nation's wealth. Without that Providence not a laborer, not an artisan, whatever his calling, but would be straitened and brought to ruin. Distress would be intense and universal. Stop the loom and the plough would work in vain; the ship would be un freighted, and universal stagnation would succeed to the present healthful activity of our land. Is there an American who would raise his ruthless hand against the system which prevents such a calamity? who would recolonize his country from an unnatural disgust for its own productions, and morbid preference for those of Europe? who would bow before the woollack of England, but spurn the golden fleece of his own soil?

Aversion to manufactures has engendered, of late, bitter local prejudices in parts of those states in which they do not flourish. Not long ago their promotion was in universal favor. When the venerable survivor of the framers of the constitution took the oath of fidelity to it, on commencing his illustrious presidency, the whole nation thought that he proved his patriotism by being clothed in a suit of American broadcloth. To doubt the constitutionality of protecting manufactures was not then conceived. Even to question the policy of promoting them was limited to very few. The statesmen and the patriots of the south were among the foremost to vindicate both.

The general pacification of 1815 exposed our market to the overwhelming force of English capital and skill, with more fearful odds than we had to contend against in the hostilities then closed with Great Britain. The inflexibility of her restrictive system, and the exuberant resources of our own country for manufactures, alone enabled us to withstand the great influx of her fabrics, and constrained us to protect our market by that system which has led to our present prosperity. Is it the cotton growing states who would subvert this prosperity and lay us once more prostrate before the power of our rival? Those states who, for the article of cotton, enjoyed a duty which did not merely promote but absolutely created its culture? a tax upon all the other states, which was represented as a grievance by the report of the secretary of the treasury in the very infancy of our government? a tax which diverted labor and capital into new channels for the exclusive benefit of those states, at the expense of all the rest? a tax which had not the remotest connexion with the revenues of the country, but was imposed merely for protection? Is it, above all others, the state of South Carolina that can complain of a protective impost, while she enjoys a heavy duty on indigo, which she has ceased to produce, and which therefore all the manufacturing states pay under circumstances aggravated by the fact, that while they are obliged to submit to this tax on an article indispensable to their manufactures, the very state, for whose benefit it was imposed, declines to cultivate the article?

By a special resolution of this convention, an inquiry was directed into the moral influence of our manufactures—in compliance with which we feel authorized to say, in a word, that the imputations sometimes cast upon the morals of manufacturing communities have proved, according to the experience of this country, to be without the slightest foundation. On the contrary, it is believed that the moral and religious education of those employed in manufactures is, at least, equal, if not superior, to that of other classes of the community.

In concluding this address we would take occasion to observe that the present posture of the affairs of the United States impress upon us the necessity of declaring what we believe to be the sentiment of the friends of American industry, in reference to a great question which must, in a short time, occupy the attention of congress. Up to this period, the revenue of the government has not exceeded its wants. The debt has required a system of duties that would supply at least ten millions of dollars every year towards its extinguishment. That debt, under the present course of liquidation, will soon cease to exist. The nation will then naturally expect some reduction of duties. Participating in the common feeling on this subject, we cannot close this address without respectfully submitting to public consideration the expediency of applying that reduction to such commodities as are incapable of being brought within the scope of the protective system; holding it, as we do, to be indispensable to the best interests of the American people that that system should be sustained and preserved, without diminution in its application to every branch of domestic industry that may be benefited by its influence.

Thus, fellow-citizens, we have submitted to your consideration our views of the construction of the constitution upon the great question of protection. If it be the true one, you will sanction and sustain it; if it be otherwise, let it be rejected; for the constitution is the supreme law.

We have also submitted our view of the true policy of this country. We have stated and urged those principles, on which the system of protection rests, which we believe to be supported by the maxims of a sound philosophy, the experience of mankind and our own. It remains with you to determine, whether that system of protecting your own industry, under which you have long advanced and are now prospering, shall be continued or abandoned; whether you will hold fast to that which your experience has proved to be good, or yield yourselves the victims of rash and untried theory. That nearly five hundred of your fellow citizens should convene, from sections of the country more than five hundred miles apart, to consult on these engrossing subjects, is itself an argument of the deep solicitude felt by the country at large in their discussion. To have separated without indicating them, would have been a desertion of the trust committed to us. Their importance required that fullness of consideration which an enlightened and reflecting people have a right to demand. It has been our study to adhere to the utmost accuracy in our statement of facts, and to exercise the most perfect candor in our arguments. We therefore invite the strictest scrutiny to what we thus submit; whilst we are sensible that, with the advantage of more time than the session of the convention has afforded, it might have been presented in a more finished form. Deeply impressed with the gravity of the subject and the momentous aspect of our national concerns, we trust that our language has never departed from that tone of conciliation which becomes citizens of the same country differing from their brethren upon great questions of national policy.

But let us bear constantly in mind that the union, the happiness, the peace and the power of our beloved country depend on its domestic industry, without which these United States would cease to be an independent nation.

Let those who acknowledge this great bond of union never forget that "united we stand and divided we fall;" that sugar, and iron, hemp and lead, wool and cotton, and the other productions of our diversified soil, elaborated by our own indefatigable industry, and protected by our own free government, are, in effect, the government that holds us together, and make us one people; that the home market is the jalladium of home itself in all its most endearing and ennobling political and social relations; without which we have no common country, but should be reduced to the condition of dismembered and defenceless provinces. Let it therefore be the instinct of all who acknowledge its cause as their own, to stand together, like the fathers of the revolution; with no local jealousy, no impolitic preference of one part of our system to another, but maintaining a united and inflexible adherence to the whole.

Spontaneous conventions like the present originated our glorious revolution and our admirable constitution. May the Almighty Power that presided over their deliberations, and that has never yet failed to guard these United States, shed the gracious influence of his protection upon our labors!

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 11—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, NOV. 19, 1831.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

THE ADDRESS. The "United States Gazette" of the 17th, says—"It appears to us, that the persons in Baltimore entrusted with the printing and circulation of the address, have been less pointed in their neglect of the Philadelphia press. The New York papers, one day's mail beyond us, publish the address 24 hours before it is received in this city. Why is this?"

The question is properly asked, and we have every desire to make the necessary explanation. The permanent committee, before they separated at New York, ordered, (as the convention had been held in that city) that the publication should first be made there. It was expected by the chairman of that committee, that copies of the address would be forwarded to the New York editors by Wednesday's mail, and hence he left himself at liberty to put it in type for his own paper of Saturday; but as the copies could not be sent until Friday morning, he himself yielded obedience to the order by delaying the publication of the REGISTER until Monday noon, and subjected himself to all the inconvenience that follows such a proceeding.

Our friend, the editor of the "United States Gazette," had not observed a statement that we made concerning this matter, in our paper of the 5th inst. The Baltimore editors were as much "neglected," as those of Philadelphia.

"OUR COMMERCE IS CUT UP BY THE ROOTS," says the "Free Trade" press, while it boasts that the revenue from commerce will amount to thirty millions in the present year!—while the fact is, that the price of ships was never before so high, or the business of ship building so lively, since the close of the wars of the French revolution, as at the present time! We hear every day of the launching of splendid vessels. Let the grumblers go to the ship yards, and be comforted with the merry sounds of the hammer, the axe and the saw. They have not heard, what they may now hear, (and every where), for ten years past. And look at all our commercial cities! There will have been built in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, hardly less than six thousand good houses in the current year. The streets are every where lumbered with stone, brick, sand, lime and timber; old houses are every where being pulled down and new houses being built up. There is no "lie" in this, as the Indian said of the Frenchman's quack. These are indications of prosperity, and the success of the "American System," that cannot be mistaken—though they may be unnoticed!

"Commerce cut up by the roots," indeed! The fee in our chief seats of commerce is worth, at least, one hundred millions of dollars more than it was before the "abominable tariff" of 1824. Rents, (on interest on capital), have about doubled since then. A new operation in converting all the property-holders into tariffites. Ever New York, the great seat of Englishmen and English commerce, will soon shew itself a tariff city!

We cannot absolutely state the fact—but personal observation, and in the ranges of houses that we have seen (notwithstanding, have entirely satisfied us, that, from 1820 to 1824, our chief cities declined in population—but the desolation of the commerce-destroying tariff of 1824 came, and things are—beautifully, as they are! All is life, spirit, motion, and labor goes not superfluous to bed! Will the "free trade philosophers" tell us the cause of such prosperity—yea, and of the rise of lands, and increased comforts and profits of farmers, whose whole foreign exportations are of less value, (hardly one-fourth the value of the bread-stuffs and wool), than the supplies which they send to Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, only.

A good many ships have lately been built and fitted out, as packets, in the same style as the "North America," described before, from the New York Commercial Advertiser. It such things do not shew that "our commerce is cut up by the roots"—"the mischief is in them!"

VOL. XLI.—No. 16.

Packet ship North America. Capt. Robert J. Macy, of the new packet ship North America, yesterday entertained a large party of friends on board. Those who participated in the banquet, speak in exalted terms of the viands, and of the courtesy of the host in dispensing them; and all who have the pleasure of an acquaintance with Capt. Macy, will readily credit their assertions. The North America has been built by the proprietors of the Old Line Liverpool packets, and takes her place on the 16th instant. She is represented as being one of the most finished and beautiful specimens of naval architecture, which has ever borne the American flag upon the main.

The North America was launched about six weeks since. She is of about 600 tons burden, apparently "uniting in her construction, durability, capacity and swiftness in her model; and her cabin combines neatness and comfort, without gaudiness, in an excellent degree. She has twenty-eight bunks, including eight in the ladies' cabin, which is placed aft—being a different location from most of the other packets, but not less convenient on that account. The cabin is of the Ionic order; the pillars and pannels are tastefully varied with satin wood, maple and mahogany. The curtains are all of light blue moor, ornamented with fringes. The dining room is a very capacious apartment, where thirty persons may sit comfortably down to table, without a mast to interrupt the view—besides this, there is room to dine twenty in the ladies' cabin. The skylights are so arranged, that an agreeable light is admitted into both cabins. The stern of this ship is tastefully ornamented; in the centre is a rising sun, above which is a spread eagle perched. On either side rises a female figure, Ceres and Liberty, we presume—on the left hand of the former are implements of agriculture, and the fruits of the husbandman—on the right of the latter, are bales of merchandise, and a ship in the distance, the whole encircled in a golden moulding. The bow is modest and neat—it presents nothing more to the eye than a scroll." In one word, this ship is another noble and beautiful evidence of the taste and enterprise of her owners. We hope she will perform in all respects equal to the expectations of the skilful and accomplished gentleman who is to walk the deck as her commander, and produce golden returns to her owners.

REDUCED DUTIES do not always affect prices to consumers. The duty on coffee was lately reduced 3 cents per lb. on molasses 5 cents per gallon, and on salt 5 cents per bushel—but coffee has been worth about 2 cents, molasses a cent, and salt 10 cents more, than in the last year. It is scarcely or supply that mainly affects price: 800,000 bales of American cotton will sell for more money than 1,000,000, and 25,000 hds. Maryland tobacco for more than 30,000 hds. But when more is produced than the market will freely take—and the price, per lb. declines—the laws of trade are set aside by "bitterness and cursings" of the tariff, as the author of every evil. If the south will "nullify" quantity, there will be no reason to complain of price!

CALCULATION! We see a very nice estimate of the duties levied in Great Britain and the United States on the iron, duck and cordage required to build and fit-out a ship of 300 tons. The difference is made up in the sum of 1,655 dollars 89 cents, exactly, in favor on the British builder! So much for theory. Against this we plead the fact—THAT FREIGHTS ARE LOWER IN AMERICAN THAN IN BRITISH VESSELS! Will the southern papers (deeply interested in navigation, as all southernners have lately become!) tell us how this happens?

Is not the "proof of the pudding in the eating?" Will Mr. Thomas Ritchie, who knows a little more than every thing, explain—at this "momentous crisis?" We plain forward folks regard practical results more than the "rules of the schools."

There is "free trade" in our navigation with Britain, and we excel in it: so shall we in manufactures, when they have been nursed half as long, and efficiently, as we have nursed navigation. In respect to many articles, the product of labor in both countries, our prices are as low as the British—instance cotton goods, and British counterfeits of our marks upon them! We shall have some curious facts about these things to present to our readers, before long.

MORE CALCULATION! Sundry newspapers give us calculations as to the cost of certain articles in England and the United States: for instance, that cloth, worth 100 cents the square yard in the former, costs 145 cents in the latter, &c. But these folks forget another important comparison of prices,—that, while from 22 to 30 cents are paid for a day's labor in England, from 62½ to 75 are paid for such service in America; and that, in the latter, bread and meat are at much less than half the prices that they bear in the former—hence, the difference in wages for a week enables the American to pay the "tax" on all the cloth that he needs for a year—to say nothing of his cheaper and far better subsistence!

NO PLEASING! That oracle of the North, the "New Hampshire Patriot," regards certain resolutions of a meeting at Concord, in which it was recommended that the duties on certain articles, (not produced or manufactured in the United States), should be reduced, as an abandonment of the tariff policy—but the oracle of the South, the Charleston "Mercury," gives us to understand that such a proceeding, instead of relieving, would aggravate the burthens of the south!"

FREE TRADE. A writer in a New York paper gathers glories of free trade from Tyre, Palmyra and Venice! It answered very well, when the merchants of these cities placed the value on all kinds of commodities within the wide range of their commerce. But the writer, so far as we observe, gives no example of practical free trade in the present state of the civilized world, between different nations—and we guess that he will not easily find one!

MORE OF IT. England's "free trade" is to export her woollen, cotton, iron and other manufactures, without restriction—by the laws of any foreign country; and to exclude wheat and other corn, beef, pork, lumber, fish, &c.,—all the necessities of life, whether products of the soil or of manufactures, that may, in any wise, come into competition with her own industry! Will some one of the "British party in America" shew us her exceptions to this policy? Does she not tax our tobacco a thousand per cent. and our rice one hundred per centum? Nay, even place a duty on our castor oil equal to the first cost of the article, needful as it is to a whole-some freedom? We shall enlarge these suggestions at a season of more leisure than the present.

HEMP. We soon expect some very important information as to the domestic production of this highly interesting material. We think it will probably appear, that the high duty imposed on it is about to have the general effect of our protecting laws, and reduce the price of the article below what it was before such duty was assessed. If this shall prove to be the fact—any small temporary inconvenience or loss that may have been encountered because of the encouragement offered to the domestic cultivation of hemp, will be a thousand times reimbursed in the benefits conferred on the agriculture of the United States, in the possession of a new and valuable staple commodity, to say nothing of its effect in rendering our country independent, for a material which is indispensable to private prosperity—and national defence. Except in respect to cotton, the European demand for the products of our fields is not worth counting up—if to be compared with the value of the home market for them, (and the crops of potatoes, turnips and cabbages are quite as valuable as that of cotton)—and whatever profits agriculture, in domestic supplies, necessarily becomes a matter of national interest, and this is especially one by which all sections of the union may be benefited. The rich lands of the west and south, will, we think, in a very few years, under the benign influence of the protecting system, enable us to become exporters of hemp: in the growth and preparation of which many thousand persons employed will be additionally set aside, as it were, to give new life and spirit to the market for bread-stuffs and meats. It is by such co-operations that communities become powerful and rich—that population advances, and plenty abounds.

UNITED STATES WHALE FISHERY. The following very interesting summary view of the extent and importance of the whale fishery of the United States, has been furnished us by a gentleman well acquainted with the facts pertaining to this branch of industry.

The average length of the voyages of vessels engaged in fishing for spermaceti whales, is thirty months.

In this fishery are employed 170 ships, or tons. 62,900

Valued at 30,000 dolls. each. dolls. 5,100,000

And employing 30 men each. no. 5,100

The outfit of each ship, for a voyage of thirty months, is about 20,000 dollars—chiefly in the products or manufactures of our own country.

The average length of the voyages of vessels engaged in the common, or right whale fishery, is between 8 and 12 months, and in this there are employed—

120 ships, of 330 tons each. tons 39,600

Valued at $20,000 each. dolls. 2,400,000

And employing 25 men each. no. 3,000

The outfit of these vessels averages 9,000 dollars.

Recapitulation.
Ships.	Men.	Tons.	Value $.
170 sperm.	5,100	62,900	5,100,000
120 com.	3,000	39,600	2,400,000
290	8,100	102,500	7,500,000

The average product is estimated at—

120,000 bbls. sperm. oil, at $22. 2,640,000

100,000 common 9 900,000

$3,540,000

It would be curious to pursue this important business in all its parts—beginning with the falling of the trees in the forest to build the ships, and ending with the final sales of the oil, or candles, manufactured. We think that it must afford a subsistence to not less than fifty thousand persons. And the general product would leave for every one—man, woman or child, seventy dollars a year, in the annual profit.

NANTUCKET. The editor of the Nantucket Inquirer, correcting an erroneous description of the island on which he resides, says:—"The exports are of the spermaceti whale oil, as well as right whale oil, whale bone and sperm. caniles. There are 50 manufactories of oil and candles. There were in 1829, 60 ships employed in whaling from this port. There are now 62 ships belonging to the port, and wharves are building for the whaling business. The value of this fleet as fitted, for sea, amounts to about 2,000,000 dollars."

WOOL. A letter from Georgia, enclosing five dollars for a new subscriber to the REGISTER, says:—"I remember to have heard an Englishman, in 1804, assert, that the time would never come when a sufficiency of wool would be produced in the United States to make a pair of stockings for every cat in them."

The woollen manufacture of the United States has now a greater value than was that of England when it became the pet and pride of the government and people of that country—both which were, and still are, ready to quarrel with all the world to protect and extend it! And, as to the Englishman's notion about the product of wool in the United States, we have good reasons for the belief that last year's crop of wool was worth about as much as that of cotton. But we do not wish to anticipate the facts soon to be disclosed through the committees of the late New York convention.

The little state of Vermont is believed now to have a million of sheep—the last “grand list” showed nearly 800,000. The flocks will be greatly increased next year. Vermont exported raw wool, of the last crop, worth a million of dollars—notwithstanding the large amount of her household and other manufactures of wool.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. A large party, consisting of the president and directors of the company, the mayor and city council, and a number of other gentlemen, took an excursion on this road to Parr's Spring Ridge, a distance of forty miles, on Saturday last—examined the inclined planes erecting there, dined at their leisure, and conveniently returned in the evening, at the rate of about 10 miles an hour—all delighted with the journey, and more and more gratified with the execution of this splendid and substantial work. In about two weeks the whole road will be opened to Frederick, and some interesting interchange of courtesies will take place between the worthy inhabitants and corporation of that city and those of our own.

The public stages, now proceeding to or from the west, pass these forty miles on the rail road.

The road, at Parr's Spring Ridge, is about 630 feet above mid-tide at Baltimore—or an average rise of nearly 16 feet in a mile.

We copy the following interesting sketches from the “American.”

“The inclined planes, as our readers are aware, are designed to accomplish, by means of stationary engines, the easy and rapid passage of Parr's Ridge, the dividing ridge between the waters of the Patapsco and Potomac, and the only point on the long line between Baltimore and Cumberland, where stationary power will be required. The apex of the ridge is more than eight hundred feet above tide. Most of the company ascended to the summit on foot, passing over the first and second inclined planes on their way. The visit was truly gratifying, and was calculated to make a strong impression as to the magnitude and difficulty of the work. The planes are four in number, two on the eastern, and two on the western side of the ridge. They are perfectly straight, for the purpose of attaining the greatest degree of efficiency. The first plane is 2,150 feet long, with a rise of one foot in twenty-six, and a total rise of a fraction over eighty feet. Then succeeds an exact level of 3,674 feet, terminating at the foot of the second plane. The level here spoken of crosses the Frederick turnpike at the thirty-first mile, the rail road being carried over the turnpike and a small stream running at its side, by a handsome double arched viaduct of stone. The length of the second plane is 3,000 feet, with a rise of one foot in thirty, or a total rise of one hundred feet. The upper end of the second plane terminates at the top of the ridge, where there is a level of six hundred feet, affording full space for the advantageous location and operation of the stationary engines. At the western end of the summit level, the third plane commences; its length is 3,200 feet, with a descent of one foot in twenty, or a total descent of one hundred and fifty-nine feet. Then succeeds a level of 3,687 feet, terminating at the head of the fourth plane. This last plane is 1,900 feet long, with a descent of one foot in twenty-three and a half, or a total descent of eighty-one feet.

“The united length of the four planes is nearly two miles, and the length of the levels between and attached to them more than a mile and a half, making the extent of this formidable work three and a half miles, one half of which is on each side of the apex of the ridge. It will have been observed, however, that the height overcome by the planes is not equal on both sides,—that on the eastern side being one hundred and eighty feet, and that on the western side two hundred and forty feet. The rails are laid down on various parts of the planes and levels, and every assurance is given that the passage of the ridge by horse power,—which is designed to be employed for the present,—may be accomplished in a about a fortnight from this time. The location and construction of the planes have been prosecuted under the immediate direction of Jonathan Knight, esq. the company's engineer-in-chief, who has thus given a new and striking evidence of his peculiar fitness for the responsible station confided to him. The passage of the ridge, we are confident, will be generally regarded as amongst the most interesting and imposing features presented on any part of the road. The contrast which the scene presents, after emerging from the narrow valley of the Patapsco and ascending to the summit of the ridge, is very striking. The wide and fertile valley of the Monocacy presents a beautiful and highly picturesque landscape, the interest of which is heightened by the more distant but not less distinct view of the Blue Ridge, the first of the range of the Alleghenies which meets the eye of the traveller on his journey westward.”

THE CHARLESTON AND HAMBURG RAIL ROAD—139½ miles of this road are under contract, and a great deal of the work has been done—637 persons are employed in forwarding it. It will be a highly profitable enterprise—and a most useful one.

THE GRAND OHIO CANAL IS NOW navigated from lake Erie to Chillicothe—two hundred and fifty-nine miles. What “jewel” like this can the “ancient dominion” shew? What like source of profit to her population has she?

“THE POINT OF ROCKS.” In the chancery of Maryland. The Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, vs. The Chesapeake and Ohio canal company.

Decreed, that the injunction heretofore granted in this case, be and the same is hereby confirmed and made perpetual. And that the defendants pay unto the complainants, the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, all their costs expended by them in this suit, including all the expenses of the survey.

[This case will go up to the court of appeals, and from thence, most probably, to the supreme court of the U. States, and the progress of our rail road, we suppose, be arrested until a final decision is had. We regret to feel compelled to say, that a dog-in-the-manger policy seems to prevail in respect to this matter, on the part of the canal company. We understand that both works, by making a joint concern, may pass the Point of Rocks for much less than double the sum that it will cost either, if going on separately.]

BRITISH FLOUR MARKET. The deceptive accounts from England, and the operation of her uncertain duty on bread stuffs imported, are calculated to have caused the loss of at least a million of dollars to American shippers of flour, in the present year. Nothing but half-starvation in John Bull will permit us to make fair exchanges even of bread, (and he rejects our meats altogether), for painted muslins or log-wood blue cloths.

MR. THOMAS RITCHIE. The following is extracted from a letter from one of the most respectable gentlemen of Virginia, addressed to the editor of the REGISTER:

“About the commencement of the current year, I became a subscriber to the ‘Richmond Enquirer’ mainly with a view of witnessing the progress of the battle, which, as I understood, was under contract between you and friend Ritchie. I am grieved, for the honor of my state, that my venerable fellow citizen has “backed out.” You will excuse the old gentleman however, in-as-much as he has been thrown into a peck of troubles by the splitting up of political parties. It has been the study of his life to keep in the majority; but, if things don't take a turn, it will puzzle even himself to find a safe resting place. His daily orison is “where the great numbers are found, THERE let me be also.”

“I join thousands of my countrymen in thanking you for your successful efforts in the promotion of the true interests of your country.”

“I don't intend to let Mr. Thomas Ritchie know, that the arduous duties which have devolved on me, as chairman of the permanent committee of the friends of domestic industry, (raised by the convention lately held at New York), will utterly prevent my proceeding into the long-expected discussion concerning the tariff question, generally,—which he promised many months ago to enter upon: for if he knows that—if he knows that my “hands are tied” for at least the remainder of the current year, he will lustily call out “who's afraid,” enlarge his paper, and challenge me to meet him, before a quick-speaking man could say "Jack Robinson!"—For this gentleman is ever valiant and prompt, when an adversary is weak or embarrassed; and will not "back-out" when "saw and sarten" of obtaining an advantage over an opponent—even by "striking him when down." He seldom "hits hardly" at any person who is up! That which he had trampled upon as a "nuisance," being elevated,—naturally obtains his homage. Such is his practical interpretation of obsta principis, at every "crisis!"

In a deep sense of humility, I dedicate the following pregnant paragraph to Mr. Thomas Ritchie—always orthodox!

Orthodoxy. The most exact description of this word I have ever seen, is that said to be given by Dr. Fothergill, a physician and Quaker preacher of England. As he was a noted man, multitudes went to hear him preach. According to the common practice of that order of people, he sat sometime in silence. He then rose, looked round on the assembly, and thus addressed them—"My friends, I have been thinking of one word of three syllables, and that one word is orthodox." Here he paused for some time, and then proceeded to say—"And, my friends, I have been thinking of one word of three syllables, which explains it, and that one word is uppermost." He proceeded no farther, but sat down. The assembly separated and went to their homes. Some at first complained of going so far to hear but two words, but afterwards, it was agreed, that the doctor delivered a very great and true sermon, and one easy to remember."

☞ The "Richmond Enquirer," always dissatisfied with the proceedings of persons unless himself directing them, has the following paragraph, concerning the late convention held at New York. [8th Nov.]

"In reading over the large list of delegates which attended this convention, and the states from which they went, we were desirous of obtaining one species of statistics, viz. the classes of employments to which they belonged—how many were manufacturers—how many farmers, (not of the woollen interest)—how many merchants—how many gentlemen who have written a book in favor of the tariff—in other words, how many delegates had a special interest in the subject, and how many were disinterested citizens. (1) The greater ease with which moneyed manufacturing capitalists can contrive for carrying their points, than the great body of the consumers, is specially noticed by the economists on the other side of the water, particularly Adam Smith. With how much more effect they oppose all changes against them, has been further illustrated by the saying of the English statesman, who compared the people to sheep quietly laying down to be fleeced—and these moneyed people to hogs—touch a single bristle of them, and you put the whole sty in an uproar.

"The N. Y. convention has shown no little sagacity in taking as many interests as they can into their concern. They are aware that their strength arises from the combination; and hence their anxiety to spread their net as wide as possible. Hats, cabinet ware, and coppers—have been enlisted, as well as cotton, wool and sugar. Sugar has not appealed in vain—and even salt has had its eloquent representatives. Nothing comes amiss to those who are strong only in their union. If good discipline be aided by numbers, they must prove irresistible. They are like regular troops. Increase their army, and they are invincible. Whereas the great body of the people are like your ill-trained militia—who fight to a disadvantage, because they want discipline. (2)

"What strikes us, however, as the most singular feature in the N. Y. proceedings, is the creation of a committee to examine the effects of the protecting system, upon the currency of the country.—Do they mean to make common cause with the bank of the U. States? to treat it as a part of the grand American System—and to club their interests and strength with those of that mammoth institution? (3)

"Whether it be so or not, we cannot but admire the strong police which they have thrown around their combination. Here we have a central committee—also the monarch of the memorial. Here we have two committees to be established in each of the tariff states—deputies not only to congress, as the other convention has, but an effort to enlist the legislatures of each tariff state in their behalf. Here also is a convention to meet in Cincinnati in January next—and another general convention in 1832, if called for by the central committee. In a word, their organization is very powerful; and it becomes the people to be on the alert—and avoid the fleecing as much as they can. "The Philistines be upon you." (4)

NOTES BY THE EDITOR OF THE REGISTER.

(1) I cannot tell. There were very many farmers, a considerable number of merchants, a large representation of mechanics and manufacturers, and perhaps one hundred gentlemen who were as "disinterested" as intelligent friends of the United States can be to the question, for or against it.—But I do not know what sort of furmes Mr. Ritchie would have, if "not of the woollen interest"—the crop of wool in New York having been worth, in the present year, at least twice as much as the tobacco crop of Virginia, and that of little Vermont more valuable than the rice crop of North Carolina. The "whole hog" idea about the "bristles," is entirely in character.

(2) If the "great body of the people" were represented by the enemies of the protecting system in congress, in 1828, they cannot be called "ill trained," for on that occasion George Kramer, C. C. Cambreleng and John Randolph voted for the duty of 10 cents per gallon on molasses, with the members from the south generally! Hats and cabinet ware, as well as cotton, wool and iron—and sugar, are protected. The mechanics have as deep an interest in the matter as the manufacturers—if a line may be drawn between the two interests, which it is not easy to do. In general, they are the same class of persons.

(3) To relieve Mr. Ritchie, we can inform him that the committee on the currency has no relation to the bank of the United States. It has entire reference to the influx of specie, when the domestic industry prospers, and its reflux when excessive importations of foreign goods ensue, and British agents succeed well in deranging the revenue.

(4) "The organization is very powerful"—and so it needs must be when it takes in, at least, the very least, two-thirds of all the citizens of the United States.—Will these hurt themselves? Who are the "Philistines?" Has population no relation to power? Let Mr. Ritchie take care of his own dominion! Virginia, if not now, will soon be a tariff state. The home market for all her products, except tobacco, is worth fifty times more than the foreign one. Massachusetts takes more of her flour than all Europe consumes. The people will find this out—after a while; having discovered that pantalons are more convenient than breeches, and that there are better estimates of value than pounds of tobacco!

I caution Mr. Ritchie the more confidently, because of what has happened in Maryland. A short time ago, we had only one tariff representative—a true and faithful one, indeed, Peter Little; now we have seven positive, one probable, and one only against us! And what is the strangest of all—the worthy and distinguished gentlemen who represent our two tobacco-growing districts, openly and manfully presented themselves to the people as "tariff-men," and, as such, were elected by triumphant majorities. Only think of that, Mr. Ritchie!

NEW YORK ENQUIRER. The editors of this paper, with their usual disregard of truth, made several attempts to sow dissensions among the members of the late New York Convention—thinking, perhaps, that the gentleman composing it "didn't know" them! But they spoke uselessly—and the result, and not the effort, must have dissatisfied them; for, had misrepresentation availed them, they would have been proud of it! Such is the morality of this press—the senior editor of which is a person "rewarded" by a high office under the government of the United States—and he is ably seconded by his mahogany-log and percussion-stroke coadjutor!—whose interview with the editor of the U. S. Telegraph has made all men laugh, whose love of the ridiculous transcended their feelings of contempt.

Many things appeared in the "Courier," which we see copied into some of the small country papers of New York, and certain in other states. We shall notice only the following from that paper of the 2nd inst.

"It is not a trifling incident in the history of the late tariff convention, that a majority of them applauded when Mr. Goddard justified the proceedings of the Hartford convention—a body deemed to have such reasonable designs against the liberties of the country, that the late Daniel D. Tompkins, then governor of this state, had positive instructions to hold his command in readiness to arrest the whole body for treason; and on one occasion, in pursuance of the discretionary power vested in him, actually wrote an order for their arrest! Yet an eulogy on this body was applauded by the late convention."

It is sufficient to say, that the preceding is false.

We shall carry-out this matter by simply stating a recent occurrence. The editors of the "Courier," pulling and blowing about the superiority of their own paper in the way of news, fabricated a number of articles, as it received by the ship Ajax—stating that Warsaw had not surrendered, &c. They circulated these manufactures, and some of the other editors accepted them as truths. But those of that old and respectable paper, the "New York Gazette," soon detected the fraud, and offered "fifty dollars reward for the detection of the villain who had been guilty of it." "In the course of the day," says the Gazette, "we were informed by several persons of respectability that James Watson Webb, one of the editors of the Courier and Enquirer, had declared that he 'wanted to claim of us the reward;' and we leave our readers to imagine our surprise on reading the following dun, in Webb's paper of yesterday morning.

(COPY.)

"We will thank friend Lang, of the Gazette, to send us over our $50 reward this morning, at 12 o'clock precisely."

At 12 yesterday, Webb's own hour, the following note, and the receipt enclosed, was handed to the said James Watson Webb. Up to the time of our paper going to press, no reply was received by either of our concerns.

Gazette office, Nov. 3, 1831.

"In compliance with a request in this morning's Courier and Enquirer, the enclosed receipt for fifty dollars is sent for Mr. Webb's signature. When the receipt is returned, properly signed, the fifty dollars shall be sent by the bearer of it.

LANG, TURNER & Co."

Copy of the receipt, intended for James Watson Webb's signature:

"Received, New York, Nov. 3d, 1831, of Lang, Turner & Co. fifty dollars, which sum they offered for 'the apprehension of the VILLAIN' who imposed upon them with the arrival of the ship Ajax; and I acknowledge myself to be the guilty person."

Mr. Webb ought to have "gone the whole"—signed the receipt, and pocketed the money!

THE SOUTH is even yet filled with rumors and agitations because of the slaves,—which are kept alive, or increased, by some few acts of individual violence. We apprehend, however, that an extensive operation has been going on to cause a general excitement among the slaves, and hence the people are much harassed, in many parts of the country—not knowing whom to trust in their condition in which they are placed. There have been many executions in Virginia and North Carolina, and some, we believe, in other states—about which little has been said in the public papers.

The famous Nat Turner was taken in Southampton county, on the 30th ult. His place of concealment was in a cave, not many miles from the theatre of his bloody exploits. He has been tried, found guilty and hung, and his body given to the surgeons.

Various severe measures are contemplated against the free people of color—some even in Maryland. There is a disposition to expel them from the slave-holding states: it can hardly be expected that the free states will receive them. What, then, is to be done? This is, indeed, an important question. Shall the unfortunate creatures be driven back and forth, and suffer the "penalty of the law," because not allowed to have a home any where? A strong and vigorous action in respect to this matter, will speedily force itself upon the public attention. It is not to be supposed that the present agitated state of the white population of the south, will, or can, be endured. It will be relieved by violence—if peaceful measures are not adopted. We do not wish to go into particulars—but society is placed in a very distressing condition, in many parts of the south, filled with doubts, and alarmed by the most trifling and really harmless occurrences. It especially becomes a free people of color to be guarded in their conduct and conversation. They may do much harm to the whites—but, in so doing, seal their own destruction.

Several vessels are about to depart with passengers for Liberia. The export of slaves, unlawfully, is large. Their reception, it is thought, will be denied in some of the states.

It is charged against the slaves lately condemned, that a number of them were "preachers of the gospel!"—and that those who had been the most kindly treated and were the best informed, were most prominent. The bearing of these remarks is easily seen, and will add to the burthen of suffering.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION. John B. Morris, esq. has been appointed to represent the city of Baltimore in the convention which is to assemble in this city in December next, in place of William Hunt, esq. who resigned his appointment on accepting the anti-masonic nomination for the presidency of the U. States.

A LITERARY CONVENTION was opened at New York on the 5th inst. and continued several days. On motion of Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Adams, late president of the United States, was called to the chair. The business transacted is interesting to literature and science—but we cannot go into details of the proceedings. The meeting was numerous, and highly respectable for character and talent.

DR. RANDOLPH, late clerk in the war department, has been appointed "general messenger"—(so it is stated), to our ministers in Europe.

MAZON EATON has partaken of a public dinner at Nashville—the mayor of the city, presided, assisted by the speakers of the senate and house of representatives, the legislature being in session. On being toasted, major E. rose and addressed the meeting, returning his thanks, and presenting a general view of the course of the administration, and concluded by offering the following sentiment—

The members of the general assembly of Tennessee, and the inhabitants of Nashville. United to-day around the festive board—they know and feel no other rivalry, than as good and faithful citizens, to serve with fidelity their country and maintain its best interests.

One of the regular toasts was in these terms—

Woman. Where woman is the theme, pained by the hand and blistered the tongue, that could be raised but to defend her or speak but to praise her.

The following were among the volunteers—

By Dixon Allen, esq. of the house of representatives. Unworthy indeed is that spirit of party which would own its success to woman's ruin.

By Capt. P. H. Newell. Hon. John H. Eaton—He has perilled his all in the cause of re-sterling integrity and political honesty have concentrated on him all the slander and abuse of disappointed ambition—he has suffered much, but has gloriously triumphed—Tennessee will not forget to reward him.

By Thomas J. Campbell, clerk of the house of representatives. A resolution in favor of electing Andrew Jackson to the presidency a second time.

And the question being taken on agreeing thereto, it was unanimously determined in the affirmative.

By James D. Smith, of Jackson county. The Hon. John H. Eaton—His warm reception at Nashville is but the echo of Tennessee's undivided voice.

By Francis Campbell. Jackson and the re-organized cabinet—behold how good and how pleasant it is to dwell together in unity.

By Mr. Robinson of the house of representatives. Hickory oil—the best antidote against Kentucky Clay.

By Gen. Cheatham of the house of representatives. The bank of the United States—it has given us a sound currency—beware of its prostration.

By W. H. Bedford. May all aspirants to office under the cloak of anti-masonry be nullified and meet with the fate of the British below New Orleans.

By capt. T. P. Minor. Martin Van Buren—"The great magician," whose wand has been so potent in promoting the interests of his country.

By McClellan of the senate. The president of the U. States—the anchor of hope against a proud and monied aristocracy, whose mighty engine is the United States bank.

By col. Wyly, of the senate. The present bank of the United States and the tariff—the best policy of our government requires a modification of the latter, and a refusal to re-charter the former.

MR. RANDOLPH. This strange ex-minister from St. Petersburg, who was too sick to do business—too sick to call at Washington on his way home, too sick to do any thing—has, as we learn by the Lynchburg Virginian, made a three hours speech to his "dear constituents." It is now just about nineteen years since the legislature of Georgia repudiated his name, (which had been given to one of the counties of the state), because of his "desertion of correct principles," and that his name "was odious to every republican citizen;" when also the venerable Mr. Ritchie called him a "nuisance and a curse"—but now it is "orthodox" to regard him as almost "a god"—because that he talks: Whatever hath he done but talk? The idea that such a man would attend to business, was hardly less ridiculous than that the legacy of £10, which some one left to pay off the national debt of England.

CON. PORTER has arrived in the U. S. ship John Adams at Constantinople, as charge to Turkey. The ship was permitted to pass the Dardanelles, and a letter from Smyrna, dated Sept. 20, says that he had had an audience with the grand seignor, and that the negotiation had terminated favorably. It is considered as a material change in the etiquette of the court of Constantinople, that a diplomatic agent, under the rank of an ambassador, should have obtained an audience with the "brother of the sun and moon," who begins to find out that the stand-still policy is reducing the comparative power of his empire—as we hope that some other persons, much nearer home, may speedily do! The spirit of improvement is abroad—and dominion follows it.

MR. POINDEXTER. The official station of this gentleman, induces us to copy the following letter from him to gen. David. Dickson.

Warm Springs, Va. August 13, 1831.

Dear sir:—I received your favor from Jackson, addressed to me at Washington city, and am for the first time informed, that you had not seen my letter addressed to you at Vicksburg.

You state, that an impression was made on the public mind by the contents of that letter, or some other matter—that I have deserted the Jackson cause. There is no foundation for the rumor unless my admission to print, against the known rights of my constituents is, considered a desertion of that cause. I cannot consent to worship men; I bow only at the shrine of principles, and when these are departed from by any man in power, be he Jackson, Calhoun, Clay or any one else, I depart from him so far as his actions conflict with the good of the country, and the rights of my constituents. If this is heresy, then am I a heretic; but I know the people of Mississippi too well to suppose for a moment, that they wish me to sacrifice them on the altar of personal ambition or private interests. So far as gen. Jackson conforms his action to the constitution and the good of the American people, he will have my hearty support, and no farther. No honest man would expect or desire more. Gen. Jackson has done much good for the country, which I duly appreciate, and award him my thanks for the benefits resulting from these measures; but it is undeniable that he lends his ear too readily to individuals near his person, who are incompetent to advise him, and unworthy of public confidence; they sometimes lead him into errors which no one deprecates more than I do, because they operate against the cause which I have warmly espoused, and tend to bring into power men whose principles I cannot approve. Such men speculate upon the capital of the "old hero" without paying interest, and it will be well, if they do not exhaust the principal before the end of his term. You have doubtless seen all that has passed at Washington, concerning the late cabinet, &c. These events have withdrawn many of the warm supporters of gen. Jackson, but if the pending contest for the presidential chair is confined to Clay, my opinion is the president will be re-elected.

JUNIOR MARSHALL, we are happy to learn from the Philadelphia papers, has so far recovered, that next week he intends to hold the circuit court for the southern district of Virginia, from which he was never known to be absent since his appointment to the bench.

GEN. VAN CORTLANDT. From the Westchester, N. Y. Herald, of Nov. 8. We have to lament the death of another distinguished patriot of the revolution, gen. PAUL VAN CORTLANDT, of this county, died at his residence in the town of Cortlandt, on Sunday, the 5th instant, at 8 o'clock in the evening, aged 82 years. He was at the time of his decease, the senior surviving officer, in this country, of the army of the revolution. During the revolutionary war he was the companion of Washington and Lafayette. He had the command of a regiment in the continental army in the line of the state of New York, and served his country in that capacity honestly and faithfully, enduring every hardship and privation, until the close of the war. He was at the taking of Burgoyne, at Saratoga, and distinguished himself as a gallant officer at the battle of Bemans Heights, previous to the surrender of Burgoyne. He was one of the members from this county of the state convention, held at Poughkeepsie, in 1788, for the adoption of the constitution of the United States, and his vote was recorded in favor of that sacred instrument, which was carried in this state by a majority of only three. He was afterwards elected by his fellow citizens a member congress of the United States, and served his country in that capacity for several years in succession, with much ability. He was remarkable for his personal dignity,—and combined two traits of character seldom united in the same person, loftiness of manner with urbanity of disposition. No man was held superior in estimation, either on account of amiableness of manners, or benevolence of heart.

A COMPLIMENT! The editor of the New Hampshire Patriot says—"We had rather be the writer of Mr. Eaton's appeal, than be the author of any thing or every thing which has fallen from the pens of J. Q. Adams, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Edward Everett, John Sergeant and William Wirt."

FLORIDA. It will be recollected that the governor of this territory, having pronounced a tie between colonels White and Gadupis, as its delegate in congress, ordered a new election; but it seems that on the day appointed, some places of voting were neither attended by the judges of the election nor the people. At others, however, they were partially attended, and the votes appear to have been nearly unanimous for col. White.

FAYETTEVILLE. A meeting of the sufferers by the fire which swept down the town of Fayetteville, in North Carolina, in May last, was held at that place on the 26th ult. The committee appointed on behalf of the unfortunate sufferers, submitted to the meeting a statement of the amount received from the several states, towns, and individuals. The gross amount is a little upwards of $92,000. A committee was appointed to make a suitable acknowledgment to the contributors, for their great liberality and kindness.

[A list of the places from whence the money was received, we suppose, will be published. It ought to be.]

COTTON. The following summary views are abstracted from the "New York Shipping and Commercial Register."

[We are of opinion, though the preceding statement may be as correct as the nature of things will admit of, and have no doubt that it has been made up with great care—that the given amount of the production and domestic consumption must both be considerably short of their real quantities. Much cotton is consumed in the household manufactures of the states in which it is grown—much is shipped from the small ports and not counted—much is carried from Tennessee, &c. inland, and reaches Baltimore, &c. and large quantities ascend the Mississippi and Ohio, for the use of the western factories and people—a part of which also arrives on the seaboard, by wagons.]

BRITISH EXPORTS OF GOLD AND SILVER. A London paper of September 24, says—The exportation of the precious metals continues on a most extensive scale. Since the commencement of the present month, the entries for the shipment of gold and silver coin at the custom house, have exceeded 1,500,000 ounces. The entries for Hamburg have been 560,000 ounces of silver, and 26,000 ounces of gold coin and bars. For Calais, 270,000 ounces of silver, and 15,000 ounces of gold coin. For Rotterdam, 20,000 ounces of silver, and 33,000 ounces of gold coin. For St. Petersburg, 210,000 ounces of silver coin, and for Riga, 10,000 ounces of silver coin. The value of the gold and silver coin and bars, entered for exportation, is nearly a million and a half sterling, in addition to the very large amounts entered for exportation during the previous month.

[Why these exports have taken place is not suggested.]

HORTENSE BEAUCHARNAIS. It appears from the celebrated debate which commenced in the French chamber of deputies on the 21st September, that this lady, the daughter of the late empress Josephine, took refuge in France when the revolution broke out in Italy. M. Pevier, the president of the council, in his speech, thus alludes to the circumstance. It will be recollected that one of her sons joined the revolutionists, and that his life left a sacrifice to his exertions in their cause.

"M. Mangum has uttered mysterious language relative to a mother and child in the rue de la Paix. Will, gentleman, I have a secret to reveal. An unfortunate woman, compromised by one of her children, was driven from Italy. She took refuge with a sick child at Paris, where she was without resources. She applied through a sole medium, to the king, saying, 'The laws condemn my child and myself to death. I throw myself upon your generosity. I could only escape in passing by France. I give you my word, as soon as my child is better, I will quit the country.' As a minister, I was bound to respect the name of a man whose statue the king had given orders to be restored in the Place Vendôme. I made known the circumstance to the king, and succor was sent to her, upon her giving her word that she would proceed to England. Her promise was fulfilled. Gentlemen, I did not think it my duty to denounce this woman to the tribunals." (cheers.)

BRITISH IRON MANUFACTURES. From the United States Gazette. The following is an extract of a letter from a highly respectable source in England, to a house in this city, the contents at the present time are especially deserving notice.

At a meeting of the British iron masters held on the 10th August, 1831. It was resolved, 1st. That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the quantity of iron made, has for some time exceeded and still does exceed the demand.

2dly. That the consequence of such excess has been so to reduce the price of iron, that it has ceased to remunerate the iron masters for the capital employed.

3dly. That to restore the trade to a sound and healthy state, it is the opinion of this meeting, that a diminution of the make of iron should be effected to the extent of 25 per cent. on the quantity produced by each work, when in full operation, and that such diminution should continue for the space of twelve months.

4thly. That it should be recommended to the makers of iron in the respective districts of South Wales, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Yorkshire, Derbyshire and Scotland, to appoint committees equitably to arrange the make of the respective works, so that the said reduction of 25 per cent. may be effected, and that the committees so formed communicate with each other, and report to the chairman of the present meeting; when the object is effected—which report, it is requested, may be made by the 21st September next, so that he may call a general meeting of trade, to determine on future proceedings.

It is stated to us upon authority not to be doubted, that a single house in England, concerned entirely in the iron trade, and especially in the shipment of bar iron to this country, has recently failed for one million pounds sterling.

LIQUID SUGAR. New Orleans, Oct. 22. We have to-day good news for the sugar planters of Louisiana. The secretary of the treasury has fully sustained Mr. Gordon, the collector of this port, in his attempt to prevent the introduction of dissolved sugar into the United States, under the name of sirap de batterie, upon the payment of fifteen per cent duty ad valorem, which is equivalent to about one-half cent per pound, upon the sugar into which it is, immediately upon its arrival, reconverted.

Treasury department, October 6th, 1831.

SIR:—I have received your letter of the 20th ult with its enclosures relative to the attempts alleged to have been made in your district, to evade the payment of the duty on sugar, by introducing that article in a liquid state. Upon the view of the subject which these papers present, there appears to have been justifiable cause for the seizures made by you and by pursuing that course, you will, at all events, have afforded an opportunity for obtaining a judicial decision on the questions involved in the case.

If other importations of the article are made, and the importers are willing to enter and pay duty on it as sugar, it may be admitted to entry accordingly. Similar instructions will be given to other collectors. I am, very respectfully, your ob't. serv't.

LOUIS McLANE,

Secretary of the treasury.

Martin Gordon, esq. collector of the customs, N. O.

STROVE TERMS! The Louisville Journal says that the "Globe" speaks of the ex-secretaries, as "constituted into a cabal, and concocting a plot, which, in venom and malignity, in villainy and turpitude, might defy the condensed corruption concentrated in the crucible of hell, by the fiend-like ingenuity of the spirit of the damned."

THE KIRK OF SCOTLAND. There are under the general assembly 16 synods, 79 presbyteries, 952 parishes, and 987 ordained ministers—heads of 39 parishes called parliamentary, and 61 chapels of ease; total 1,052 congregations and 1,087 ministers. Of all these, (except in the chapels of ease), there are only five ministers who are selected by those who pay them!—581 being appointed by individual noblemen, and 289 by the crown, the rest by town councils, &c. The salaries of the ministers, however, have the merit of being moderate—the highest does not exceed 600*l.* and the lowest is worth 150*l.* besides the use of a house and four acres of land: thus several of the fat ones of the English church consume as much of the fruits of the laboring people as fifty of the best provided for clergymen of the church of Scotland, with hardly doing a fiftieth part of the duty of the latter.

CONSTANTINOPLE. Nearly the whole of Pera has been reduced to ashes—about 4,000 houses being destroyed, on the 28th August, including all the palaces—except that of the Austrian minister. The violence of the wind spread the flames so rapidly, that most of the moveable property was also destroyed.

YOUTHFUL DEPRAVITY. In looking over some not very recent London papers, we were struck with the recorder of London's report to the king, of prisoners under sentence of death in Newgate, after the last February sessions. Of the 27 persons capitally convicted, 19 were of and under the age of 23; of these one was only aged 10, another 12, another 14, another 16, two, (one of them a girl), 17, two 19 and several 20. Of the 27, only one was ordered for execution—Ellis aged 23.

OHIO. The Cincinnati Gazette says that the senate of the state consists of 16 Jackson and 20 anti-Jackson members, and the house of representatives of 30 Jackson and 42 anti-Jackson.

KENTUCKY. The legislature of this state met on the 7th inst. Mr. J. J. Crittenden was elected speaker of the house of representatives, without opposition, and Mr. B. S. Todd re-elected clerk, having no opponent—as was Mr. Stonestreet, clerk of the senate. All these are "national republicans." The election of a senator of the United States was assigned for an early day, and we shall hear of it speedily.

GEORGIA. Mr. Lumpkin was installed at Milledgeville on the 9th inst. the votes being counted, it was ascertained that his majority was 1,442. He had been received and was escorted into the town, by an "immense cavalcade," which seems much to have offended his opponents.

On taking the oath of office, he delivered the following address.

Fellow citizens. Called by the voice of the people of Georgia, to the first office within their gift, I approach the responsibilities of the station with unaffected humility and diffidence. But for a firm reliance on that wisdom which comes from above, and an unshaken confidence in the virtue and intelligence of my constituents, I should shrink from the magnitude of the arduous and complicated duties of the office confided.

The basis of my political creed is confidence in the unofficial sovereign people. They are the only legitimate source of all governmental power, and I believe them to be not only capable of self government, but of wise self-government. Therefore, my only hope of retaining their confidence, will be in a faithful discharge of my public duty.

To this station I bring no spirit of party animosity, or political strife. I have no pledges to redeem, nor vindictive feelings to gratify. I am now the servant of all.

I avail myself of this occasion to re-affirm what I stated to the public in February last—that "it is my most ardent desire to see the whole people of Georgia united on the great subjects of political interests and principle, which are inseparably connected with liberty and the perpetuation of our federal union. 'The federal union must be preserved;' and it can only be done by the general and state governments confining themselves within their respective constitutional spheres."

Pure patriotism demands of every public functionary a voluntary sacrifice of all political prejudices, which may stand opposed to the public interest. Thus far I make a free will offering of my own, on the altar of the public good.

In the presence of that portion of my fellow citizens here assembled; and in that of Heaven, I now proceed to bind myself by the solemnities of the most sacred obligation, to discharge with zeal and fidelity, the duties of the high trust to which I have been called.

ITEMS—ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE ARTS, MANUFACTURES, INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, AND RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Imlay, of Baltimore, has manufactured two splendid cars for the West Branch Schuylkill rail road. He has now thirty such cars under construction for different roads, at his extensive establishment.

Patent planing machines are in use at New York and Philadelphia, and one is about to be erected in Baltimore. One of these machines prepares from four to five hundred planks for the floors of houses, &c. in a day, with greater accuracy than they can be prepared by hand.

Casks. The staves and heading for casks are fitted with astonishing rapidity, by a machine at Wareham, Massachusetts.

Cotton goods, to the value of 1,348,183 dollars, at their present diminished prices, were exported last year. The exports of the current year will much exceed that sum.

Gold. They are finding gold in Autauga county, Ala. which is thought to be as rich in the precious metal as any county in Georgia or North Carolina. Hands get from $1 50 to $3 per day.

Ginseng is dug plentifully in Western Virginia; dealers give 25 cents per pound, for the dried root, by which the digger can get 1½ to 2 dollars per day. 3 pounds of green making one of dry. One root was dug lately, 3 inches round and 11 long, weighing 8 ounces.

Lead, &c. A rich mine of lead, mixed with copper, some zinc and a quantity of silver, has been discovered in Lubec, Maine. It is said to be inexhaustible. Many tons of ore have been taken out.

The great Ohio canal is unavigable southwardly to Chillicothe—and a rapid rise of property in that town has followed. The "American System" Ox, the largest ever seen in America, was exhibited at the festival hall, when the first boat reached Chillicothe.

Utina and Michigan. The cost of uniting the lake to the river by a canal, is estimated at only 125,925 dollars. The increased value of lands on the main line of such a canal, would pay this sum many times over.

American types. The Kingston Jamaica Chronicle (twice the Courant for "appearing in a full suit of American types." The only wonder is, how they could ever get them there. Perhaps John Bull, in his double and treble fortifications for his own manufactures, never dreamed that the Yankees could make printing types.

(Boston Patriot.)

Nails. One thousand brads and sparrow bills can be made in one minute, with the machines used by the Howell Works co. and 15,000 could be made; but the machines were not considered strong enough. The machines were made by the foreman, Mr. Charles Makepeace.

(N. Y. Gaz.)

Boat building. From the best information we can collect, there will not be less than from eight to nine thousand tons built upon the Ohio this year; and could hands have been had, there would probably have been at least two thousand tons more built in this city than there were. Among those building at Pittsburgh are the Mohawk of seven hundred tons and the Baltic of five hundred.

(Cincinnati Adv.)

Grapes. Mr. Garrett, of New Garden, Penn. has one acre of land in grape-vines, 3 years old. He sold as many last season, at Philadelphia, as brought him $200!

MORRIS CANAL. It gives us pleasure in publishing the following letter addressed to Mr. Colden, the president of the company, to announce the completion of this canal.

Greenwich, November 4, 1851.

To Cadwallader D. Colden, esq.

Dear sir—Permit me to announce to you the safe return of the boat upon which we were passengers to Newark. She reached the short level at the bend of No. 9 on Monday last, where she was detained a day for want of water, which was occasioned by a small breach upon that level; a part of her cargo was discharged here yesterday, and this morning we despatched her to Easton, where she discharged the balance and returned to our basin, where she is now ready to receive a load of flour, which we intend forwarding on Monday next. I am gratified that the passage of the first boat from Easton to Newark, and her return from thence to the waters of the Delaware, where she was also first to deliver a cargo, has been made under such favorable circumstances as to reflect the highest credit upon the operation of every thing connected with the canal. The planes were all in order, and performed admirably. Two boats belonging to the company, laden with coal, passed up the Delaware this day, and a private boat, called the "Walk-n-the-Water," also passed during the afternoon. Very respectfully yours,

F. GREEN.

BRIEF NOTICES.

The English clergy. Sir William Blackstone, in his commentaries on the laws of England, says, that if the English parliament had not passed their "restraining acts, the clergy would have, by that time, owned every foot of land in England."

The mail coach. which left New York on the 6th inst. at 3 o'clock, P. M. arrived at Philadelphia in eight hours forty-two minutes, with eight passengers, including the driver, and much baggage and the mails—in all computed at 2,500 lbs. This was "smart" travelling. The stoppages were included in the time.

Mr. Emmet's monument. Yesterday an immense column of white marble, from the Westchester quarry, intended as a monument to the memory of the late Thomas Addis Emmet, was moved, with labor, from the foot of Fulton street on the North river, to Broadway. A pediment of the same material, about six feet square, has been laid in St. Paul's church yard near the corner of Fulton street, on which the column is to be erected. The weight, we were informed, is 27 tons.

(N. Y. Cour.)

Died, in St. Mary's county, Maryland, capt. Michael R. Carroll, late of the U. S. navy, aged about 63 years. He was a mulshippman, and selected, by Decatur, to aid in the destruction of the Philadelphia frigate, at Tripoli.

—, in Lenox, Mass. William Walker, esq. aged 80, of whom Gov. Lincoln has said that he was the "most venerable man that he ever saw." He was a soldier in 1775. In Anne Arundle county, Md. capt. Charles Crocoll, aged 69. At Otsego, N. Y. Samuel Hyatt, aged 83. In Amecuborg, Mass. Benjamin Merrill, aged 84. In Shelburne, Mass. capt. John Fellows, aged 80. At Walpole, N. H. capt. Joseph Fay, aged 69. In Merce, Maine, capt. Benjamin Baxter, aged 74. At his seat near New York, gen. Philip Van Cortlandt, aged 82. At Beacon Castle, Jesse Moore, aged 83. At York, Penn. col. George Spangler, aged 73. At Worcester, Mass. capt. Peter Slater, aged 72. At Providence, R. I. maj. gen. Barton—all soldiers of the revolution.

Post offices were first established in Paris, 1402; in England, 1581; in Germany, 1461; in the Turkish dominions, 1740; regulated by Parliament, and made general in England, 1656; and in Scotland, 1685.

The great fire. Accounts from Constantinople state that the losses caused by the conflagration of Pera amount to above 30,000,000 of Spanish pistas (about 160,000,000 of francs), or above £6,000,000 sterling.

St. Clair's defeat. It was forty years on the 4th inst. (November), since gen. St. Clair was defeated by the Indians and British, in the western territory, which then was a wilderness, but which now is a populous and flourishing part of our country. In less than half that time hence, the state of Ohio will be second to none in the union.

The Roman Catholic church in Sheriff street, New York, was totally destroyed by fire, a few days since. It is supposed to be the work of an incendiary. It had recently been repaired at an expense of $5,000, and was insured for $8,000, but was mortgaged to a still greater amount. One of the contiguous buildings was also destroyed, and three others injured, two badly, and one slightly.

Ancient coins. A Spanish peasant, in the environs of Lugo, in Galicia, tilling his field, lately found two earthen jars, containing several pounds weight of gold coin, of the emperors Nero, Vespasian, Adrian, and Trajan. Though they have been buried for so many centuries, they are as fresh and perfect as if they had just been issued from the mint. Each coin weighs about two drachms and a half, and the gold is of the first quality. [Madrid, August 30.]

Mrs. Elizabeth Honoria Frances Lambe, who had been eight times married, lately died in the island of St. Helena, aged 110 years, 4 months.

A buck. The Bethany, Wayne county Penn. Inquirer says:—

The largest buck within the recollection of our oldest hunters, was shot on the 10th instant, in Lebanon township. He has attracted the attention of hunters in that neighborhood for about 5 years past, on account of his extraordinary size, and has been repeatedly shot at, but his hunters escaped shot free. He was started on the runaway, and was greeted with a fire from two of the hunters, but, (to use the language of Big-Hunter), "Mr. William J. Shiklis, of Philadelphia, did the job." The deer weighed before he was dressed, three hundred and sixty five pounds!!! When dressed his meat weighed 201 lbs. tallow, 10 lbs. hide, 23 lbs. 6 oz.

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

The following is the substance of the beautiful and impressive address of the rev. Mr. SCHROEDER, (late of Baltimore, but for a considerable time having charge of a numerous congregation at New York), on closing the labors of the late convention of the friends of domestic industry, in the city last named.

PRAYER.

O GOD, the ruler of the rulers of the earth, in whom we live and move, and have our being, look down upon us from thy dwelling-place, and hear our prayer.

We own thy hand in all our blessings. It is Thou who has watched over us from our infancy as a nation. It was Thou who didst nerve the arm, and guide the counsels, of our venerated fathers when in a national convention, such as this, they solemnly declared that they would be free, and with their blood sealed the declaration. Thou didst enable them to form the sacred bond of union, which ties together our sovereign, independent states. Thou didst direct them, when they laid the deep and broad foundation of our glorious national superstructure,—the admiration of the civilized world.

Upon the wide extent of our goodly heritage, Thou hast poured out the fruits of peace and plenty. O, let the nations of the earth all learn to imitate our great example; that the intelligence, the happiness, the freedom, of our blessed country may be theirs.

Continue to us, gracious God, thy blessings. O, perpetuate the hallowed spirit of our forefathers. May the wisdom of their institutions be revered forever. May science, literature, and the arts be fostered; and may our citizens, trained up to virtue, love and honor God, through JESUS CHRIST, our Lord.

O, bless the RULERS of our nation. Let them never go astray, allured by novelties. Give them wisdom from above, to keep inviolate our rights—replenish them with the grace of thy Holy Spirit; incline them to thy will; and make them in all things such as thou wouldst have them to be.

Bless the PEOPLE of the land. May peace and prosperity be continued to us. Teach us duly to appreciate whatever thou hast given us—to love what is our own, because it is our own. Teach us to trace up all our blessings unto THEE, the source of every good and perfect gift. O save us from the ills of luxury and vice. Suppress fraud; encourage honest industry. Give an impulse to all the latent energies of our commonwealth. May the people love the truth. And may it be engraven deep upon the hearts of all, truth is great and it will triumph. O, that all the freemen of our sovereign states may truly love the nation's maxims—united we stand, divided we fall. Forbid that any ruthless hand may ever cut the sacred tie of our brotherhood; but, under thy protecting care, and gladdened by thy smiles, let the people praise thee, O God, yea, let ALL the people praise thee.

Bless this great national convention. May their deliberations advance the cause of useful knowledge and of general happiness. Let the members be all blessed of THEE, in the prosecution of the duties which have been respectively intrusted to them. O, preserve their lives, their health, their intellectual faculties. May they be enabled to submit sound facts to the sober judgment of the nation; to develop the best interests of our civil union, and to promote thy glory. And at last, may we all who are now before THEE, meet in the general assembly of those whose names are written in heaven,—there to meditate upon THINE attributes, to glorify THY name, and share the fulness of joy in THY presence, for evermore. All this we ask in the name of JESUS CHRIST our Lord, and may the grace of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, the love of God, and the fellowship of the HOLY GHOST, be with us all evermore. AMEN.

THE LITERARY CONVENTION.

The literary convention in New York closed its session on Saturday the 5th Nov. The business done was summed up by the president in his farewell speech. Votes of thanks were passed to the president, vice presidents, and secretaries. No further business being presented, Dr. Matthews adverted to the harmony that had pervaded the convention—the importance of the objects that had been the subject of deliberation, and as it had been opened by imploring the blessing of heaven, he hoped it would be closed in like manner, by prayer for the influence of Divine Providence in guiding their proceedings to a favorable issue.

The president [Mr. Adams] rose, as he said, to return his thanks to the members of the convention, not only for their kind partiality in placing him in the chair, but for the further honor they had done him by the vote they had just passed. He had come hither upon an invitation from the committee of arrangements of the last year. It so happened that he was unacquainted with the proceedings of the convention, and knew very little of what was to be brought forward at the present. But he should do injustice to his feelings were he not to say that he had seen and heard things during the meeting, which had made the present one of the happiest weeks of his life. He had heard things which he ought to have known, but of which he was totally ignorant. Other things he had heard, which he knew partially before, but which had nevertheless imparted additional information. On the first day of the convention a communication was read, of a most interesting character, on the state of learning in Colombia—a country with which we are connected by the most important relations of daily increasing interest. The subject of establishing a college at Athens had been introduced, carrying back wisdom to the fountain of inspiration; and a report proposing to make the Bible a classic in our literary institutions—thus uniting Ionian's streams with "Sidon's fount, that flowed fast by the oracles of God." On another occasion he had learned the condition and prospects of an institution at West Point, which, although upon a very different foundation from this, was yet of an interesting character. A new and practical system of education had been submitted, which was spoken of in terms of the highest admiration; and this morning a report had been read on the establishment of professorships of history in our universities, which he deemed of high importance. The convention had also agreed to found a literary institution of a permanent nature, to unite men of literature and science in this state with those of like character in every part of the union. These things must be gratifying to all who feel an interest in the welfare of the human race, and are calculated to inspire their most sanguine hopes as to the future condition of man. Under these circumstances, we may well return our thanks to heaven for the past, and solicit its blessings for the future.

An appropriate and expressive prayer was then made by the rev. Dr. Yates, and then the convention adjourned sine die.

MR. CLAY.

On the 18th ult. Mr. Clay was invited by the citizens of Vincennes to partake of a public dinner. We subjoin the correspondence which took place on the occasion:—

Vincennes, Oct. 18, 1831.

SIR: At a public meeting of a number of the citizens of Knox county, on the 1st instant, it was intimated as probable that our town would soon be honored by your passing visit; and feeling a lively sense of gratitude and respect for the statesman who has contributed so eminently to promote his country's prosperity and glory, the citizens present spontaneously determined on inviting you to a public dinner.

It is with feelings peculiarly pleasing to us that we set as a committee on behalf of said meeting to congratulate and welcome your arrival in Vincennes, and to request of you to appoint a day when all our fellow citizens may be honored with your company, to partake of a public dinner.

With high respect, we have the honor to be your obedient servants. (Signed by the committee.)
The hon. Henry Clay.

Vincennes, Oct. 18, 1831.

GENTLEMEN: I receive with very great pleasure the congratulations which, as a committee of a number of the citizens of Knox, you have done me the honor, in your note of this day, to tender, on the occasion of my passage through this town. I reciprocate all your friendly feelings on this incidental meeting; and it would afford me peculiar satisfaction to accept the compliment of a public dinner, which you have so obligingly offered, if I did not feel restrained by considerations connected with the existing relation to the community in which I have been placed. During the late administration, and for some time after its close, I occasionally attended public dinners for the double purpose of meeting my fellow citizens at the festive board, and of vindicating my character there, which had been unjustly reproached. But although it was my duty and my right to defend myself, those occasions were never sought, never prompted, nor always embraced by me. If there be any who are not convinced that great injustice was done me, I must regret it, but I can do no more to undeceive them. The pleasure which I derive from freely mixing with my fellow citizens, at public entertainments, would induce me to continue to accept them, when offered, but for the reason already intimated. From the period my name was presented, by a convention in Kentucky, to the public consideration, for a high office, I have not accepted, nor, whilst it remains thus before the public, shall I accept, any public entertainment tendered on my own account.

I hope, gentlemen, you will approve the motive which governs me. A departure from my resolution, were it admissible, could be made in no place sooner than in Vincennes, endeared to me as the residence of valued friends, and by the grateful recollections of a former visit.

With many thanks for the too flattering estimate of my public services made by the meeting which you represent, and for the friendly terms in which you have communicated its sentiments, I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your obedient servant,
H. CLAY.

THE JUDICIAL OFFICE.

For many years we have noticed with great dissatisfaction, if not disgust, minglings of persons high in judicial authority with the parties or partisans of the day—as being fatal to that purity which should prevail on the bench, and that confidence which it is so needful that the people should have in their judges—on both which the peace and safety of society so much depends.

We have, therefore, great pleasure in publishing the following note from Judge Summers, of Virginia—a gentleman distinguished for his learning, not less than his patriotism and careful attention to the right.

Charleston, 15th Oct. 1831.

Maj. James Bream:

DEAR SIR—I understand you are presiding in a meeting of my fellow-citizens of Kanawha, assembled for the purpose of appointing delegates to the Baltimore convention, and I have observed in a late number of the Banner, that at a similar meeting in Wood county, I was, with two other gentlemen, designated to that service. Under those circumstances, I deem it due to those whose respect and kind feelings have given me a place in this nomination, as well as to my countrymen, now met for a like purpose and who may be disposed to concur in the Parkersburg nomination, to apprise them that, with all proper deference and respect to the opinions and wishes of my fellow citizens, I cannot, consistently with my views of duty, engage in the service proposed.

The situation in which I am placed, has ever formed a strong inducement to avoid, as far as practicable, any participation in the political or party measures by which my fellow citizens are often animated, and frequently divided. This course, prescribed by delicacy as well as duty, I think ought not to be departed from on the present occasion.

Be pleased to communicate these sentiments to the meeting over which you preside, with assurances of the high respect which I entertain both for you and them.

L. SUMMERS.

THE IMPRISONED MISSIONARIES.

A gentleman in New Jersey, in a letter of recent date, addressed to the editors of the N. Y. Observer, says:

"I yesterday had the pleasure of an interview with a gentleman recently from Alabama, who has resided ten years among the Cherokee Indians in that state. On his way he visited rev. S. A. Worcester, and Dr. Elihu Butler, missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. in the penitentiary at Milledgeville, Georgia. He related a few particulars respecting their situation, which may be interesting and useful for Christians to know, as it will aid them in commending these sufferers and their present associates to the throne of grace.

"Mr. Worcester is employed mostly as a mechanic at the bench, and Dr. Butler at the lathe wheel. They of course adopt the dress of the prison, made of very coarse cotton. The initials of their names are painted in large red letters across their breast and waist. Thus attired, they perform their daily task with quiet conscience in company with felons. Their fare, though coarse, is wholesome, and their health is good. The convicts generally are required to cook for themselves. They mess with one who is permitted to go into town, and who cooks for the three. He is permitted to bring in some articles which they would not receive under other circumstances.

"The habitation is surrounded with a high wall, enclosing about five acres. As the penitentiary was burnt last spring, the present buildings are temporary. There are three apartments for one hundred prisoners! Mr. Worcester has about thirty with him, and Dr. Butler about twenty-seven. The rooms are large, say twenty feet square. Loose plank are laid down for the floor. Each convict has a blanket to lie upon or to cover himself with as he chooses.

"After entering the prison, Mr. Worcester requested that the convicts might be assembled for public worship on the Sabbath. The keepers, with one exception, assented, but on account of his objection, the request was not granted. He is permitted, however, and Dr. Butler, likewise, to pray with those in their rooms at night, and preach to them, or in other ways to give them instruction on the Sabbath.

"The gentleman on his way to Milledgeville called upon Mrs. Butler, and found her as quiet and happy as could be expected in her trying circumstances. She was engaged as usual in teaching school, and imparting instruction to the Cherokees. She wrote a letter to her husband, which was presented to the keeper of the prison, who is a pious man, of the Methodist church, for examination. He declined reading it, and intimated that it was too trying to his feelings. Dr. Butler has four children. Mrs. Worcester still remains in feeble health."

STATE OF MAINE.

IN COUNCIL, November 7th, 1831.

Present the GOVERNOR,

Messrs. Lane, Howard, Prince, Cobb, Smith, Johnson.

The committee of the whole council, to which was referred the subject of the recent transactions at Madawaska, ask leave to report: That in common with their fellow citizens, they view with feelings of just indignation, the unwarrantable and oppressive acts of the authorities of the British province of New Brunswick in invading the territory of this state with a military force, and arresting a number of our peaceable citizens, compelling others to conceal themselves in the wilderness, and abandon their homes in order to escape the violence with which they were threatened.

In this violation of the sovereignty of the state, we perceive the continuation of that system of encroachment, which, by our forbearance, the provincial government have long been enabled to practice for the purpose of extending their possession, and afterwards relying on that possession as the only foundation of the extraordinary claim they still persevere in making to a considerable portion of the state.

In virtue of a warrant from a magistrate of the county of Penobscot, the inhabitants of Madawaska, on the 20th day of August last, assembled at a place southward of the St. John river, on this side of the line designated by the arbiters as in his opinion a suitable boundary between the two governments, and proceeded peaceably to organize themselves, in pursuance of an act of the legislature of Maine, incorporating the town of Madawaska.

On the 12th day of September last, they held a town meeting for the purpose of electing a representative, as required by the laws and constitution of this state.

For these acts, four of our citizens have been arrested by the authorities of New Brunswick, carried out of the state, and three of them, Barnabas Hunewell, Daniel Savage and Jesse Wheelock, are now confined in jail at Fredericton, in execution of a sentence pronounced against them, after the form of a trial in a court of that province.

As these citizens were arrested by a foreign power, at a place which is claimed and known to be within the limits of this state, and for the exercise of a privilege guaranteed to every citizen, we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion, that the state is bound to adopt all proper and constitutional means within its power, to procure their release.

It appears by documents in the office of the secretary of state of this state, that immediately on receiving information of these transactions, the facts were communicated by the governor to Mr. Livingston, the secretary of state of the United States, with an urgent request that the proper measures might be adopted by the general government to procure the release of our citizens and to protect our territory from invasion.

To this application an answer was duly received from Mr. Livingston, under date of 21st of October last, stating "the extreme desire of the executive of the United States to conform with scrupulous good faith to the arrangement made with the minister of Great Britain for preserving the state of things as it then existed on both sides, until a final disposition could be made of the question, and it was distinctly understood that no exertion of the state authority in the part of the disputed territory which were actually held by the British should interfere with this arrangement." It further appears by the documents communicated, that although the proceedings of the inhabitants of Madawaska were supposed to be a violation of that agreement, yet prompt measures were adopted by the president through the interposition of the representative of the British government at Washington to procure the release of the persons who had taken part in these transactions.

We have caused an examination to be made, but no copy of the arrangement referred to can be found among the archives of the state. And though allusion is made to such an arrangement in the correspondence between Mr. Clay, former secretary of state of the United States and the late governor Lincoln, it was at that time asserted to have been violated by the British authorities, and we are satisfied that in numerous instances, it has been totally disregarded by them.

In order to show the views of the general government with regard to the measures to be adopted by this state, which are now the subject of our consideration, we refer to the following extracts from Mr. Livingston's letter before referred to. "The president desires me to reiterate to you, his anxious desire that you would use your authority and influence to prevent any further collision with the British authorities, in the firm persuasion that the wisdom of congress will direct such ultimate measures, as will bring the controversy to a close, consistent with the interest and dignity of the United States, and particularly, of the states interested in the question. He receives the strongest assurances from the representative of the British government, that no innovation will be countenanced on the part of its provincial functionaries; and on our part, good faith as well as the protection of the frontier, from unauthorized mutual incursions, require the same course of conduct."

In a previous letter to the governor, dated October 5th, Mr. Livingston observes, "The president directs me to say, that he relies on your excellency's prudence to avoid any unnecessary exertion of authority over the contested ground, and to repress as far as lies in your power, all such acts as may endanger the quiet of the bordering territory." "Congress will meet in the course of a few weeks, and it will be a source of deep regret if the moderation and forbearance, which have hitherto characterized the government and people of Maine, should cease to guide them, when its further continuance for so short a period is of such consequence to the nation."

After a full consideration of all the facts and circumstances within our knowledge in relation to the subject submitted to us, we are of opinion that every proper and constitutional measure at present in the power of the executive of this state to procure the release of our citizens confined at Fredericton, has been adopted. And if the committee have forbore to recommend more efficacious means for their immediate release, it is because they believe the state is not in possession of the constitutional power to execute them without the concurrence of the general government.

Believing that congress, which is soon to meet, will adopt the necessary measures to bring this controversy to a close, consistently with justice, the peace of the nation, and the constitutional rights of the state, which we believe will never be voluntarily surrendered, and when a desire to conform to the wishes of the general government, we do not deem it expedient at this time to recommend measures which might lead to collision with the British authorities.

But from the exposed situation of our frontier settlements, and the danger to which they are subjected by encroachments from a neighboring province, we recommend that the governor be advised to issue a general order requiring the militia of the state to hold themselves in readiness to meet such requisitions as the president may deem necessary, to protect our territory from invasion and our citizens from capture.

ISAAC LANE, per order.

In council, November 7, 1831.

This report, on being read, was accepted by the council and by the governor approved.

STATE OF MAINE.

Head quarters, Portland, November 8, 1831.

GENERAL ORDER.

The security and defence of our rights as citizens of a free state, being dependent upon our military establishment, it is not less a duty than the privilege of the citizen soldier to be at all times prepared to repel the invasion of those rights, and afford his aid in the due execution of the laws of his country. The exposed situation of the frontier settlements of this state, and the dangers to which they are subjected by continual encroachments from a foreign power, having, in the opinion of the executive council, rendered it necessary that the militia of the state should be reminded that events might occur which would require their services; The COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, therefore ORDERS that the several divisions of the militia be in readiness to meet such requisitions as circumstances and the laws of the state may require, and as the president of the U. States may deem necessary, for the protection of our citizens and territory.

The major generals will cause this order to be promulgated throughout their respective divisions.

By the commander-in-chief,

SAMUEL G. LADD, adjutant general.

VERMONT.

The following are extracts from the speech of Mr. Palmer to the legislature of Vermont. This gentleman is the first who has been elected governor of a state on anti-masonic principles. All the officers chosen by the legislature are of the same political party.

"The subjects which more immediately require our attention, on the present occasion, are, such improvements and alterations in the existing laws, and the passage of such new ones, as experience has proved to be important and necessary, and called for by the changes in the conditions of society—a vigilant superintendence of the fiscal concerns of the state, as it respects both the just levy and prudent expenditure of the public taxes—the improvement of the various channels of communication between the different parts of the state and with other states—the promotion of trade, agriculture and manufactures—the appointment to office of men who are discreet, honest, capable, and unshackled by any carthy allegiance except to the constitution and laws—a due regard to the state of the militia, and watchful care over the condition of our common schools and literary institutions."

"The administration of oaths is a subject of the deep importance to every government, and cannot fail, consequently to command your special attention. The influence which the exercise over the human mind renders it of the utmost importance that they should be resorted to, only for the attainment of proper objects, and I submit to your consideration whether their administration should not be prohibited by law, except when necessary to secure the faithful discharge of official trusts, and to elicit truth in the administration of justice. I submit also to your consideration whether the cause of morality, and the general good, do not demand your interposition to diminish the frequency of their imposition even for the above purposes."

NEW JERSEY.

Extracts from the late message of Gov. Vroom to the legislature.

The suit instituted by this state against the state of New York, pursuant to the act of February 1828, is still pending undetermined in the supreme court of the United States. The process has been some time since served and returned; and the state of New York, having declined to appear in obedience to its requirement, the court at its last session in January, caused a rule to be entered, that the complainant should be at liberty to proceed ex parte; and unless the defendant should appear at the next term of the court, which will be in January, and answer the complainant's bill, the court would proceed to hear the cause, and make such decree as might be just.

In consequence of this proceeding, the governor of the state of New York addressed a message to the legislature of that state, in which he calls in question the right and authority of the court, to take cognizance of the matters in controversy between the two states, and requests direction as to the course he should pursue. The executive of our sister state is not understood to have placed himself on the broad ground, that the constitutional power of the supreme court did not extend to suits between different states, but on the principle, that the power of the court, though constitutional in the abstract, could not legally be exercised, until the mode of proceeding in cases of this description should be pointed out and regulated by an act of congress. In view of the whole subject, he suggested the propriety of an appearance on the part of the state, accompanied with a protestation to save the state from being concluded on the question of jurisdiction. Under the expectation that such appearance would be entered by the state of New York, and in the sincere desire that the suit should be conducted with a spirit of amity, this state has forborne to proceed in the examination of witnesses; and it is probable that no step will be taken in the cause until after the next term of the court.

I deem it unnecessary, if not a matter of questionable propriety, to enter into any discussion of the grounds assumed by the executive of New York. We have taken our position after full and solemn reflection. The question is pending before a tribunal whose wisdom we cannot hope to instruct. In its purity and integrity we repose with implicit confidence; and to its judgment, matured and enlightened as it always is, we feel great safety in committing our rights.

The two great works of internal improvement, in which the state is interested, the Delaware and Raritan canal, and the Camden and Amboy rail road, are progressing steadily to their completion. The rail road will be put into operation from Amboy to Bordentown early next season; and from the increased facilities that will be given to travelling and the transportation of merchandise, it is confidently expected that it will become immediately profitable, and that a new incentive will be given to the spirit of enterprise which is beginning to be felt in every class of the community. The state is now largely concerned in the rail road, being a stockholder to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars besides having a share in the tolls received by the company. And it is a matter of congratulation that we are likely so soon to realise some of the benefits growing out of our local situation.

It will be remembered that by the charter of the Delaware and Raritan canal company, there was reserved to the state the right of subscribing for one fourth part of the capital stock of that company. If the state should think proper to avail herself of this privilege, it may be important to do so at the present session. The period in which it may be done is limited by the charter to two years from the time the company shall have fixed upon the size, dimensions and route of the canal and feeder; and as the canal is now in progress, and upon a scale calculated to reflect honor upon the state, as well as upon the individuals concerned, it becomes a matter of deep interest whether the state will become a party in the enterprise, and secure the right now within her power, or whether she will submit the work entirely to the management of those who have now the controlling influence, and await the period when the whole shall revert to the state on payment of the original cost. It is a grave question, and worthy to be examined and acted on with great circumspection and care, for its determination will conclude the rights of the state for half a century.

There are various other works of internal improvement either commenced or authorised, in which the state has no immediate interest, but calculated to be of great importance to different sections of the country. The rail road from Paterson to the Hudson river, has commenced under very favorable auspices, and there can be no doubt that its speedy completion will be decidedly favorable to the prosperity of the town, in which as Jersey men and friends of domestic industry, we must all feel a lively interest as well as an honest pride. The route of the contemplated rail road from Elizabethtown to Somerville has been surveyed during the summer. It passes through a rich and fertile part of the state, and one singularly adapted to that species of improvement. If it should be extended further into the interior of the state, or across the state to the Delaware river, at such point as might appear most advantageous to the company, it would prove a great benefit to the community.

BRITISH REFORM.

Blackwood's Magazine, (opposed thoroughly to reform), says, in the September number, that "were the reform bill to pass, the manners of the nation would be as bad, or even worse, than its morals—and all mild men would migrate to America." In a previous number it is stated that:

"Three measures may be expected after the reform bill has come into operation; and which no wisdom or firmness, on the part either of government or the legislature, will be able to avert:—

"1. The duties on Baltic timber will be repealed. This measure will be warmly supported by the £10 householders; to such men, the prospect of getting the best wood at half its present price will be an invincible argument for such a measure. By this means Canada will be lost; and a colony possessing nearly a million of souls, taking off annually, 50,000 emigrants employing 400,000 tons of British shipping, and consuming £2,500,000 of British manufactures will be lost to the empire.

"2. The protective duties on East India sugar will be repealed and the immediate emancipation of the negroes forced on the West India proprietors. By these means, either the flame of revolt will be spread among the slave population, and 150 millions of British capital perish in the flames which have consumed St. Domingo, and rendered that flourishing colony a desert, or the planters will throw themselves into the arms of the Americans. In either view, the West Indies, the great nursery of our seamen, will be forever lost to England. The mother country, distracted with her own troubles, will be as unable to preserve its dominion over those distant possessions, as the French revolutionary government was to save the wreck of its once flourishing West India colonies.

"3. India and the China trade will be thrown open to the clamorous multitude, who will seek in the eastern world that subsistence which the passions of the demagogues have denied them in their own country. They will carry with them to the shores of the Ganges the fierce passions and unbending democracy of the mother state: and the airy fabric of our Indian empire, now upheld only by the steady rule of a stable and despotic government, will be overthrown. Fifty thousand men can never maintain their sway over one hundred millions, but by the firm hand of absolute power. The passions of a democracy will speedily tear that splendid, but absolute and flimsy empire, into pieces. The loss of all our colonies may be harked forward to as the inevitable result of the reform bill. How can it be otherwise with a measure which at once disfranchises all the colonial interests, which closes the door by which they have hitherto been represented?"

"Such extreme disasters will for certain produce one effect. All parties will become weary of distraction and suffering; the period, the inevitable period, will arrive, when the dominion of a firm hand will be required to staunch the wounds of the state. A Caesar, a Cromwell, a Napoleon, will seize the sceptre, and military despotism will close the drama of English reform. It will close it after years of anguish and suffering; after the empire has lost its colonies, and with them its naval supremacy; after unheard of suffering has tamed our people, and the glories of the British name are closed forever."

Why were not the corn-laws noticed! They might well be esteemed as those which a wild "democracy" would first repeal; for the cost of the absolute necessities of life are forced up, that the "nobility, gentry and clergy" may receive excessive rents for their lands and glebes.

The reform might, perchance, bring about "free trade," to a considerable extent. If allowed in the articles of grain and bread-stuffs generally, timber or wood, sugar—only three items—the high aristocracy of England would be exceedingly humbled, and the poor better fed—palaces might fall into ruin, as they did in France, but wretched hovels would also be less frequently met with; a liberal importation of timber, certainly, would affect Canada, and be of no small service to the United States; and there is no doubt that, if the high extra duty on East India sugar, (levied to preserve the West India planters, and keep their slaves from starvation or revolution), were taken off, all which is predicted of the West India islands would follow, and the masters of them be changed, though we would not desire any thing to do with them. The truth is, that the affairs of Great Britain, gigantic as she is in resources, are bolstered so much by one artificial operation resting upon another, are out of all calculation in the result of any material change in the relative position of things—every part or party leaning against some other part or party, and one monopoly being indispensable to the support of other monopolies, without end.

THE SICKENING SUBJECT.

Having published—as in respect to our own impartial record we were compelled to do, the certificate of the reverend Mr. Evans, (a brother-in-law of major Eaton, and a new clerk in one of the departments), charging something very much like a falsehood on the vice president of the U. States, we feel bound to pursue this subject, disgusting as it is, in every respect, that the record may be full—earnestly wishing to conclude the whole branch of this wretched concern now, and forever.

From the Globe.

Mr. Blair:—Sir: As it is fully in my power to substantiate the statement of Mr. Eaton, relative to Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun's calling upon Mr. and Mrs. Eaton, I herewith furnish you with the facts as they occurred. Mr. Eaton was married on Thursday, the 1st of January. On Monday the 5th, Mr. Calhoun's carriage drove up to the door of Mr. O'Neal, and inquiry was made for Mr. and Mrs. Eaton. On being told that they had gone to Philadelphia, Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun's cards were handed to the servant, who brought them in and gave them to my wife. Those, with many others left during their absence, were handed to Mr. and Mrs. Eaton on their return.

October 29, 1831.

From the Telegraph.

Mr. Evans is introduced by the Globe as a member of Mr. O'Neal's family at the time when it is pretended that Mrs. Calhoun's card was left, viz: on the 5th of January, 1829, and he pretends to give his certificate as such. Let the reader look to the following certificate: District of Columbia, county of Washington act.

I, William Brent, clerk of the circuit court of the District of Columbia for the county of Washington, do hereby certify, that on the 23d day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, a license was issued out of this office to solemnize the rights of marriage between French S. Evans and George Ann C. O'Neal.

In testimony whereof I have hereto subscribed my name and affixed the public seal of said court [L. S.] for the county aforesaid, this second day of November, 1831. WM. BRENT, clk.

Mr. Evans says that the card was brought in and given to his wife. Now the fact is that he had no wife until more than six months thereafter!! But Mr. Evans is one of the brothers-in-law of major Eaton, appointed a clerk with a salary of $1,000, and employed to write political letters and make certificates.

From the Globe of November 7.

Mr. Evans stands accused by the Telegraph, of having been guilty of a falsehood, in saying that the card of Mr.

and Mrs. Calhoun had been handed from their carriage to "his wife," by the servant. To make out the crime imputed, the editor has obtained a certificate from the records, shewing that Mr. Evans was married subsequently to the time of Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun's visit. The lady who received the cards of the visitors, was, it seems, not Mr. Evans's wife until after the circumstance occurred which was alluded to by him, and, therefore, the editor of the Telegraph feels himself authorized to impeach a preacher of the gospel of making a false statement, because he did not make it read with the precision of a special plea, averring "and the said cards were delivered to my wife, Mrs. Evans, then Miss O'Neal." Every man, according to the Telegraph, is guilty of falsehood, who says that general Washington was born on his own birth day, because he was not a general when he was born! How scrupulous!

From the Telegraph of the 8th.

After copying the preceding, the editor says—

Perhaps we cannot offer a better comment upon this article than is given in the following letter from the reverend gentleman himself:

"Monday morning, November 7, 1831.

"Sir: I observe under the editorial head of the Globe of this morning, an article in which my name is mentioned. This article is published without my knowledge; and, had I been consulted, would have been positively prohibited.

I am thus frank because I think it due you. Your remarks with reference to myself were mild, and such as honorable warfare entitled you to use.

I have, therefore, to request, my name will not again be introduced into the controversy, and I shall make a similar request of Mr. Blair. Very respectfully,

F. S. EVANS.

I do not wish this published."

It is true that Mr. Evans says that he does not wish his letter to be published; but we did not invite his confidence; and every one can see that we are indebted to the gentleman's fears, and not to his love of truth, for this favor. It is not our purpose now to magnify him into consequence; nor will we, unless further provoked, mete out to him the measure which his conduct deserves; but we will place this matter in its proper light.

The certificate of Mr. Evans, volunteered by him and published in the Globe, was as follows:

Mr. Green then copies the reverend gentleman's certificate, inserted above, and says—

He, (the rev. Mr. Evans), was introduced by the Globe as one of Mr. O'Neal's family, as a witness, who had it fully in his power to substantiate Mr. Eaton's statement, and undertakes to speak of Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun's call as a matter of his own personal knowledge. Let the reader look at the certificate, and it will be seen that it is carefully prepared, so as to make this impression on the public. He asserts that it is fully in his power to substantiate the statement of major Eaton; and then declares the day, date and particulars, with such a minuteness of detail, that no one, who reads the statement, can hesitate to suppose that he spoke as of his own personal knowledge. He does affirm as of his own knowledge, that Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun did call on Mr. and Mrs. Eaton; that their carriage came to the door; that they inquired for Mr. and Mrs. Eaton; that upon being told that they had gone to Philadelphia, Mr. and Mrs. C.'s cards were given to the servant, who gave them to his wife. Who can read this certificate without supposing that Mr. Evans was then married? And who does not see that the certificate of the clerk, proving that he was not married until more than six months thereafter, convicts the reverend gentleman of deliberate falsehood? If he did not say that he was then married, in terms, it is clear that he intended it to be so understood; and hence he himself admits that our remarks "were mild, and such as honorable warfare entitled us to use."

"But what will the public think when they are told, that so far from being then married to Miss O'Neal, and that so far from being a member of the family, as represented by the Globe, this "preacher of the gospel" had not then seen her; and that so far from being an eyewitness of the particulars which he pretends to relate with so much minuteness; he was not at that time a resident of the district!!

[Other severe remarks follow—but we have published enough! Mr. Evans should not have put himself forward in this matter. We regret that his certificate was REGISTERED—but that proceeding being had, there was no remedy. The "Telegraph" goes on to mention some things about the "servant" referred to and Mrs. Eaton's maid, and Mr. Evans marrying them, against the man's consent, &c. &c. a sufficiently queer story, but which we desire to have no concern with.

POLISH PROCLAMATION.

Whatever may be the fate of the brave, but unfortunate Poles, the following proclamation should be preserved as a monument of their devotion to liberty.

"Head-quarters at Kunow, September 13.

"Poles!—Four days ago a most sanguinary and obstinately contested battle was fought under the walls of our capital. Before the eyes of your wives, sisters and mothers, under the view of the whole city of Warsaw, the Polish troops have slain more than 20,000 of the enemy, and the intrenchments which are formed by the labour of your fellow-citizens have now become the grave of her invaders. To save the town from destruction, to weaken the force of the enemy, our troops have evacuated the capital.

The cannon, ammunition and all implements of defence, the government, the deputies, all the magistrates, have withdrawn with the commander-in-chief and the army to Modlin. General Krukowiecki is no longer president of the government.

"In consequence of an armistice, hostilities are for a moment suspended; but, my countrymen, let not that moment be for you a period of repose which might divert you from the great object of the deliverance of your native land; employ it rather to redouble your strength in new efforts to establish the existence and independence of Poland.

"Is Warsaw for all our country? Do its walls and its inhabitants within so narrow a circuit form the limits of the nation? After so many great sacrifices, after so many dearly achieved victories, which have justly astonished the world, shall our high thoughts, our feelings, our hopes—shall all these be at the last moment of expectation dissipated, as if the waters of the Warthe, the Vistula, the Dniپر, the Bug and the Dvina, did not present to us the inheritance of our fathers, which, again reconquered, we will convey to our children? Who then would treacherously violate the sacred oath we have sworn, to shed the last drop of our blood in defence of the last foot of our native land? No! The Pole is too proud to fail in a pledge given in the face of the whole world, or to look forward with a doubt of victory while he still is able to lift an arm. He who can value liberty, who calls himself free man, will also know how to break the fetters attempted to be imposed upon him.

"Poles! Yet one moment more of endurance and resignation, and the end of the glorious contest, whose result will be the restoration of our freedom, independence and rights, is at hand. The scale of victory must preponderate in favor of the zeal, and resolution of our soldiers, and the sacrifices of our citizens. History exhibits no example of a united nation, striving to obtain one great object, being deceived in its hopes. Did not our enemies, 19 years ago, lose their capital, and notwithstanding was not their nationality and independence secured? Never let us forget that we owe every thing to our country, our common mother. Her existence is ours; we wear her chains. Then let us once more renew in our hearts the already sworn oath, that we resolve to be a free people; that we will not lay down the sword of our fathers until we recover liberty and independence. Henceforth let our motto be—"Death or Victory!" and when we shall stand in the order of battle, we will meet the enemy with the cry—"Live the country!" and thus will we conquer. "ROZISKI."

CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The United States vs. Benjamin Shelnire. October session, 1831. Judges Baldwin and Hopkins.

Indictment for uttering, passing and publishing as true, a certain false, forged and counterfeit order, purporting to be an order upon the cashier of the bank of the United States, drawn by the office of discount and deposit in Mobile, by Philip McLoskey, president of said office.

The question of the legality of these orders or drafts, and whether, under the act of congress, they may be the subject of forgery; and also the question of the liability of the bank for the payment of them, arose in the course of this trial, for the opinion of the court. That part of the charge of the court to the jury which has relation to these questions, was as follows—delivered by judge Baldwin:

The counsel of the defendant has presented to the court the question, whether the orders or checks of a president of a branch bank of the United States, drawn on the cashier of the mother bank, came within the meaning of the words "order or check," mentioned in the 18th section of the law incorporating the bank. The point has not been argued, but it has been made. It arises necessarily, in view to the prosecution, and must be decided by the court. The words of the law are very plain—"or any false, forged or counterfeit order or check upon the said bank or corporation or any cashier thereof"—broad enough to embrace this paper which on its face purports to be such an order, and if genuine, would be one, or any order or check on the bank or any of its cashiers at the branches or here, or any draft or bill for the payment of money, which in law would be deemed an order or check.

Is this comprehensive description narrowed by any other parts of the law? We find in it no prohibition direct or indirect against issuing this kind of paper either by the bank or any of its branches, or any word or expression by which congress has excluded it from the purview of the 18th section; neither can we perceive any thing in its nature which would justify such inference. The only restriction on the issuing of any paper, is in the 12th and 13th fundamental articles in the 11th section of the charter.

The bank can make no bill obligatory or of credit under its seal for the payment of a less sum than five thousand dollars; the bills or notes issued by order of the corporation, signed by the president and cashier, are made as binding and obligatory on the bank as those of private persons, but all their bills and notes must be payable on demand, unless of a sum not less than one hundred dollars, and payable to order; none of these restraints apply to an order or check; the notes or bills alluded to are such as contain a promise to pay money, and the bills obligatory are such only as are under seal, and for sums not less than five thousand dollars. The bank is left free to contract debts by any other mode than by their promissory note or an obligation under seal, and no other limitation than is contained in the 8th fundamental article, which is merely as to amount, the only effect of which, is not to exempt the bank from liability for the excess, but to make the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, personally liable. The words of this article are, in our mind, very conclusive on this point. "The total amount of debts which the bank or corporation shall at any time owe, by bond, bill, note, or other contract over and above the debt or debts due for money deposited in the bank, shall not exceed the sum of thirty-five millions of dollars." &c.

This is an explicit declaration that the bank may make, and are bound by contracts other than those by bond, bill, note, or deposit. These other contracts must be taken to mean and be co-extensive with ordinary transactions of banks. We certainly cannot confine them to limit narrower than those subjects which the charter recognizes as those on which the bank are to act. Deposits, discounts, drawing, endorsing, buying, selling, bills of exchange, or taking them for collection, dealing in gold or silver bullion, paying for buildings, improvements, salaries and contingent expenses, are "other contracts" by which the bank may incur debts, and are bound to pay them to any amount to which they may be contracted by them or under their authority. In all these operations, checks or orders on the bank or its cashiers, are indispensable to conducting the business of the bank. They are peculiarly so when we consider the connection between the bank and the government and its branches. Being the depositories of the public money,—bound to transfer it without charge or commission from the place where it is received to the place where it is wanted or required to be deposited,—bound to distribute the money of the government among its creditors,—to pay the salaries of public officers,—to act as commissioner of loans in the different states, in the payment of the public debt and pensions,—there must of necessity be drafts, orders and checks by the bank on its branches on each other, and on the bank. The branches are offices of discount and deposit. Independently of the duties enjoined on them by the charter for the service of the government, there were great and powerful reasons for the incorporation of the bank, and the establishment of its branches, to create and continue a sound, uniform currency, facilities for internal exchange, and convenience. It cannot be contended that drafts, orders, or checks, drawn by or on the bank, or any branch, are not legal tender, no more by which all these obligations, both public and private, could be accomplished, or that they can be accomplished without them. There is no pretence that there is any express or implied prohibition making them unlawful, and no good reason can be suggested why the bank, individuals and the public should not have the same protection against any injury which might result from their being forged or re-issued as the promissory notes of the bank, or the drafts, orders, or checks of individuals upon a cashier of the bank. It is in our opinion no answer to these views, that the law has not expressly authorised the officers of the branches to draw on the bank; it is enough for this point that they are not prohibited from doing so; it is an act indispensable to the transaction of their ordinary business, in order to meet the wants of the public and others. The bank may contract otherwise than by bond, note, or bill. They may authorise the branches to draw orders, checks or bills upon them, whether in funds or not,—but authorised or not, the paper has the same validity; if genuine, the drawer or drawee is bound for payment. It would be introducing a new principle into our code of criminal law, to say that the guilt or innocence of the accused would depend on the fact of the person in whose name a paper is forged having funds or authority on which he could draw his order or check. If a genuine bill is wanting in some requisite to give it currency, as the endorsement of the payee when payable to order—up to a positive law directs that besides the proper signature, some other act should be done to give it any validity between the parties, or to permit it to be read in evidence—as that it should be stamped—the crime of forgery is as complete by forging or knowingly passing it before endorsed or stamped, as after. Bailey on bills 442, Am. ed. 282; 6 D. and E. 606, R. v. v.

To save the party from the penalty on account of the invalidity of the paper if genuine, if it must be shown to be wholly illegal and void in its operation, so that no one could be injured by its being forged or passed upon him. The genuine paper must be as worthless as its counterfeit. The law embracing then all orders or checks on the bank or any cashier thereof, with intent to defraud the bank or any other person, continuing no exceptions, excluding no paper which comes within the definition of common acceptance as an order check, or prohibiting the issuing or circulation of those drawn by the presidents of branches, we are bound to declare them to be within the words, spirit and meaning of the law, equally with the notes of the bank or the checks or orders of individuals.

You will therefore understand us as distinctly laying down the law to be, that it is criminal to forge or pass paper of this description. The next question of law which arises in the case is, whether that part of the indictment which charges that the accused passed the order or check in question, with intent to defraud the bank of the United States, has been made out.

On this part of the case the law is well settled. The indictment must allege the offence to have been committed with the intention of defrauding some person or corporation, and this allegation must be proved as laid. This is the general rule, but it must be taken with this qualification. If the person in whose name a forged note, bill, order or check is drawn, or the one on whom it is drawn, would be bound to pay it, if the law infers and takes as proved the intent to defraud and such person, from the act of forging, or knowingly passing such paper. Bailey on bills, 442, Am. ed. 386; Russell and Ryan, 159, 291; 2; 2d Taunt. 333, 4.

It is not necessary that there should be any actual injury sustained or fraud practised in fact, on the person who was the subject of the mediated fraud or injury; this part of the offence consists in mere intention, and if that intention can be consummated the offence is complete. It is enough that it may probably or possibly be done. 2d Str. 749, 2d L. R. 1469, 2d W. B. 787, 4th Wash. 727, 2d Taunt. 333.

The passing of this order or check is alleged to be done with intent to defraud the bank of the United States; it therefore becomes necessary for us to inquire whether the bank might or could be defrauded or injured if the paper was genuine. By the 14th fundamental article of the charter of the bank, it is bound to establish branches in certain cases. It is authorized to establish them whosoever they think fit, within the United States, and to commit the management and the business thereof to such persons and under such regulations as they may think proper, not being contrary to law or the constitution of the bank; or instead of establishing branches they may employ other banks, with the approbation of the treasury, to manage the business proposed, other than for the purposes of discount, under such agreements and under such regulations as they may deem just and proper.

It thus appears that the branches are legitimate emanations from the parent bank, who may commit their management to such persons, and subject to such regulations as they think proper, under no other limitations to their power than the laws of the land and their own charter.

The operations of the branches are carried on with the funds of the corporation by officers of its appointment and under its regulations: they are its agents capable of binding it by their contracts; all their transactions are for the benefit of the bank, who cannot disavow them unless in a clear case of an excess or abuse of their powers, under such circumstances as would invalidate the contract of an agent of any other corporation or an individual. Any business may be done at the branches in relation to discounts and deposits which may be done at the parent bank; it is liable to depositors but not to the constitution of the bank, for all drafts, orders or checks drawn by its officers on their own cashier, by their own authority.

The act of establishing a branch is per se the creation of an agency; it is an authority not only to the extent of the regulations under which their agent acts, but to the extent of all acts and transactions of the officers of the branches, which the bank have been in the habit of adopting and carrying out, on the same principle that individuals are liable on the contracts of their wives and servants, who have been permitted to deal on their credit, and in their names; or a merchant, whose clerk is in the habit of writing letters, signing notes, bills and checks in his name, though without any written or express authority, by the adoption and recognition of which he authorizes the public to consider him as his agent, and bound to do in future what he has been in the habit of doing with his knowledge and assent. It would be strange indeed that the bank should not be liable for checks or orders drawn by its agents at their own branches, which not only form a very important item in the currency of the country and the operation of the branches, but which the bank have for years daily ratified and authorized in their payment: the uniform course of business transacted between the bank and its branches, furnishes such a strong legal inference and presumption of its being authorized by the regulations under which they have been established, that the burden of proof to the contrary is clearly thrown on the bank or any other person who would attempt to show that the paper was not obligatory upon them. It would be a severe reflection on the bank to suppose that they would for a moment refuse payment of these checks and orders, and our system of jurisprudence would deserve little of public respect or confidence if the law were to coerce it.

But the charter is not silent. The 8th fundamental article makes the bank liable for all debts, though they exceed the amount limited,—the 14th makes the officers of discount and deposits its agents,—the 16th section makes the bank the depository of the public money, and imposes on it the obligation of transferring, distributing and paying it under the directions of the treasury,—and by the 17th article, the bank is bound to pay in gold and silver all its notes, bills and obligations, and all deposits in the bank or its officers,—and the proviso enacts, that congress may enforce and regulate the payment of other debts under the same penalties as are prescribed for the refusal to pay its notes, bills, obligations and deposits. The mode in which the bank contracts a debt, the shape it assumes, or the place where contracted, is of no importance.

The officers being its agents, the debts contracted by them become the debts of the corporation, imposing a duty to pay them, which may be done at or by the branches of the bank. If the payment is made in coin, the debt is extinguished; if made by a draft, or check, the debt remains until they are actually paid. Unless the holder expressly takes them as payment, and at his own risk, they create a new debt or obligation, when the bank is as much bound to perform as the old one for which it is intended to make satisfaction. It is a matter of mutual convenience, whether the old debt or duty shall be extinguished by payment or taking paper, whether in the promissory notes of the bank or orders or checks drawn upon it. They may be in large drafts, or orders, for remittance, or for any other way than by circulation, in any form, with or without ornaments, devices or marks. Whether they resemble in these particular the notes of bank, is immaterial; their substance and legal effect are the same; they create a new debt or duty, obligatory on the bank. It is bound to honor all the paper which it issues or gets into circulation by its authority or agents. Paper of the kind now under consideration, can be put into circulation in no other way than by being used in payment of a debt or other equivalent. If, on the requisition of the treasury, an officer of the branch at a place in which public funds were deposited, should draw his order on the cashier of the bank or any branch at a place to which it was required to transfer them, or in distributing the public money among public creditors, and distributing officers of the government, paying salaries, pensions or the public debt, should do so as a matter of mutual convenience and consent, give drafts, orders, or checks, either for remittance or circulation, on the bank or another branch, the bank would be as much bound to pay them as they would to pay the same amount to an officer or creditor of the government, who would deposit to his own credit the amount thus received through the bank.

The same rule would apply to an individual depositor, a creditor of the bank, or one who had an order or check on them, and would receive payment in the shape of branch orders, so, if a branch makes a contract of discount, and pays the proceeds by drafts on the bank, or any other kind of paper to suit their convenience: these obligations necessarily result from the contracts of deposit and discount. But there is another contract equally binding—that of purchase and exchange. An individual desirous of procuring a medium of remittance or circulation, exchanges with a branch his gold, silver, or any paper which they accept, as an equivalent for their drafts, orders or checks, large or small, as the case may be, stands in the same position to the bank as a previous creditor, depositor or holder of any demand upon them. He pays his money into the coffers of the bank, who receive it from their agents as the product of the contract made by their drafts and orders, all the profits of which go directly to the bank. To refuse payment in any of these cases, would be a fraud too palpable to be tolerated—wholly repugnant to every dictate of justice and rule of law.

The bank then being liable to pay paper of this description if genuine, it follows that the forging or knowingly passing it, could and might be intended, and operated, to defraud the bank. This raises the legal inference and presumption that such was the intention of the accused. When the law infers or presumes a fact, or an intention as resulting from the evidence, a jury may and ought to find it true, if there is direct proof before them;—the inference and the presumption of the law, if not supported by any direct evidence, without demand or payment of interest—the existence of a deed of land after 30 years possession—the malicious intent which is implied for the act of speaking or publishing scandalous words in civil cases—the inference of malice aforethought which the law draws from the unlawful killing of another not explained—the law in this case, every man may be found guilty of the possession of stolen goods and not accounting for them; and that the jury have heard in this case, the legal presumption of the accused knowing the order in question to be forged—drawn from his having passed another forged order of the same description, are among the similar cases where a jury ought to and will take legal inferences, when not rebutted by positive testimony. The inference in this case, and though it may be found that there is direct evidence of the intention to defraud Burke, and that he was actually defrauded, and the indictment would be sustained if it was so laid, yet it does not follow that there was not also an intention to defraud the bank. In our opinion, the facts of the case amount to an intention to defraud both Burke and the bank,—the indictment would be good in law and supported by the evidence, if the offence was said to have been done with the intent to defraud either or both, and therefore instruct you that the allegation of the indictment in this particular is sufficient in law, and made out by the evidence, if you believe the witnesses.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

THE REPORT ON IRON. The committee of the New York convention, appointed to consider and report on the manufacture of iron and steel, (many will feel interested in knowing,) have performed that duty—and their ample report, just received by the chairman of the permanent committee, from B. B. Howell, esq. of New-York, will be laid before the people of the United States with all promptitude, through the newspapers; or some other means, if its length shall prevent its general circulation through the usual channels. An extensive appendix is made up of valuable tabular statements, and other important presentations of facts in figures.*

The editor of the REGISTER, as chairman of the permanent committee, has carefully read and partially examined this report, which he regards as alike honorable to all the gentlemen of the committee, because of the zeal with which they have collected the matter, as to the member whose arduous duty it was, (out of a vast body of indigested materials), to present to the nation a paper like that now before us. It has cost him much time and close reflection, to condense his facts—yet the report is a long one;—and it could not be otherwise from the nature of things: but it is so plain that "the who rous may read;" and if it shall not, at once, astonish the friends of the protecting system on account of the importance and extent of the iron manufacture—as well as delight them because of its clearly demonstrated effect to lessen price to consumers—the editor will feel compelled to believe that his own judgment on such subjects is not worth much.

The following results appear ascertained with as much certainty as, from the absence of information strictly official, can be expected—and our opinion is, that the amounts given must needs be below the real production, employment, subsistence, &c. stated:

The aggregate of iron manufactured, if rendered in pigs, would be	tons	191,536
The amount of bar-iron made	"	112,866
Men employed, (about),	no.	30,000
Wages paid	dolls.	8,750,000
Persons subsisted	no.	150,000
Value of the manufacture, (in its first stages),	dolls.	13,550,000
Paid (directly) to agriculturalists for subsistence	"	4,000,000
Paid for transportations of iron, by land and water	"	1,500,000

*The course to be pursued with like reports containing many statistical statements, will be to get them into type, immediately—in which shape they can be conveniently and promptly examined by the executive committee; who design also to call to their aid such gentlemen, (not of their own number), as are deemed best qualified to investigate the facts pertaining to any particular subject under consideration. Thus mistakes, if they shall exist, may be detected, and the publication be made the more speedily. The chairman can command a sufficiency of type and obtain mechanical means to accomplish these things—in his own office or others, as need requires.
